But the operation of a railroad on land taken by eminent domain and abutting on a public city street, although diminishing the value of houses on the other side of the street, is damnum absque injuria for which owners of houses are not entitled to compensation, under Pa. Const., art. IX, § 2. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippincott, 3 Cent. Rep. 313, 116 Pa. 473; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hunter, 3 Cent. Rep. 323, 116 Pa. 473.

as the 'White Oak Grove Road.' The whole of the farm lies east of this highway, except at one point where a corner of one of the tracts composing the farm crosses the highway, making a small triangle containing from three to six one-hundredths of an acre on the west side of such highway. Appellant's railroad was located and constructed in the middle of its right of way, which was one hundred feet wide, lying west of and adjoining the White Oak Grove road. The railroad was separated from the farm by the highway, except where it touched the little triangular piece lying west of the highway. In constructing the railroad at this point, a cut was made and a portion of the earth on this triangle was dug away and removed. Appellant took no steps to have this land condemned. When the sub-contractor was grading at this point, appellee notified him not to go upon this triangle, as it was his property and the right of way had not been secured over it. In explaining their action appellant's counsel say: 'Upon investigation, it appeared so small and trifling, the sub-contractor was advised to go ahead with his work, and that the Railroad Company would settle with appellee.' No settlement, however, was made and appellee instituted the present suit. The amended declaration upon which the case was tried was in the nature of an action on the case, in which damages were claimed for the trespass and excavation upon the triangular piece lying west of the highway, and for damages to all the land lying upon the east side of the highway. In the declaration it is averred that, by reason of defendant entering upon and digging up and carrying away the soil and earth from plaintiff's land, and by reason of defendant constructing its said railroad, as above stated, so near to said highway, and so near plaintiff's land, and continuing to operate the same, defendant thereby became liable to pay to plaintiff all damages that the construction and operation of its said railroad will cause or has caused to the residue of said body of land not in fact entered upon and despoiled. It is then further averred the construction and operation of said railroad in the manner and way it is constructed and operated will and does greatly injure the rest of said body of land not entered upon and despoiled in this: that it makes, and will through all coming time while such lands are used for farming purposes, the approach to and from the dwelling house and the other buildings on the west side of said lands over said highway unsafe and dangerous to travel on and over in carriages or other vehicles drawn by horses or other animals; that the deep cut and high embankment immediately in front of and near plaintiff's land make the appearance of such farm unsightly, and otherwise injuriously affect it, and that the construction and operation of said railroad as aforesaid render said farm less convenient and comfortable as a place of residence, and also render such land less safe and convenient for farming purposes, particularly in handling stock upon it. It is then averred that by 'reason of the wrongful acts and doings of defendant as aforesaid, and the injuries done to plaintiff's lands as aforesaid, the salable value of said land is thereby greatly decreased.' Pleas were filed by appellant, a trial had before a jury, who returned a verdict for appellee in the sum of $500, upon which judgment was rendered.

"There can be no question but that appellee was entitled to recover damages occasioned by the entering upon and removing or disturbing the soil upon the premises west of the highway, but it is strenuously insisted that for such damages to the remainder of the farm as are claimed in the declaration there can be no recovery. The evidence was conflicting. Appellee's witnesses testified that the construction and operation of the road would damage appellee's farm to the extent of $8 to $10 per acre,—decrease its rental and salable value; while the witnesses for appellant think there would be no substantial damage. Under those circumstances the jury were warranted in their verdict, if the law as applicable to the case was properly applied.

"The instructions given appellee upon this subject were as follows: '(1) The court instructs the jury, on behalf of plaintiff, that the true measure of compensation, where no land is taken for the right of way for a railroad upon which to construct a road bed and track, is the difference between what the whole property would have sold for unaffected by the railroad and what it would sell for as affected by it. (2) The Constitution of this State declares: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation;" and the jury are instructed it will be presumed the framers of that instrument used the word "damaged," in that connection, in its ordinary and popular sense, which is, hurt, injury or loss, and "that the damage contemplated by the Constitution," in cases where no land is actually taken, "must be an actual diminution of present value or of price, caused by constructing and operating the road, or a physical injury to property that renders it less valuable in the market if offered for sale." (3) If the jury believe, from the evidence, that plaintiff is the owner in fee simple of the land described in the declaration, and that the defendant Railroad Company, in constructing its road-bed and track, entered upon any portion of plaintiff's said land, and dug up and carried away the soil, and that such acts were a physical injury to such lands, or any part thereof; and if the jury further believe, from the evidence, the construction of defendant's road-bed and track along, near and adjacent to plaintiff's land, and its contemplated maintenance and operation (if the jury believe, from the evidence, they are so constructed, and that defendant intends to maintain and operate the same) are an actual damage to his lands, and do in fact render the same less valuable in the market if offered for sale,—then the law is for plaintiff, and the jury should find for him; and the jury are instructed, as a matter of law, plaintiff is entitled to recover for any depreciation, if the jury believe, from the evidence, there has been any depreciation in the market value of plaintiff's lands not actually entered upon by reason of the construction, maintenance and operation by defendant of its railroad as constructed, and also for any physical injuries done to that portion of plaintiff's land upon which defendant did actually enter, if the jury believe, from the evidence, defendant did enter upon any portion of plaintiff's lands described in the declaration, and did cause any physical injuries to the same. (5) The jury are further instructed, on behalf of the plaintiff, that, in determining whether plaintiff's lands are lessened in value by reason of the construction and the proposed operation of the railroad, then the jury may consider the injury to plaintiff's lands, if any is proved, arising from the inconveniences actually brought about and occasioned by the construction of defendant's railroad, although such damage might not be susceptible of definite ascertainment, and may also consider such incidental injury as the proof may show might or would result from the perpetual use of the track for moving trains, or from the inconveniences in using said lands for farming purposes and in handling stock upon it, if the proof shows such railroad would occasion any such inconveniences, and they may consider generally such damages as the evidence may show, if any are reasonably probable to ensue from the construction and operation of the defendant's said railroad.

"Witnesses for appellee seem to base their idea of the damages upon the supposition that the construction and operation of the road so near the highway has rendered it dangerous and unsafe to travel upon, made the egress and ingress from the farm onto the highway with teams and stock more dangerous, rendering the farm less safe and convenient, and thereby reduced the value of appellee's farm. Appellant insists that in all this evidence 'appellee has shown no injury or damages not suffered in common with the general public, for which the law affords him no redress.' We cannot assent to this view. The damages spoken of by the witnesses in reference to making the highway more dangerous are, to some extent, shared with appellee by the public; and in so far as they are common to both no right of action exists. But there are elements of damage affecting the value of appellee's farm which do not in any way affect the public. A highway beside a farm may, and generally does, give it an increased value, depending, to some extent, upon the location of the buildings, and the character and degree of use the owner may have for such highway. In so far as its use is interfered with or destroyed, the value of the farm is lessened, and for that the owner should recover, for he sustains some special pecuniary damages in excess of that sustained by the public generally. But it is urged that the damages claimed arise, not from any physical invasion or disturbance of appellee's property, or actual encroachment upon the highway, but alone from the injury to the use and enjoyment thereof caused by the operation of the railroad; that such operation being lawful, and confined to appellant's right of way, the damages arising therefrom to appellee would be damnum absque injuria. We admit there is force in this question, and, as far as we are aware, this precise question has not been passed upon by the supreme court. The nearest approach to it is in the case of Rigney v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 64, where there was no direct interference with the premises of Rigney, but an obstruction placed in the street at a distance therefrom, thereby injuring the use of the street; or, as stated in the opinion, 'It is not claimed or pretended that the plaintiff's possession has been disturbed, or that any direct physical injury has been done to his premises by reason of the obstruction in question.' The gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint in that case was that the defendant, in cutting off his communication with Halstead Street by way of Kenzie Street, has deprived him of a public right which he enjoyed in connection with his premises, and thereby inflicted upon him an injury in excess of that shared by him with the public generally, and it is for this excess he seeks to recover, and nothing more; and the court says: 'If the lot and buildings of appellant are to be regarded as property, and not merely the subject of property, as, strictly speaking, they are, then there has clearly been no physical injury to it; but if by "property" is meant the right of user, enjoyment and disposition of the lot and buildings, then it is evident there has been a direct physical interference with appellant's property; and, when considered from this aspect, it may appropriately be said the injury to the property is direct and physical.'

"We are inclined to think that there is no good reason for distinguishing between an injury arising from an interference with appellee's right to the advantages the highway gave his farm, caused by a physical obstruction placed therein, as in the foregoing case, and where the same kind of an injury is produced by the operation of trains beside it. In either case the advantages given the farm by the highway have to some extent been destroyed, and the land lessened in value. If it be conceded that the result of operating the road has in fact injured appellee's farm in a way not common to the public, and thereby made it less valuable, it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence that it has been damaged for public use. Such operation, being lawful, and confined to the right of way, does not release appellant from liability; for it would clearly be liable for damages caused by an unlawful act, and, as we understand the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken nor damaged for public use without just compensation, it means to cover cases where damages are caused by acts that are legal, and entirely within the powers of the corporation performing them, but in the doing of which, for the use and benefit of the public, private property is damaged. It follows, therefore, that appellant's proposition that 'a corporation is not liable unless an individual doing the same thing on his private property would be,' as applied to this case, is not sound. An individual cannot legally take or damage private property for public use, but a railroad company can lawfully do either, if in so doing it makes compensation.

"It has been suggested that if this recovery can be sustained, it would authorize repeated suits, upon the theory that a new injury is caused by every passing train, thus giving ground for successive actions. This is a misapprehension of the true grounds upon which the right of recovery rests. The damage to appellee is caused by the construction of the road in such place as that the proper and only way of operating it did of necessity, from that time, injure the farm and lessen its value. It is the right which appellant has at its pleasure, and for all future time, to operate its trains, that at once depreciates the value of the farm, and not the effect produced by the passing of particular trains, or any particular injury or accident that may occur to appellee's property therefrom; hence the damages arose at the time of the construction of the road, and were then capable of being determined once for all. Being that this view of the law is within the spirit and meaning of the constitutional provision alluded to [art. 2, § 18], and has been fairly applied by the court below, the judgment of the circuit court will be affirmed."

Messrs. Stevens & Horton and James S. Ewing, for appellant:

There can be no recovery where the elements of damage are speculative and imaginary, such as the danger of having horses frightened, or offensive to a sensitive taste, such as the unsightliness of an object lawful in itself.

The true question is whether the property was injured by the improvements. If not, then there is no damage, and there can be no recovery. If there is, then the recovery must be measured by the extent of the loss.

One of the elements of damage distinctly recognized in Shawneetown v. Mason, 83 Ill. 387, was the physical obstruction of the right and means of access to plaintiff's premises.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Washington County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendants in an action to recover a claim against a decedent's estate, which was alleged to be barred by the Statute of Limitations. Reversed.

Statement by Minshull, Ch. J.:

On January 6, 1881, Joseph F. Stanley commenced suit in the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County against the administrator of Timothy Stanley, deceased, and his heirs, the claim having been disallowed by the direction of the latter.

The petition contained a number of causes of action, eight of which accrued in the years 1866 and 1867, and would have been barred but for the following averments contained in the petition:

"That when the cause of actions accrued to this plaintiff, on each and every of said eight causes set forth in this plaintiff's petition against the said Timothy T. Stanley, the said Timothy T. Stanley was absent from the County of Washington, and absent from the State of Ohio; that he then resided in the State of West Virginia, and so remained absent continuously

But nonresidence and continued absence from the State do not excuse a want of diligence in ascertaining complainant's rights. Teall v. Slaven, 40 Fed. Rep. 774.

A debtor's voluntary absence from the State suspends the running of the Statute. Brick v. Buel, 35 Tex. 511.

His absence must be such that process cannot be so served upon him that judgment will bind him personally. Quarles v. Bickford, 4 New Eng. Rep. 107, 84 N. H. 455; Bensley v. Macbrie, 4 West. Rep. 915, 30 Mo. App. 615.

The time during which a debtor is absent residing out of the State of his own free will and accord is to be deducted in estimating the time in which an action must be brought against him. Hoffman v. Churchill (Mich.) Feb. 1882.

The term "beyond seas," in the saving clause of a Statute of Limitations, is to be construed as equivalent to "without the limits of the State" where the Statute is enacted. Shelby v. Guy, 34 U. S. 11 Wheat. 301 (4 L. ed. 485); Faw v. Hoberdeau, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch. 174 (3 L. ed. 402); Murray v. Baker, 25 U. S. 3 Wheat. 541 (4 L. ed. 484); Alexandria Bank v. Dyer, 20 U. S. 14 Pet. 141 (10 L. ed. 891).

The term "beyond the seas," in a State Statute of Limitation, will be construed according to the decisions of the State. In North Carolina it is construed to mean "without the United States." Davis v. Briggs, 37 U. S. 635 (34 L. ed. 1085).

A Statute of Limitations which excepts creditors "out of the Commonwealth" begins to run as soon as a creditor enters the State, even temporarily, provided the debtor is then in the State. Faw v. Hoberdeau, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch. 174 (3 L. ed. 402).

The five years' limitation provided by the Statute of Limitations in favor of the holder of a tax title will not run in his favor while he is out of the State. Waxlin v. Reed, 30 Fed. Rep. 308.

The Tennessee Statute suspending the running of limitation during the debtor's absence from the State, after the right of action has accrued, applies to causes of action accruing in another State and between citizens thereof. Kempe v. Bader, 36 Tenn. 188.

Under the Tennessee Code, temporary absence from the State of a resident debtor, after the cause of action has accrued, suspends the running of limitation. Ibid.

The absconding of a debtor to prevent the institution of a suit against him does not suspend the Statute unless such obstruction to the suit existed at the time the cause of action accrued. Richardson v. Cogswell, 67 Ark. 179.

The provision of the Statute preserving right of action against one "without the State" is not applicable to one who concealed the place of his residence, and lived for more than six years within the State, under an assumed name. Engel v. Fischer, 3 Cent. Rep. 308, 103 N. Y. 400.

The claim of a resident of Maine, holding a note made by a resident and payable there, is not barred by the Statute of the State, where the maker, within six years after the claim accrued, removed his residence from the State and never returned. McCann v. Randall, 4 New Eng. Rep. 325, 147 Mass. 61.

The return or coming into the State must be open and notorious and under such circumstances that the creditor could, with reasonable diligence, find his debtor and serve him with process. Engel v. Fischer, 3 Cent. Rep. 308, 103 N. Y. 404; Hill v. Bellows, 18 Vt. 737; Hysinger v. Saltz, 3 Qd. & J. 146; Ford v. Babcock, 2 Sandf. 515; Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 84; Dorr v. Swartwout, 1 Blatchf. 178.

But when the "coming" is to dwell and reside permanently, it is not necessary in order to set the Statute in operation that the creditor should have knowledge thereof. It is enough if he could acquire such knowledge by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Davis v. Field, 25 Vt. 430; Mason v. Foot, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 225; Hall v. Nashmith, 25 Vt. 701; Whitson v. Wase, 103 Mass. 60.

Under the Connecticut Statute, a creditor has six years after the debtor has come into the State in which to institute a personal action upon a simple contract against him. Waterman v. Sprague Mfg. Co., 4 New Eng. Rep. 482, 55 Conn. 544.

The creditor's remedy is not affected by the fact that, during the absence of the debtor from the State, he had real estate here open to attachment. Ibid.

An unmarried physician, who boarded and had an office, went out of the State for two months, paid rent for the office, but not for board, during his absence, and then returned to the State and soon after left again, leaving furniture in the office, but giving up his room and board, and went to another State, where he died. Such absence are to be added to the statutory period of limitations in a suit against his administrator on a due-bill made by him. Brady v. Potts (N. J.) 10 Cent. Rep. 172.

Where defense to a suit on a note is the Statute of Limitations, the time defendant resided outside of the State will be deducted from the number of years the note has run. Palmer v. Morse (Me.) 3 New Eng. Rep. 300.

Under the proviso in the Statute of Limitations, successive absences might be accumulated and the aggregate deducted. Cutler v. Wright, 22 N. Y. 455; Hardee v. Palmer, 3 E. D. In case of repeated absences of the debtor from the State, the whole were to be combined; and the bar of the Statute was not perfect unless the defendant's residence in the State, for six complete years after his first return, was established. Richardson v. Curtis, 3 Blatchf. 308.

from the State of Ohio before the accruing of the cause of action in this petition in favor of the plaintiff and against the said Timothy T. Stanley, until his death in the State of West Virginia, on or about the 16th of February, 1878."

This the defendants sought to avoid by the following answer:

"2. They admit that at the time the causes of action set up in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th counts in the petition are said to have accrued to plaintiff, said Timothy T. Stanley was absent from Washington County, and absent from the State of Ohio, and that he then resided in the State of West Virginia, but these defendants deny that he so remained absent continuously from the State of Ohio before the accruing of said cause of action until his death. That they admit that on August 1, 1866, said Timothy T. Stanley departed this State, and went to the State of West Virginia; but they deny that he remained continuously in said State of West Virginia until his death, and these defendants aver that after said August 1, 1866, and after the cause of action set up in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th counts of the petition herein, are said to have accrued to plaintiff, and more than six years prior to the presentation of the claim in the petition set up by plaintiff to said administrator, said Timothy T. Stanley came into said State of Ohio, openly and notoriously, and became subject to the process of the courts of said State, all of which plaintiff at the time well knew. And these defendants further say that during said period of time said plaintiff resided in said Washington County, and State of Ohio; that during said period of time said Timothy T. Stanley came frequently into said Washington County, and remained several days therein, with the knowledge of plaintiff; that during said period of time said Timothy T. Stanley was at the house of plaintiff in said Washington County for several days with the knowledge of plaintiff, and was subject to the process of the courts of said county."

The plaintiff demurred to this answer on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The demurrer was overruled and exception taken. The plaintiff then filed a reply controverting the averments. The case was tried to a jury upon the various issues of fact made by the pleadings, and a verdict rendered for the defendants. On the trial the court charged the jury as follows:

"If the jury find from the evidence upon the issue made in the pleadings upon the question of the Statute of Limitation, that after the accruing of the cause of action set up in the petition, or before the accruing of all of said causes of action, the decedent, Timothy T. Stanley, removed to the State of West Virginia about August, 1866, and that he remained there continuously until his death, about the month of November, 1878, then the Statute of Limitation would not run against said causes of action set up in said petition, and be no bar to a recovery by the plaintiff in this action.

"But if the jury find that during said time, from August, 1866, until the date of his death, S. L. R. A.

about November, 1878, the said Timothy T. Stanley returned frequently, openly, occasionally and notoriously to the County of Washington, in the State of Ohio, the place where the contracts in the petition were made, and the place where said plaintiff during said times resided, and the said plaintiff did know, or would have known by ordinary diligence, of the frequent presence in said Washington County and State of Ohio, of said decedent, Timothy T. Stanley, and could have, by ordinary diligence, obtained service of summons in said County of Washington, and State of Ohio, upon said Timothy T. Stanley, in an action founded upon the causes of action set up in the petition, then the Statute of Limitation would run against said demands mentioned in said petition, and the same would be a bar to a recovery by the plaintiff in this action."

This was excepted to at the time, and, with the ruling on the demurrer, was made the ground of a motion for a new trial. The motion was overruled, and judgment entered upon the verdict, to reverse which this proceeding in error is prosecuted.

Mr. S. B. Knowles for plaintiff in error.
Mr. A. D. Pollett for defendants in error.

Winnahall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case arises upon the defense in the answer to which the demurrer was sustained. The defense was intended to avoid the effect of the averments in the petition as to the absence of the decedent from the State at the time the plaintiff's causes of action accrued, and his continued absence thereafter until the time of his death. The question requires a construction of the following section of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Statute of Limitations:

"Sec. 4089. If, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the State, or has absconded, or concealed himself, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he comes into the State, or while he is so absconded or concealed; and if, after the cause of action accrues, he depart from the State, or abscond or conceal himself, the time of his absence or concealment shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought."

It is necessary to observe that it is not claimed in the defense to which the demurrer was overruled, that the causes of action to which it was pleaded, or any of them, arose in the State of West Virginia, the residence of the decedent, or were to be performed there. Such averments were made as separate grounds of defense, and were met by denials. The gist of the defense to which the demurrer was interposed, is that, although the decedent resided in the State of West Virginia when the causes of action accrued, yet he frequently came into this State, and within the jurisdiction of the courts of the county in which the plaintiff resided, after the causes of action accrued, and more than six years before the action was commenced; and that these occasions were attended with such circumstances of notoriety that the plaintiff could, with the exercise of ordinary diligence, have obtained service upon him. The defense admits that the deceased was a nonresident of the State at the time the cause of action accrued; but it is claimed that if, at any time thereafter, he came into the State so that the plaintiff might have commenced his action, the Statute began to run, and continued to do so, though he may have departed the State the next day, and have remained out of it the residue of his life.

We do not so construe this Statute. Where a defendant is out of the State when a cause of action accrues against him, our construction is that the Statute does not begin to run until he comes into the State. It then begins to run against him, and if he remain in the State it will be barred in the period limited, from that time. But if, after he comes into the State, he again depart from it, the running of the Statute is suspended during his absence. It is not necessary that we should determine, in this case, whether absence upon business—the defendant continuing a resident of the State—is sufficient, or whether it must be limited to absence as a nonresident of the State, for it is admitted that the decedent was a resident of the State of West Virginia, and his absence, therefore, referable to that fact.

The design of the Statute is to give to the plaintiff the full period of the limitation, in available time, for the commencement of his action; so that, in ascertaining this period, the time the defendant is out of the State is not computed as any part of the time given him in which to commence his action. This is in close analogy to the Roman law which, in like cases, counted only the available days, tempus utile, on which activity was possible, in ascertaining whether an action was barred by limitation or not; and days on which the action was hindered by the absence of the defendant were excluded from the computation of the term. Ponsie's Galus, 255.

It is the only rational construction that can be placed on the Statute, and makes it consistent with itself. Thus in the second clause it is provided, in so many words, that if after the cause of action accrues, the defendant depart from the State, "the time of his absence . . . shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought." It could not then have been intended by the Legislature that, where a defendant was absent from the State at the time a cause of action accrued, his return to the State would only set the Statute to running in his favor, but that it would continue to run, whether he remained in the State or not.

The first clause provides for the case where the defendant is absent from the State when the cause of action accrues; the second for the case where he departs from the State after it has accrued. In the first, the Statute begins to run when he comes into the State; in the second, it ceases to run, and is suspended, until he returns to the State. The purpose, then, of the Statute is perfectly plain: Presence of the defendant within the State, so that he may be sued, avails in his favor; absence from the State, whether at the accruing of the action or afterwards, suspends the running of the Statute.

G. L. R. A.

This is the first time the precise question seems to have arisen in this court, so that none of its previous decisions afford any light in determining it. But most of the other States have Statutes of Limitations with provisions similar in this regard to our own, which have been frequently construed by their courts; and the general result of these decisions is, that when a defendant is absent from the State when a cause of action accrues against him, his occasional or frequent visits to the State will be of no avail to him under a plea of the Statute of Limitations, however open and notorious his visits may have been, unless he has been in the State, and the jurisdiction of its courts, for the full period limited by the Statute, either continuously or in the aggregate.

The Statute of the State of Maine is substantially the same as our own: and there, in a suit on a promissory note, which the defendant claimed was barred, he offered to show that though he lived in the Province of New Brunswick, he was frequently in the State to the knowledge of the plaintiff. But the court said: "The defendant was absent from and resided out of the State when the cause of action accrued, and has not since resided within it, though he may have occasionally been within its limits,"—and it was held that he could not avail himself of the bar of the Statute." Bush v. Bowett, 57 Me. 542.

We cite, in this connection, and to the same effect, Milton v. Bidson, 6 Allen, 329, Lane v. National Bank of the Capital, 6 Kan. 74; Smith v. Bond, 8 Ala. 330, Chenot v. Lefevre, 8 Ill. 337; Dell v. Lampray, 37 N. H. 109, Rossett v. Rossett, 55 Barb. 506, and Bennett v. Cook, 43 N. Y. 537.

In the last case the defendant resided in Jersey City, but did business in New York City, and was there some eight or ten hours each day. He plead the Statute. But the court said: "If the Statute runs at all during the presence of a nonresident in the State, such presence must, in any view of the case, amount in the aggregate to six years to render the defense available."

And in Bennett v. Bennett it is said: "The object of the exception in the Statute was to give the creditor the whole of the six years' residence in the State within which to commence his action. He is not obliged to follow the debtor to another State; nor is he called upon to watch him to ascertain whether he comes into the State for a temporary purpose, so long as his residence is elsewhere."

Our conclusion then is, that under the provisions of § 4069, Rev. Stat., the Statute of Limitations does not run in favor of a defendant to a cause of action whilst he is absent from the State; and this principle is not affected by the fact that the defendant may have been absent from the State when the cause of action first accrued against him; for whenever he departs from the State, after having come into it, the running of the Statute is suspended from that time and during his absence, whether the cause of action first accrued whilst he was in or whilst he was absent from the State.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to sustain the demurrer to the second defense in the additional answer, filed June 13, 1884, and for further proceedings.

Sereck P. SHALLCROSS et al.

1. There is no natural right to vote. Contributing to the support of the government may be made a condition of the privilege.

2. The exclusion of a person from the assessment list for twelve months on failure to pay his county poll-tax, in consequence of which he may be precluded from being qualified to vote during that year, is not a violation of Const., art. 4, § 1, which provides that a citizen otherwise qualified who has "within two years next before the election paid a county tax which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector," or of art. 1, § 2, which provides that "all elections shall be free and equal."

NOTE.—Citizenship; possession of political rights not essential to.

The possession of all political rights is not essential to citizenship under the protection of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. People v. De La Guerra, 49 Cal. 311.

A State may regulate the conditions and tenure of office. Spencer v. Board of Registration, 1 MacArthur, 103; Kannard v. Louisiana, 33 U. S. 400 (25 L. ed. 478).

A State may determine the class of inhabitants who may vote. The elective franchise is not a natural right nor an immunity of citizen. Van Valkenburg v. Brown, 43 Cal. 43; *United States v. Qualification of voters; Registration Law.

The registrar of an election precinct has power, under Idaho Revised Statutes, to administer the election oath, although he is not named among those having power to administer an oath, in the General Act. Territory v. Anderson (Idaho) March 22, 1892.

The Legislature has the right to authorize and require the registration of voters in a town or city. 9 L. R. A.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for New Castle County for the consideration of the Court of Errors and Appeals of an action brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted from defendant's depriving plaintiff of an opportunity of paying a county tax and thus of qualifying himself to vote at a general election. Judgment for defendants.

In February, 1895, the name of the plaintiff was, on a general assessment, duly placed upon the assessment list for the sixth ward of the City of Wilmington, and the Levy Court of New Castle County afterward, in the spring of the same year, duly laid a poll tax upon him. On the second day of March, 1896, the plaintiff, who had not paid said poll tax, was returned by the collector of county taxes for the collection district including the sixth ward of said city, to said levy court as a delinquent, and thereafter, on the 29th day of March in the same year, the defendants, composing and sitting as said levy court, allowed said poll tax but the regulation prescribed must be reasonable and impartial and calculated to facilitate and secure the constitutional right of suffrage, and not to subvert or injuriously restrain or impair the right. Stevens v. Albany (Ga.) March 10, 1890.

If the length of time between the closing of registration (which is made a qualification of voters at a municipal election) and the election is unreasonable, such election is void; and two months, in case of a special election of a mayor and aldermen, is unreasonable. Ibid.

The Georgia Statute making registration a qualification of voters at charter elections in the City of Albany restricts such qualification to elections for mayor and aldermen, and does not require registration as a qualification to vote at an election to ascertain whether two thirds of the qualified voters desire bonds of the city to be issued for the purpose of erecting a system of waterworks. Ibid.

The Legislature has the power to enact a law requiring qualified voters to be registered before the day of election as a condition of the exercise of their right of suffrage; and such a law may be local in its application. Com. v. McClelland, 33 Ky. 603.

It is not essential to the validity of a Registration Law that it should contain a provision for an examination, on the day of election, of the qualification of voters who, from sickness or other cause, have been prevented from registering. Ibid.

A residence of one year in a county, next preceding the election, by a male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, gives him a right under the Constitution to vote in any precinct of the county of which he may have been a resident for sixty days next preceding the election; and a Registration Law is not valid if it requires other qualifications to entitle a person to register. Ibid.

An explanatory clause in the statute, inconsistent with the part complete in itself of which it is explanatory, may be stricken out without invalidating the statute. Ibid.

Male inhabitants residing in the State June 27, 1835, being made citizens of Michigan by the Constitution, although neither native-born nor naturalized, a law which compels registration of voters, and provides only for native-born or naturalized citizens, is not valid. Atty-Gen. v. Detroit (Mich.) 7 L. R. A. 29.

No Registry Law is valid which deprives the elector of his constitutional right to vote, by any as delinquent and caused the name of the plaintiff to be struck and dropped from the assessment list; whereby no tax was assessed or laid upon the plaintiff for the year 1888, and he was consequently deprived of all opportunity at any time to pay a county tax for that year and thereby qualify himself to vote at the general election in November of that year, although in all respects, save the payment of a county tax, qualified as an elector. The levy court had no evidence that the plaintiff was dead, or had left the State or the sixth ward of said city, or said collection district. The only evidence before said court was the collector's return of the plaintiff as "delinquent."

The action of the defendants in causing the name of the plaintiff to be struck and dropped from the assessment list and continuing to leave it off the same was in strict accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the Act entitled "An Act in Relation to the Collection of Taxes in this State," passed at Dover, April 10, 1878, and the provisions of section 9 of the Act entitled "An Act in Relation to the Duties of Assessors and of the Levy Courts in the Several Counties of the State," passed at Dover, April 9, 1872.

Section 1 of the Act of April 10, 1878, provides that, in the case of persons assessed and liable to pay poll taxes, upon the return of the collector in form and verified as therein provided, it shall be the duty of the levy court "to allow said collector as delinquencies the taxes uncollected by him, and the names of such delinquents shall be dropped from the assessment list by the levy court and shall not be placed thereon again for a period of twelve months from and after the date of such allowance."

Section 9 of the Act of April 9, 1872, provides that "it shall not be lawful for any assessor or any levy court, upon the personal application of anyone or otherwise, to place upon the assessment in any hundred the name of any person who, having failed to pay the county tax assessed against him or her for the preceding year, was returned and allowed as a delinquent until after the expiration of the twelve months from the time such allowance as delinquent was made by the levy court."

regulation with which it is impossible for him to comply. Ibid.

The Legislature cannot disfranchise legal voters without their own fault or negligence, in an attempt to prevent fraud. Ibid.

The Statute creating a system of registration for the City of St. Louis makes it the duty of the recorder of votes to provide a suitable registration book for each election precinct in the city, and these books are public records. It is declared a felony to allow a person's name to be entered therein without his taking the required oath. United States v. O'Connor, 21 Fed. Rep. 448.

"Qualified voters," as used in the Constitution of North Carolina, must be construed as embracing those whose competency has been passed upon in their admission to registration, as prima facie proof of the number, the list being open to correction for deaths, removals and other causes subsequently occurring, and perhaps for disqualifications existing at the time of registration, and error in admitting their names to the list. McDowell v. Massachusetts & S. Const. Co. 98 N. C. 514; Southerland v. Goldsboro, Id. 49; Duke v. Brown, Id. 127; Martham v. Manning, Id. 122.

The omission from the form of oath prescribed by the Code, and required of the voter, of the words "and laws of the United States," following the word "Constitution," and "laws of North Carolina not inconsistent therewith," following the same word in reference to the State, is immaterial. State v. Nicholson, 103 N. C. 401.

The registration must be accepted as the act of the officer, notwithstanding the irregularity and even if no oath was administered. Ibid.

The fact that a registration book was not kept open during the whole prescribed period will not render the election void, where it had been kept open for inspection. Ibid.

The board of registration acts in a quasi judicial character, and is exempt from personal liability for error of judgment without proof of malice or willful disregard of duty in refusing to register a duly entitled elector. Perry v. Reynolds, 1 New Eng. Rep. 567, 18 Conn. 357.

The registration books are prima facie evidence of the number of qualified voters in a town, but they are open for correction on account of deaths, etc., and perhaps for intrinsic disqualifications and errors in admitting persons to register. Martham

v. Manning, 98 N. C. 122; Goforth v. Rutherford 21 C. Co. 1d. 222.

Registry laws must be so construed as to reconcile their provisions to the unimpaired right of suffrage at elections. Daggett v. Hudson, 1 West. Rep. 724, 22 Ohio St. 542.

The Act (22 Ohio Laws, 222) requiring registration in all cases as a condition to the right of suffrage in certain cities is unconstitutional and void, being unreasonable. Ibid.

The General Assembly, under the general grant of legislative power secured to it by the Constitution, has power to provide by statute for the registration of voters, and to enact that all electors must register before being permitted to vote. Ibid.

Such an Act, however, to be valid, must be reasonable and impartial, and calculated to facilitate and secure the constitutional right of suffrage, and not to subvert, or injuriously, unreasonably or unbecomingly restrain, impair or impede the right. Ibid.

A person not yet a citizen of the United States is entitled, under R. L. Pub. Laws 1882, chap. 72, § 2, to register his name on or before the last day of December, provided he may become qualified to vote during the ensuing year by naturalization. Ward v. Joslin, 16 N. L. —.

Territorial Legislatures have the power to prescribe any reasonable qualifications of voters and for holding office, not inconsistent with the limitations of the United States statutes. Davis v. Benson, 122 U. S. 338 (23 L. ed. 377).

A man disqualified to vote by reason of conviction of a felony is guilty of illegal voting if he votes knowing that he has been convicted of such crime, although he does not know that he is not qualified to vote. Thompson v. State, 26 Tex. App. 61.

In Wash. T. Organic Act (U. S. Rev. Stat., § 600), providing that the qualifications of voters shall be as prescribed by the Legislative Assembly, provided that the right of suffrage shall be exercised only by adult citizens of the United States, the word "citizens" means only male inhabitants, and the Act of January 12, 1892, conferring the right of suffrage upon women, is void. Bloomer v. Todd (Wash. Ter.) 1 L. R. A. 111.

As to the right of voters to be registered, see note to Atty-Gen. v. Detroit (Mich.) 7 L. R. A. 22.

The defendants rely upon the foregoing provisions for the justification of their action in causing the name of the plaintiff to be struck and dropped from the assessment list and continuing to leave it off the same.

The plaintiff had not paid any county tax within the space of two years next preceding the general election in 1886.

This suit is an action on the case brought for the recovery of damages resulting to the plaintiff by reason of his having been deprived by the defendants of all opportunity of paying a county tax for 1886, and thereby qualifying himself to vote at said general election.

The questions reserved for the decision of this court are, first, whether or not the above provisions of the Legislation of 1878 are unconstitutional and void; and, secondly, if said provisions be unconstitutional and void, whether or not the defendants are personally liable in damages for their action in the premises.

Messrs. Edward G. Bradford, Levi O. Bird and Anthony Higgins, for plaintiff:

The provisions of the Legislation of 1878 upon which the defendants rely, considered as a fiscal regulation of the State, are unconstitutional and void.

The whole of a public burden cannot be thrown on a single individual, under pretense of taxing him.

The primary purpose of the provisions of the Legislation of 1878, upon which the defendants rely, was not the regulation of taxation, but the regulation of the elective franchise or its exercise, as such purpose is disclosed by the effect of the Statute.

Mors, John H. Rodney and George Gray for defendants.

Comogys, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The questions presented in the arguments of this case by the counsel of the plaintiff are many; but they are all within the scope of those made by the case stated, and questions reserved thereon, which, in effect, are whether the legislation of this State in 1878, set forth in counsel's briefs, is a valid exercise of legislative power, and, if not, whether the defendants are liable to the plaintiff in damages in his action.

In order to properly comprehend and decide the first question, it is necessary—at least I think it will be useful—to go back into the political history of the State, or rather of the territory of which it is composed, and ascertain what, down to the time of the Revolutionary War, was the law with regard to the suffrage, or right to vote for public officers at elections. Before doing this, it will be well that a proper understanding should obtain in regard to the participation of men in the government they are under, that is, the power of deciding by ballot, at elections held for that purpose, who shall administer public affairs.

It is not directly denied on behalf of the plaintiff—in fact, it is conceded—that the power to use the ballot is one of those derived from government, or the political society in which the elector resides. At the same time, the contention here is the outgrowth of the idea that the primary object of government is universality of electorate. It is, of course, entirely consistent with the hopes of most men, members of a political body (as one of the States of the Union) that every person recognized by society as acting ex jure should participate in the ballot; and all such, it is believed, are accorded that privilege. But in this State, as no doubt in most of the others, it is conferred only upon the condition of contributing to the support of the government. The paramount duty of organized society is not to make the use of the ballot "free" to every such person, but to provide the means for its own sustenance, which is done by taxation, and, after that, but altogether subordinate to it, however, to secure to the payer of taxes, not the mere taxable, the privilege, or "right," as it is generally called, to vote at elections. There is no natural right to vote. It is one conferred by a community at large upon certain of its members, which implies the power and authority to withhold it from others. The whole idea of our original government—that before 1776—was that only those who paid taxes should vote, not that all should vote, but only those who helped to support the government. It was a privilege conferred upon such, and such only. They were the freemen, out of whose body, in the public aggregate mass, the public officers, particularly the Legislative Council and Assembly, were to be chosen. Those who had real estate were rated upon it, and such as had not were assessed upon the poll.

It is a great mistake to suppose that the first law for a poll-tax, as alleged by plaintiff's counsel in argument, was the Act of 1796. The fact is that before William Penn came to America, to take possession of the territory granted him by Charles II. (March, 1681), he promulgated a "frame" of government for his Province of Pennsylvania, and a Code called "Laws Agreed upon in England," which latter defines those who are to be considered as freemen to use the ballot. In the language of the "frame," by the second clause or paragraph, the freemen were to choose the Provincial Council, and, by the fourteenth, the members of the General Assembly. There in, however, no definition therein of a "freeman." The date of this is the 25th of April (then the second month), 1683. On the following 5th of May, the latter rescript was passed, which in the second clause defines the term "freeman," used in the former and in the first clause of the latter, in the following words: "Second. That every inhabitant of said Province [Pennsylvania] that is or shall be a purchaser of one hundred acres of land, or upwards, his heirs and assigns, and every person who shall have paid his passage, and taken up one hundred acres of land at one penny an acre, and have cultivated ten acres thereof, and every person that hath been a servant or bondsman, and is free by his service, that shall have taken up fifty acres of land, and cultivated twenty thereof, and every inhabitant, artificer or other resident in the said Province that pays scot and lot to the government, shall be deemed and accounted a freeman of said Province, and every such person shall be, and may be, capable of electing, or being elected, representatives of the people in Provincial Council or General Assembly in the said Province." These documents are to be found in a compilation of the laws established by the Duke of York, and by the Penn government, also, made by authority of the State of Pennsylvania, labelled "Duke of York's Book of Laws, 1670-1683," and the "Charter and Laws of the Province of Pennsylvania, 1683-1700," pp. 98-101.

In the "Act of Union" by which the counties which now form this State were, by the desire of the inhabitants, annexed by Penn (who had become enfeoffed of them by deed of the Duke of York, who succeeded his brother, Charles II., as James II.) to his Province of Pennsylvania, those inhabitants were guaranteed to be governed by the same laws, and to enjoy the same privileges, in all respects, as the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, etc. Freemen in the counties were then the same as freemen in the Province; that is, those who paid "scot and lot," or "customary contribution laid upon all subjects according to their ability," as it is defined by the lexicographer, Bailey. The date is 7th of December, 1682. Id. 104. On the same date as the "Act of Union," Penn., "with the advice and consent of the deputies of the freemen of this Province and counties aforesaid" (the Delaware counties), enacted what is called "The Great Laws, or Body of Laws," by chapter 58 of which it is provided as follows: "And, that elections may not be corruptly managed, upon which the present and future good of the Province so much depends, be it," etc., "that all elections of members or representatives of the people and freemen of the Province of Pennsylvania, and territories annexed [now Delaware], to serve in the Assembly thereof, shall be free and voluntary, and that the elector that shall receive any reward or gift, in meat, drink, moneys or otherwise, shall forfeit his right to elect; and such person as shall give, promise or bestow any such reward, as aforesaid, to be elected, shall forfeit his election, and be thereby incapable to serve as aforesaid; and the Assembly shall be sole judges of the regularity or irregularity of the election of the members thereof." In chapter 127 following, it is enacted in these words: "And, to the end that due provisions be made to defray the requisite charges incident to the public business and service of this Province, and territories thereof, be it enacted," etc., "that the charges of each county shall be made up in open court by the respective magistrates thereof; and that every such court shall have, and hereby hath, power to assess and lay such taxes upon the county as shall defray the same, so that it be equal, and according to proportion; and that the one half of the said tax to be paid shall be raised upon land, the other half by the poll, on the male from sixteen to sixty years of age, and that all such persons who hold land within the Province and territories thereof, and do not reside therein, and so incapable of giving that attendance, and yielding that service, to the public, as those that live therein, shall pay to all public taxes for such lands so held by them one half more than residents pay for the same portion."

On the 20th of October, 1691, William and Mary took the government of the Province and territories (the Delaware counties) into their own hands. In this State, on dispossession of Penn., they appointed, as captain general and governor, Benjamin Fletcher; one of the first acts of whose administration was to procure the passage of a law for granting a penny in the pound to the sovereign, towards the support of the government under him. The fourth clause of the Act provides that the tax shall be a charge upon real and personal estate for a year only, and then declares that "all freemen within this Province and territories as have been out of their servitude by the space of six months, and shall not be otherwise rated by this Act, nor worth one hundred pounds, shall pay unto the use aforesaid the sum of six shillings per head, with a proviso that our chief proprietary and his late deputies shall not be assessed or otherwise chargeable by virtue of this Act." Id. 221, 222. By section 17 of this Act (the law about counties levies) it is provided that the grand jury shall present any sum necessary to be raised, either for the paying of any public debt, or other occasion for the public utility of the county, "and the justices [of the quarter sessions] to make the rate or assessment, which shall be raised in the same manner as moneys are by the sessions agreed to be raised for the support of the government, viz., after the rate of one penny per pound [upon property] and six shillings upon the poll." Id. 223.

William Penn was restored to the government of his Province and territories by William and Mary in the sixth year of their reign (31st October, 1698), and appointed his nephew, William Markham, his deputy, who, with the advice and consent of the council and representatives of the Province and territories, passed an Act or body of laws, the first clause of which, after the preamble, defines the term "freemen" (that is, those who were to vote for council and assemblymen), as follows: "That no inhabitant of this Province or territories shall have right of electing or being elected as aforesaid unless they be free denizens of this government, and are of the age of twenty one years of age or upwards, and have fifty acres of land, ten acres whereof are sowed and cleared, or be otherwise worth fifty pounds lawful money of this government, clear estate, and have been resident within this government for the space of two years next before such election." Id. 247.

By this law, Penn made the electoral qualification one entirely of property. In the second chapter of the enactment is "An Act for Raising the Rate of One Penny per Pound, and Six Shillings per Head, upon Such as are not otherwise Rated thereby, to be Employed by the Government for the Time being as is hereinafter Limited and Appointed;" the enacting section of which fixes the rate for housekeepers, and then provides that all males within this Province and territories of this Act who have been free of their servitude by the space of six months, and shall be above the age of twenty one years, being worth £78 and upwards, shall be assessed and pay after the rate of one penny per pound clear estate as aforesaid, and that such of the said males only as be not worth £78 shall pay six shillings per head.

In 1704 the separation between the territories and the Province took place; and thereafter they had separate legislative bodies, though under the lieutenant governors of the Penn proprietorship of the Province as long as the rule of the family lasted, that is, down to the Revolutionary War. The first declaration of those entitled to vote, of electing and being elected, after the separation was made by an Act of the 7th George II. (1730), passed by the then Lieutenant Gov. Patrick Gordon, "by and with the advice and consent of the representatives of the freemen of the said counties [New Castle, Kent and Sussex on Delaware], in General Assembly met," etc., which in its sucand section confers the suffrage to property holders by this language: "Provided, always, that no inhabitants of this government shall have right of electing or being elected as aforesaid unless he or they be natural born subjects of Great Britain, or be naturalized in England, or in this government, or in the Province of Pennsylvania, and unless such person or persons be of the age of twenty two years or upwards, and be a freeholder or freeholders in this government, and have fifty acres of land or more well settled, and twelve acres thereof cleared and improved, or be otherwise worth forty pounds lawful money of this government clear estate, and have been resident therein for the space of two years before such election." 1 Laws Del. 146.

There is no other Act relating to the qualification of elector in the colonial period. In the year 1797 an Act of the General Assembly of the State was passed which established a different rule from that then prevailing for assessing the polls of freemen, that is, the personal rate. This fixed it at not more than £1,000, of the then currency, nor less than £200. This is the Act erroneously supposed to have first created the poll tax. Hall's Dig. Laws Del. 800.

In the Revision of 1862 the phraseology is changed, the highest rate of poll tax being $2,700, the equivalent of £1,000, and the lowest $140, the virtual equivalent of £50, Delaware currency. Such is the law of the State at this day.

From this review of the law which has always prevailed here in regard to the qualification of voters, two things seem to be clear—that is, that the right to vote was conditional altogether upon the payment of taxes previously assessed: "scot and lot," as tersely expressed in the homely but perfectly well understood language of the ancient enactments, and that the poll-tax was adopted 100 years, at least, before 1797, for those who had no property. Under the old system, there could be no privilege of voting by any without payment of tax, without each man paying his part towards the support of government. The theory then was that no man should enjoy the privilege of voting for public officers unless he paid for it, by adding the requirement of tax upon him to the general concession for the maintenance of the State. The privilege was conditional upon his doing that in some form, voluntary or by compulsion. "Pay your tax and you may vote," said the law; which shows that it was only upon compliance with a condition that a citizen could cast a ballot. All arguments, therefore, which are the offspring of any notion of inalienable right, sacred right, indefeasible right, have no place in this discussion. The right to vote was, in the old time as now, conditional upon several things,—citizenship, majority of age, payment of county rates and levies. It was and is but a privilege or right sub conditione; and those who fixed the terms of it were strangers to any other idea than quid pro quo,—"scot and lot." Such modern ideas as manhood suffrage (if by that he meant a suffrage because of full age), ballot for all and slavery without the ballot, were properly left to be evolved out of the consciousness of visionary theorists, with aspirations for a state of society dreamt of only by those who would substitute our poor humanity for the great Creator.

The law of 7th George II. (1736), continued, as that fixing the qualification of voters, until the Constitution of the State, of 1792, was made; for that of the 20th September, 1776 (1 Laws Del. App. 83), expressly provides that "the right of suffrage in the election of members for both Houses shall remain as excluded by law at present," etc. Article 5.

In the former the right is thus defined. Article 4, §1: "All elections of governor, senators and representatives shall be by ballot; and, in such elections, every white freeman of the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State two years next before the election, and within that time paid a state or county tax, which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector, and the sons of persons so qualified shall between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two years, be entitled to vote, although they shall not have paid taxes." Const. 1792 (1 Laws Del. 86).

The latter clause of the article was a new feature introduced into the canon of electoral qualification. In the year 1831 a state convention was held to revise the Constitution of 1792. By it, elections were made biennial instead of annual, and the electoral qualification was modified by this language: "In such elections every free white male citizen of the age of twenty-two years or upwards, having resided in the State one year next before the election, and the last month thereof in the county where he offers to vote, and having, within two years next before the election, paid a county tax which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector; and every free white male citizen of the age of twenty-one years and under the age of twenty-two years, having resided as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote without payment of any tax: provided, that . . . no idiot or insane person or pauper, or person convicted of a crime deemed by law a felony, shall enjoy the right of an elector," etc. Rev. Code 1874, pp. 82, 83.

This change extended the time for payment of tax to two years before the election, to conform it to the biennial system of elections; allowing all men between twenty-one and twenty-two, having the residential qualification, to vote without payment of tax, confined the tax to county rates and excluded the insane, paupers and persons convicted of felony. This constitutional qualification continues in force to this day,—nearly sixty years from the time of its enactment. Under the old system of taxation provided in the 6th section of the "Act Concerning the Levy Court," etc. (Hall's Dig. 576), the general rate of persons and personal property continued for six, and the assessment of real estate for twelve years. Afterwards the former was reduced to four years (Rev. Code 1874, p. 86), and by a subsequent amendment that of real estate, which before had been first twelve and then eight years, was reduced to four also (13 Laws, chap. 264), so that the assessments of persons and personal property, and of real estate, are now uniform as to duration.

By the law in force prior to the year 1862, upon the allowance by the levy court to a collector, in its settlement with him at the March session, of a party upon his duplicate as a delinquent, the practice was to drop his name from the assessment list; and it remained off until the next general assessment of persons and personal property, when it was restored. This was in virtue of the rule that a condition once shown to exist is presumed to continue until the contrary be established. If the Statute had not provided that there should be a general assessment of persons and personal property (quantum satis), the name would have remained off the list until the delinquent had himself applied to have it restored, which would not, of course, have been done without some proof that the condition no longer existed, and, in accordance with this presumption, a collector was allowed two years to collect the taxes on his duplicate (copy of the assessment list, with calculation of tax), and no more. Then the tax was treated as extinguished entirely. Hall, Dig. 890.

But it was discovered that collectors, in their zeal to promote the interest of the political party to which they owed their appointment, were in the habit, after the expiry of the two years, of allowing the taxes more than two years old of delinquents on their own sides, or on any other side, provided they would vote the ticket of the collector's party, to be paid, with a view of qualifying them to vote. As the collector's receipt was evidence of right to vote, there was no gain saying it, without resort to the records of the levy court, which was impracticable. To prevent this fraud upon the Election Law, which contemplated, not the payment of taxes allowed as delinquent, and thus extinguished in fact, but payment of existing rates, the Legislature, at the session of 1843, passed an Act entitled "An Act to Amend the Election Laws of the State of Delaware," in the following words (Act 9th vol. 545): "Whereas, it is highly important to preserve the elections in their purity, and to secure the confidence of the people in the integrity of those who conduct them, therefore, . . . Sec. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that, for the purpose of preventing frauds by the pretended receipt of old taxes, and by the antedating of receipts for tax, that no collector in this State shall collect any tax upon his duplicate after two years from the date of his warrant, but that after the lapse of two years from such date every such tax shall be extinguished, and no collector shall have power to give a receipt therefor. And it is hereby further enacted and declared that every tax which shall have been returned and regularly allowed by the levy court as delinquent shall be, and the same is, utterly extinguished, and no collector, or other person in his name, shall have power to collect the same, or give a receipt therefor, and any receipt given for such tax shall be void; and if any collector shall receive any such tax, or give a receipt therefor, contrary to the provisions of this section, or shall fraudulently antedate or postdate any tax receipt, or shall use any other fraud in giving such receipt, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by indictment, shall forfeit and pay to the State a fine of $100, and shall also forfeit and pay to any person who will sue for and recover the same the further sum of $100, with costs of suit. The levy court shall examine and settle the delinquent lists of each collector at its meeting in March every year, and make allowance of delinquents. Upon the allowance of any delinquency, the name of such delinquent shall be struck from the assessment list, and also from the collector's duplicate, and shall not be again restored until the delinquent is again lawfully assessed. Sec. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the assessors for each hundred in this State, in the year 1844, and in every year thereafter, shall make and complete the assessment for their respective hundreds by the 15th day of January, and shall, on or before the 28th day of said month, publish, by posting in at least five of the most public places in such hundred, a list of the names of the persons assessed, arranged in alphabetical order, setting down separately the amounts assessed as real, personal and capitation, or poll, tax and carrying out the aggregate amount so assessed against each name, and shall at the same time, and at the same places, and in the same manner, give notice that they will attend at the place of holding the general election in such hundred on the last Saturday in said month, from the hour of ten o'clock A. M. until the hour of five o'clock P. M., for the purpose of correcting any errors which may then be shown to him by any resident of such hundred in his assessment, and for the purpose of assessing any such resident as he may have omitted. And additions to, and corrections of, the said assessment lists, may also be made by the levy court and court of appeal in session at any stated or regularly adjourned session of the said court before the first day of April in any year. No assessment shall be made after the last day of March, nor shall any alteration of the assessments be made after that time, except in the lawful allowance of delinquencies. If any assessor, collector, clerk of the peace or other person, shall fraudulently add to, or take from, the said assessments, as finally settled by the levy court at its last session in March, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by indictment, shall forfeit and pay to the State a fine of $500. . . ."

The preambles to the first and second sections show the motive and purpose of the Legislature, the latter being that above ascribed to it. As corroborative of the allegation above made, that the payment of existing rates by a party offering to vote was contemplated, it is only necessary to refer back to the Statute already cited from Hall's Dig. 573, where, near the close of the 4th section, will be found this language in relation to the returns of the assessors of the assessments, correction of them by the court, etc.: "And, in the year in which a general rate of persons and valuation of personal property only shall be returned, the list (assessment list) shall contain the names, in alphabetical order, of all the persons upon the assessment list of the hundred whose personal property shall be valued, or personal rate imposed; and such list shall specify the personal rate, and the number of slaves, and their valuation, and the valuation of the personal property, and the total amount of the rate and valuation, and in all other years (i. e., years other than those of general assessment of persons and personal property, then six years apart] the list shall contain only additions or alterations that shall have been made to or of the assessment list of the hundred," etc. By the 6th section of the same Act it is provided "that the assessor of each hundred shall annually rate the persons of those liable to such rate, who have arrived to the age of twenty one years since the making of the assessment of the preceding year, or who shall come to reside in the county, or who shall before have been omitted, and personal property acquired by bequest," etc. Here there is no provision for the restoration of delinquents to the assessment list. Having been dropped from the general list by the uniform usage of the levy court, by force of the presumption quoted, they were not to be again rated until a new general assessment was made. The legality of the practice was unquestioned. The objection to one offering to vote, that he was not on the "levy list," as it was called in common speech, was fatal to his application, unless he could show, before the Constitution of 1881, the payment of a state or county tax within a year which had been assessed six months before the election at which he offered to vote, or, since that time, the payment within two years of a county tax assessed six months also before the election. The purpose of the Act of 1848 was to expressly require what had been always theretofore held to be the law with respect to delinquents, with that, in addition, of preventing the pretended receipt of old taxes, etc. The theory had always been, without dispute, to that time, by the men of any party, that delinquency was exclusion from the assessment until another general assessment of persons and personal property was made, when the law required that they should be put on the list again.

The Act of 1848 stood unchallenged upon the statute book until the year 1847, when a supplement to it was passed, the second section of which provides as follows: "That it shall be the duty of each of the assessors of this State, in the annual assessments for their respective hundreds, according to the law of this State, to assess all such persons as may have been returned and allowed as delinquents at any session of the levy court preceding the period fixed by the Act to which this is a supplement, for the completion of his assessment provided, such persons reside at the time in the hundred for which he is assessor. And any resolution or order of the levy court, in either of the counties of this State, adverse to the provisions of this Act, be, and the same is hereby, declared null and void, and any practice authorizing the said assessors to omit the assessment of such delinquents until the period of the assessment of persons and personal property next following the time when such persons shall have been allowed as delinquents be, and the same is hereby, directed to be discontinued." Vol. 10, p. 171. Though not doing so in terms, this Act virtually repealed that portion of the original Act of 1848 which provided differently with respect to delinquents, but there is no suggestion or hint in it that the repealed feature of the latter Act was in any sense hostile to the constitutional provisions concerning the privilege of suffrage. It therefore should be treated rather in the light of a revenue provision. At the session of 1881 an Act was passed entitled "An Act to Extend the Rights and Privileges of Poor White Taxables within the State." It is in the following words (Act 10, vol. 510): "Whereas, the present law of this State, requiring the names of delinquent taxables to be stricken from the assessment lists, does, in substance, treat poverty as a crime amounting to disfranchisement; and whereas, it may, and frequently does, happen that, from sickness or other misfortune, poor persons become temporarily unable to pay the public taxes assessed against them, who are nevertheless good and worthy citizens, and willing at all times, when able, to pay the public charges against them, and that the inability to pay in any particular year is no proof that such inability will exist the succeeding year; therefore: Section 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware, in General Assembly met, that from and after the passage of this Act the allowances of delinquent lists in the several counties of this State shall be deemed, taken and held to have no other design or effect than the crediting of the accounts of the several collectors for the time being with the several amounts by them respectively returned as the assessments against said delinquent taxables, and that, after being so allowed and credited as aforesaid, the same shall all be again placed on the duplicates of the collectors of the several counties for the succeeding year, except such as are returned as being dead or removed from the State. Sec. 2. And be it further enacted that the Act entitled 'A Supplement to the Act Entitled "An Act to Amend the Election Laws of the State of Delaware,"' passed at Dover, February 16, 1847, and so much of the second section of the Act entitled 'An Act to Amend the Election Laws of this State,' passed at Dover, February 27, 1848, as relates to the striking the names of delinquent taxables from the assessment lists and the collectors' duplicates, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, made null and void."

This Act had its inspiration in the desire of the political party which at the preceding general election of representatives, etc., had attained the power through a split in the party dominant since 1800, to increase its voting strength, the delinquent taxables having been always chiefly of their political. It was not the offspring of any sentiment that prior legislation with respect to delinquents was in derogation of the electoral right, but grew out of the natural wish to magnify the electorate as to enable the party then in power to remain there. It is true, the preamble has language that would warrant a different view; but it is well known that it was used simply rhetorically, to promote the passage of the Act. If any of the tax laws had been suspected even of infringing the constitutional right of suffrage, the party which passed the Acts now under consideration would have brought them to the bar of judicial decision to be annulled; for their interest, for the reason above given, made them necessarily hostile to them. The law just quoted remained undisturbed until the Legislature of 1870, which gave rise to this controversy. That legislation has provoked much criticism and animadversion; yet it is not much more, so far as delinquent taxables are concerned, than a revival of the Act of 1848, prepared by the then attorney general of the State, the late Chief Justice Gilpin. From the known care and caution with which his legal action generally was characterized, it is fair to suppose that he gave to the preparation all the consideration and reflection the subject required. Although the fact would not of itself justify a positive conclusion as to the validity of the law, yet it is much, in passing upon it, constitutionally considered, to know that the then first law-officer of the State put it forth with the sanction of his professional rank. As the present Assessment Laws are part of the legislation of 1878, it will be well to take a view of the law as it was before that session. There being no other law for the registration of voters than the Assessment Laws, this is the more necessary, the real contention being that the system of law under which we live, with respect to the electoral right, is repugnant to the Constitution of the State, or that of the United States.

I have already pointed out that in this State there are periodic general assessments of persons and personal property, as well as of real estate. Now they are, by modification of former law, to be made every four years; and now, as heretofore, annual assessments of persons and personal property, in addition to the general assessment, are to be made, for the purpose of including newcomers, persons who have arrived at age since the prior assessment, and personal property since acquired, and to correct omissions, etc. The "Act for the Valuation of Property" (Rev. Code, 84) provides for the periodic assessment of property and persons, but it was modified by chapter 394 of volume 18 so as to reduce the time for the duration of the assessment of real property to four years, thus securing a general assessment of all property once every four years. I have stated this before. There was also, by this Act, a provision for annual assessments, as above.

There was no change in these provisions made by the Act of 9th of April, 1878,—part of the legislation under consideration, but some new features were introduced for what would seem to be the purpose of securing to persons who ought to have the right to vote the means of protecting that right, and to prevent others from voting who ought not to be allowed to do so. The first section prevents the assessors from placing upon the assessment list, in addition to the names of those assessed for poll tax (all male citizens entitled to vote), the name of anyone not the owner in his own right of taxable property within the assessor's limits, unless he be satisfied, from personal knowledge, that he is of age, and a bona fide resident of the hundred or district, except as thereafter in the Act provided. The second section provides that, in ten days after making his assessment,—which, by section 16 of the chapter concerning assessors (Rev. Code, 78), he is to complete by the 1st day of January,—he is to post it, made alphabetically, in front of the most public places in his territory, and give notice in writing, either attached to it or otherwise, stating that he will attend at the place of holding the general election therein, on some day to be named in said notice, from 10 A. M.

until 5 P. M., to correct errors, and assess any who may have been omitted; and shall also state in the notice that persons desiring to be assessed must apply in person at the time and place mentioned therein, and furnish proof of identity, age and residence required by section 3 following. And it is provided in the same section that, if the assessor cannot complete the service on the day named, he may adjourn to the next or some subsequent day, not exceeding three days from that time, to be announced publicly to those present at the time of the adjournment. The third section not only makes it lawful but the duty of the assessor to place upon his assessment list the name of any person who may have been omitted, who shall appear before him at the time and place specified in the notice aforesaid, and prove his right to be assessed by the affidavit of some respectable freeholder of the county, according to the form of the affidavit given. The fourth section exacts a penalty against the assessor, of not less than $100, nor more than $500, to be recovered by indictment for the misdemeanor the offense is declared to be, of refusing or omitting to place the applicant making the aforesaid proof upon the assessment list, and also for placing on the list, knowingly, the name of any fictitious person, or person not at the time a resident of his territory. The fifth section provides that, in case the assessor is unable, from sickness or otherwise, to attend at the time and place stated in his notice, he shall appoint some other man for the purpose, and give notice thereof as in the second section is mentioned. The sixth section makes it unlawful for the levy court, or any member thereof, to take from the assessment list any names appearing thereon, or to add to any assessment returned by the assessor the name of any person, unless upon his personal application and proof so to be made, as aforesaid, before the assessor, of his right to be assessed. A violation of the above by a member of the court is made a misdemeanor, with penalty of a fine of from $100 to $500 on conviction. And, if the clerk of the peace (the clerk of the levy court) shall neglect to place upon the duplicate to be delivered by him to the collector any name on the assessor's list, he shall forfeit and pay to the person whose name is left off the sum of $10. This is to punish him; for the party's right to vote depends upon his assessment, and not on the correcting of the duplicate. The seventh section makes the offense a misdemeanor, punishable by fine of from $100 to $500, by anyone who shall procure or cause to be placed upon the assessment list any person not entitled to be assessed, or any fictitious or fraudulent person. The 8th section makes it perjury to make a false affidavit under the Act. The 9th section makes it unlawful for any assessor or the levy court to place upon the assessment list of the assessor's hundred the name of any person who was returned a delinquent the year preceding, until after the expiration of twelve months from the time of the allowance of the delinquency by the levy court. The 10th section makes it the duty of the clerk of the peace to deliver to the sheriff in the month of August, in the year of holding the general election, an alphabetical list for each of the hundreds of the county of the delinquent list made and returned by the collectors at the March session of the levy court.

By the 10th section of the chapter next succeeding (chap. 13 of Collectors), each collector must, on the first Tuesday of March next succeeding the date of his warrant, render to the levy court a true account of all taxes it was his duty to collect, of all payments made and of all delinquents, and by section 1 of chap. 873 of vol. 14 of the Laws (Rev. Code, 90), it is made the collector's duty, within thirty days after he has received his duplicate, to give public notice by advertisements, posted in ten or more of the most public places of his territory, stating his place of business or residence, and his readiness to receive taxes, and it is also made his duty, in the month of January in each year, again to give public notice, as aforesaid, of at least ten days, said notice to state the times and places at which he will attend to receive unpaid taxes. It is then made the duty of the levy court, upon proof by the collector's affidavit filed in the office of the clerk of the peace, setting forth that he gave the notice required, and that, in accordance with the last required notice, he did attend at the time and place designated, and there remained for the space of five hours each day, for the period of at least three days, for the purpose of collecting the taxes aforesaid, to allow him as delinquencies the uncollected taxes; and then declares that the names of the delinquents shall be dropped from the assessment list by the levy court, and not be placed thereon again for the period of twelve months from the date of the allowance. The section is made applicable to persons liable to pay poll-tax alone; for the reason that those owning real property can always be made to pay by sale of their property, taxes being a prior lien thereon. It is true there is the ultimate remedy by imprisonment of the body in the case of mere poll-tax men; but it is never resorted to, the cost to the county of confinement in jail for a week, even, more than exceeding the tax. The second section provides that the notice shall be a sufficient demand upon taxables for their taxes, and a performance of the duty to make demand. By the law before (§§ 13, 15, chap. 13, Rev. Code, aforesaid), collectors could only proceed to sell property or imprison the body after ten days' demand, to be proved by his oath as competent evidence of that fact. By section 17, chap. 10, Rev. Code, p. 81, every assessor is required to return his assessment—which by the 10th section he is required to complete by the 1st day of January—to the levy court on the first Tuesday of February, and to attend the court on that day, and on the first Tuesday of March, and on such other days as the court may require, under a penalty of $30 to be recovered by indictment. This is to enable the court to perform its duty, mentioned in sections 13 and 15 in the chapter next cited. By section 11, chap. 8, Rev. Code, p. 63, the levy court is required to sit as a court of appeals on the first Tuesday of March of each year, and on such days and times thence next to said month ensuing as it shall be necessary to adjourn to, and examine the assessments returned by the assessors, and the corrections thereof and additions thereto that may have been made, and receive, hear and determine appeals against the same. By the 12th section the court have power, either upon their own examination or upon appeal, to make additions to and corrections of the assessment list; to call before them any person whose name ought to be on it, or who was omitted by the assessor, etc. By the 14th section, an assessment cannot be called in question anywhere than in the levy court; and the same, as it shall stand in that court, is conclusive. The 15th section provides that no assessment shall be made after the last day of March, and the 16th section, that, if any person shall fraudulently add to or take from the assessments as finally settled by the levy court, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined $500. The 31st section enacts that, at the meeting in March in every year, the court shall settle the delinquent list of each collector, and make allowances of delinquents, and upon such allowance the collector is to be credited with the amount thereof. Then there is the provision for the re-assessment of the delinquent, superseded by the Legislation of 1878.

I think I have now given—in brief in most cases, but in some verbatim et literatim—the provisions of law now in force in relation to the assessment and collection of taxes, and the allowance of delinquents, and the requirements when this is to be done. It will now be useful to compare the old with the present legislation, with a view of seeing what is the difference between them,—whether that difference does deprive the citizen of the right or privilege of the suffrage, it being contended by the plaintiff's counsel, not only that the new legislation was designed to disfranchise a certain class of voters, but that such is the necessary effect. Leaving out of view the question of design, which has no place in this discussion, the point to be decided is, Does the Legislation of 1878 necessarily impair the voting right of the citizen? It will be well, in this inquiry, to look at the state of things existing at the time it was passed, as contrasted with that it displaced.

Before emancipation of slaves, and the adoption of the 15th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, voting in Delaware was confined to white males of over twenty-one years, with the exceptions before given; and so steady and constant was our population everywhere, except in Wilmington, that such persons as were selected to be assessors were usually acquainted personally with nearly all the voting class. It was for this reason, no doubt, that the law made no requirement of notice by the assessors that they were about to proceed, or would proceed, to make the assessment. At the February Session of the levy court, the assessments were returnable, and, by the practice of the court and the law, they were liable to correction by the levy court, in order to perfect them. But the March Term was an appeal term from assessments, at which any person aggrieved at not being assessed at all, or who, or whose property, was unfairly assessed, could appear before the court and obtain redress. When the levy court had made an examination of the assessment list, and corrections in them, at the February Term, it was the duty of the clerk of the peace, by the 20th of that month, to make copies of the hundred lists, and post them for public inspection, with notice of the holding the court of appeal. Section 27, chap. 9, Rev. Code (Hall's Dig. 876).

This publication was the first formal notice to the public of the assessments, and then they had been completed by the assessors. No further notice was given in relation to assessments. On or before the first Tuesday of April following, it was the duty of the court to issue to the collectors duplicates of the assessment lists, with the taxes assessed upon them, together with warrants for their collection, and it was that of the collector, before proceeding to collect his taxes by legal process, to make ten days' previous demand for them. But other notice to the taxpayers there was none. Doubtless it happened, in many cases, that parties were returned delinquent who had never been called upon for their taxes at all, their only notice being that given by the clerk of the peace, as above required, in the publication of the assessment lists. I have already pointed out that, under the old system, prior to the Act of 1843, when a person was returned a delinquent, his name was dropped from the assessment then existing, and have ascribed the practice to the maxim specified. Under it, therefore, if he was returned a delinquent, and allowed as such by the levy court at the March Session next after the year when the assessment was returned, he was off during the residue of the duration of the assessment (then six years), and after it was changed, then the residue of four years. But it was found that many names were restored in some way surreptitiously, which operated to allow the delinquent class, or such of them as the dominant party needed in their service, to vote when their ballots were in requisition, and escaped paying their taxes at other times, thus defeating the requirement of paying "scot and lot," or taxes whenever assessed, as the distinction of a freeman. This Law of 1843 broke up that fraud, or was intended to do so, and required, in terms, that the delinquent's name should not only be dropped, but that it should not go upon the list again until he was again lawfully assessed, which, by the restrictive effect of the provision in the old Statute for annual assessments could not be done until there was a general assessment of persons. In 1847 an Act was passed, the second section requiring the re-assessment of delinquents in the annual assessments. They then were made to stand upon the same footing as persons before omitted. The first section required the delinquent list to be returned by the collectors on the first day of the annual March Term, and prohibited allowance of it by the levy court for five days after return, and secured the public right to inspect it, by indictment of the members of the levy court, or the clerk of the peace, as the case might be, refusing to allow such inspection upon application. Vol. 10, p. 171.

That Act was repealed by that of 1851, before quoted, which provided that the effect of allowance of delinquency should only be to credit the collector with the tax, and required that the name of the delinquent should be again put upon the collector's duplicate. It also repealed expressly so much of the Act of 1843 as required the dropping the name of a delinquent from the assessment list, though that was done by implication. The Act of 1843, by the expression of purpose contained in the second section, shows a motive for putting the provision with respect to delinquent taxes, and to dropping delinquents from the tax-list. It did its work very effectively, so that taxes had to be paid. The condition upon which the elective franchise was to be enjoyed had to be performed, for the legal presumption prevailed.

In the political campaign of 1846, when the dominant party lost its candidate for governor, a fierce assault was made upon it, and chiefly because of the Act of 1843, and the manner in which that law dealt with delinquents. The Legislature, however, was not lost, and accordingly, at the session following the election, the Act of 1847 was passed, which was repealed, as has been stated, by that of 1851, when the power of the party in the Legislature passed into the hands of its opponent. The legislation upon the subject of delinquents was a game of politics, but no one doubted that it was one which might be lawfully played. It did not put it out of the power of any man, really or practically, to obtain and retain the right to vote, but only aimed at compelling him to perform the condition for its exercise as other people had to do who owned property,—pay the county taxes.

The party which passed the Act of 1851 lost its ascendancy in the Legislature at the election of 1859, but retained its majority in the Senate. Of course, there was no prospect of repealing that which had been so great a desideratum with it,—on whose side the great body of the delinquents was. At the election of 1864 a totally new party came into power, and by what was then a large majority. Both branches of the Legislature were of its members,—the House entirely, and two thirds of the Senate. It was a very strong party, and had no need to concern itself with legislation about delinquents. A great mistake of legislation made at that session so shattered its ranks that the political power of the State passed away from it utterly, and the party itself practically disbanded. Such result restored to power the makers of the Legislation of 1851, which, suiting the dominant party perfectly, remained in force until it was repealed by that of 1873. By the latter, the provision contained in the Law of 1843 for dropping the name of a delinquent from the list, was re-enacted; and by the Assessment Act (14 Laws Del. chap. 371, Rev. Code, p. 88), passed at the same session (on the day preceding the Delinquent Act), or 14 Laws Del. chap. 372, Rev. Code, p. 90, assessors were forbidden to assess a delinquent "until after the expiration of twelve months" from the time allowance as delinquent was made by the levy court. Why was the Act of 1843 practically revived, as to dropping delinquents from the assessment list? That question has been answered before by what was said with respect to the necessity claimed for the Legislation of the 9th of February, 1873. An immense number of voters, and many of them emigrants from the south, had been added, by the 15th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to the political ranks of the State. Almost all of these new voters were obscure persons, without any means whatever of a tangible nature to pay their taxes; and it was soon developed that they would content themselves with paying in the year of voting, and not in an "off year," as it was called. They were not, the most of them, persons whom the stigma of delinquency prompted to the avoidance of it by paying every year. It was grossly unjust to those who had property of an assessable nature, and could not, if they desired, escape the payment of "scot and lot," and to others having none, but with manliness above taking advantage of a too liberal statute, and paying biennially, that this state of things should continue. Accordingly, the Legislation of 1878, both for assessment of persons and the collection of taxes, and allowance of delinquents and disposition of them, was passed. I say accordingly, for its obvious import is as I have described it to be. If there was any other motive for adopting it than to secure the better payment of taxes, it does not appear on the face of it, nor are we warranted in inferring it. A court cannot look behind the plain features of an Act of Assembly perfectly simple in itself to hunt for some secret purpose, unless such necessarily exists, as shown by the operation of the Act itself.

The plaintiff's counsel contend that the object of the Legislation of 1878 was the disfranchisement of voters, and that its effect has been to deny the ballot to citizens who should exercise it. In order to make their point good, they have given the court an example to show how a voter is by the law deprived of his right to vote. But the example is impossible, except upon an assumption that the party having the right to vote is defeated, or deprived of it, in spite of his efforts to enjoy it. This is pure assumption; the fact being that the law cannot operate without the co-operation or consent of the complaining party. If he desire to vote at elections, he has nothing to do but see to it that his name is kept upon the assessment list, and it will be retained there; and he will have the right to vote because of that, according to the Constitution, if he will keep up, like other people in like case, the payment of his tax. If he fail to pay within two years of the election he cannot vote, by the Constitution, and ought not to vote. He who will not contribute his part to support the government that protects him ought not to be allowed, by the use of the ballot, to neutralize the vote of another who does. And he who will not give himself the trouble to see that he is assessed sleeps upon his rights; and for him the maxim, non dormientibus et vigilantiibus, locus subest, has appropriate application.

Treating the suffrage as a valuable political right, to be exercised conscientiously and intelligently, and for the public, rather than the welfare of a party, it would have been much better for the State if that feature of the Act of 1848 which provided for dropping from the assessment lists those returned delinquent had been re-enacted in the Act of 1878; for it is not true that delinquency is the effect of poverty. There are none so poor that they cannot pay their poll-taxes, which for them is "scot and lot," less than two days' hire out of the wages of the common laborer being sufficient for that purpose. Labor everywhere, and always among us, is in demand. There is no hardship upon any in requiring him to pay his taxes, which in this State are county taxes alone, there being no general state tax of any kind. Men who live by their labor, or without work, who have no property, are assessed for a poll so low as to be almost insignificant. It is not poverty that creates delinquency, but a want of appreciation of the moral and political nature of the franchise, which privilege is prized by many white men, and the mass of the colored, simply because it enables them to get money by the sale of it. The notorious practice of purchasing votes by all parties here, as well as in other States, attests the truth of this assertion, and justifies the opinion expressed before about the re-enactment of the feature referred to in the Act of 1848. That Act was not repealed, as has been said, because it was deemed unconstitutional; but the real purpose of it was to relieve the party just then accidentally in power from the burden of paying the taxes of their proletariat.

Taxes being necessary to the support of government, a State has the right to adopt any measure short of actual disfranchisement to compel their payment. No one doubts the validity of the provision in our Statute for imprisonment of nonpaying taxpayers. Would the law be unconstitutional because the collector might choose to take the ultimate course, — upon the eve of an election to shut up in jail nonpaying citizens to whom it applied? Why would it not be? Simply because imprisonment is an extreme remedy for nonpayment of liabilities, as old as the law. Then, if such a provision be valid, why is not that for dropping from the assessment list for twelve months valid? Such an imprisonment as mentioned would effectually cut off, pro hoc vice, the suffrage right, whereas the dropping from the list would, under the circumstances pointed out by the plaintiff's counsel, do nothing more; and in that case the dropping could not be otherwise taken than as done by the voter's consent, who had almost a whole year in which to pay his poll-tax, and thus save himself from delinquency. If the operation of the Legislation of 1878 was, pro hoc vice, to disfranchise a voter, by preventing him from paying his taxes as others are obliged to do, there will be force in the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, but, as it does not so act, and never at all except as a consequence of his own neglect, which many others in like condition of circumstances in life do not suffer themselves to be guilty of, it cannot be charged to the law that he loses temporarily the privilege of voting, but only to his own inattention to his opportunity to retain it. He has simply omitted a duty he owed to himself, and to the public, — if such persons can be supposed to be under any obligation to the body politic, — and deserves all the consequences resulting from his indifference to his interest. Without it can be shown, which it was not, and cannot be (and that fact seemed to embarrass the learned counsel in their elaborate argument), that the Legislation of 1878 disfranchises a voter in spite of himself, or takes some advantage of him against which he had no means of protecting himself, it is too much to ask this court to avoid it as unconstitutional, and a violation of the Organic Law of this State.

It seems not necessary to say more than this

In regard to the objection to the legislation on the ground of its alleged hostility to the 14th and 15th Amendments of the Constitution of the United States,—that in this State every man, rich or poor, black or white, has the equal protection of the laws at all times, whether he be a legal voter or not, the ability to vote being no more necessary to secure that protection in his case than in that of women and minors, who, and whose property, are as much under the shield of the law's protection as is that of any man, great or small. A delinquent taxable is as much safeguarded in his personal rights as is he who owns houses and land. The notion that the right to exercise the suffrage is, in Delaware, necessary for the protection of one's person or property, is purely fanciful, and without any reality of reason. The 15th Amendment was meant to secure the right to vote to colored people, and has done it everywhere. Their delinquency generally as taxpayers, or failure to become assessed, is not the fault of the Statute, and cannot properly be charged against it. To hold the Assessment Act void as in conflict with that Amendment would be a strain of interpretation which would seem to be repugnant to plain common sense.

Grubb, J., concurring:

This case is before us upon questions reserved and directed to be heard in this court upon a case stated in an action on the case in the Superior Court in and for New Castle County, for the recovery of damages resulting to the plaintiff by reason of his having been deprived by the defendants, when acting as members of the levy court of said county, of all opportunity of paying a county tax for the year 1886, and thereby qualifying himself to vote at the general election in that year. It is shown by the record, and admitted, that the plaintiff is a white male person, and was, in all respects, except as to the payment of a county tax, qualified to enjoy the right of an elector in this State at said election. It is also admitted that he was duly assessed and rated for a poll tax for the year 1885 in the north collection district of Wilmington hundred; that the warrant for the collection of said tax was duly issued to Patrick Neary, the collector for said district; and that the said collector of taxes, having given the notices prescribed by law, and having attended, and remained in attendance, pursuant to said notices, and conformably with the statutory requirements for the collection of said tax, duly returned the plaintiff to the levy court of said county, on March 2, 1886, as a delinquent,—the plaintiff not having paid his poll tax to him as such collector. It is also admitted that the plaintiff was not dead, and had not left the State, and that the said levy court had no evidence on the subject before it except the collector's return of the plaintiff as delinquent, and his affidavit, verified by his oath, and filed as prescribed by law, of his having, prior to said return, given the notices, and attended and remained in attendance, as aforesaid. It is also admitted that subsequently, on March 29, 1886, the said levy court did allow to the said collector the said poll tax of the plaintiff, and did cause the name of the plaintiff to be struck and dropped from the said assessment list, whereby no tax was assessed or laid upon the person of the plaintiff for the next ensuing year (1886), and the plaintiff was deprived of any and all opportunity, at any time thereafter, to pay a county tax for the said year (1886) then next ensuing, and thereby of the right to qualify himself as an elector to vote at the general election in said county held on Tuesday, November 2, 1886. It is further admitted that the plaintiff had paid no tax, under any preceding assessment, within two years of and prior to said election. The defendants justify their action in dropping and striking the name of the plaintiff from said assessment list, and in failing to levy a tax on him for the year 1886, under the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act in Relation to the Collection of Taxes in This State," passed April 10, 1873, being 14 Laws Del. chap. 373, and also under the provisions of section 9 of an Act entitled "An Act in Relation to the Duties of Assessors and of the Levy Courts in the Several Counties of This State," passed April 9, 1873, being 14 Laws Del. chap. 371, and the defendants also claim that they cannot be held personally liable in damages for their action as members of said levy court, while, on the contrary, the plaintiff claims that the provisions of said Acts under which the defendants justify their action as aforesaid are unconstitutional and void, and that the defendants are personally liable to him for their said action.

In this connection, it is important to note that the plaintiff does not complain that he was deprived at any time of the opportunity to pay his tax for 1886, either before or after he was returned and allowed as a delinquent as to said tax, and thereby of the right to qualify himself as an elector at said election. He rests his case, as the record shows, exclusively upon his exclusion from the assessment list for 1886, and from all opportunity to pay a tax for that particular year. His suit is instituted for damages for his non assessment for 1886, by reason of the "dropping" of the plaintiff from the assessment list of 1885, and his exclusion from the assessment list of 1886 by the defendants pursuant to the express requirements of the provisions of section 1, chap. 373, and of section 9, chap. 371, vol. 14, aforesaid. It is not instituted because of the "extinguishment" of his tax for 1885 pursuant to the express requirements of the provisions of section 18, chap. 12, Amend. Code (enacted prior to said Acts of 1873), whereby he was prevented from paying said tax at any time prior to the said election of 1886. Therefore, all objections urged at the argument against the validity of said provisions of the Acts of 1873 on the ground that the plaintiff was not permitted to pay his tax for 1885 at any time up to the said election, and was thereby precluded from obtaining a receipt therefor, as the evidence of his being qualified to vote thereat, are not pertinent to the present inquiry. Consequently, the determination of that question upon this occasion would be obiter dictum in the case before us. The real question in the case is whether or not the provisions of the Acts of 1873, requiring the exclusion of the plaintiff in March, 1886, from assessment for that year as a poll taxable, because he was, in said month, returned and allowed as delinquent for 1898, are unconstitutional, and not whether the provisions of section 18, chap. 12, Amend. Code, requiring the extinguishment of the tax of such delinquent, are or are not so. Accordingly, the questions actually reserved for the decision of this court are: First, whether or not the said provisions of the Acts of 1878, considered with reference to the case of the plaintiff as presented by the record, are unconstitutional and void; and, second, if said provisions be so whether or not the defendants are personally liable to the plaintiff in damages for their action thereunder as members of the said levy court.

The first of these questions raises the following principal inquiries. First Are said controverted provisions of the Acts of 1878, in their primary purpose and design, a regulation of the assessment and collection of county taxes, or a regulation of the qualification of electors? Second. If the former, are they a legitimate and appropriate exercise of the taxing power, that is to say, in accord with the inherent nature, essential characteristics and true meaning and purpose of taxation? Third. If they be such legitimate exercise of the taxing power by the General Assembly, are said provisions of the Acts of 1878 nevertheless unconstitutional and void because they have caused the plaintiff to be excluded from the assessment list for 1898, and, consequently, precluded him from being qualified to vote at the general election in that year? These inquiries necessitate the consideration of the said Acts of 1878, construed in connection with the pre-existing statutes of the State in force at the time of their enactment, and relating to the appointment, assessment and collection of taxes. They also require the true interpretation of the Constitution of this State in respect to the scope of the legislative authority in the exercise of the taxing power, as well as in regard to the nature of the elective franchise, with the view of ascertaining whether the latter is subordinate or paramount to the legitimate exercise by the Legislature of the taxing power for the purpose of raising, with regularity and certainty, the public revenue necessary for the support of government, and the promotion of the general welfare.

In the exercise of the power of taxation, the General Assembly has designated and empowered certain instrumentalities or agencies for the assessment and collection of county taxes. These are the levy courts and the assessors and collectors in the several counties. Their duties are prescribed, and their powers conferred, by statutory provisions which, in the legislative judgment, are deemed necessary and appropriate. The system of county taxation existing and in operation at the time of the enactment of the said Acts of 1878, under pre-existing statutory provisions then in force, was, substantially, as follows: In each county the assessors were required to assess, in the first instance, and the levy court to correct and complete the assessment of, all real and personal property not exempted by law, and all polls of every freeman above the age of twenty-one. A general assessment was to be made once in every four years, and a supplementary assessment annually. The assessor in each hundred or assessment district was required to complete his assessment by the 1st day of January in every year, and, after posting the same, and giving public notice as prescribed by law, to sit for the purpose of correcting any errors therein, or for the purpose of assessing persons omitted. Thereupon he must return his assessment to the levy court on the first Tuesday of February. It was made the duty of the levy court to sit as a court of appeal on the first Tuesday of March in every year, and such other days as should be necessary, to determine appeals against the assessments returned by the assessors, and to add to and correct the same, and to complete said assessments by the last day of March. Thereupon the levy court was required to ascertain the amount necessary to be raised by taxation for the year, and to apportion and lay the taxes for the same to and upon the assessments in the several hundreds at a certain rate upon every $100 of the said assessments, and also to cause to be issued, on or before the first Tuesday of April, to the collectors of taxes, respectively, a duplicate of the assessment list of his hundred or collection district, with a warrant thereto annexed.

By the provisions of chapter 12, Amend. Code, it was made the duty of every collector of county taxes to enforce payment of any tax unpaid, after due demand by him, by sale of the personal and real property of the taxable, and, in case he should be unable to find property sufficient therefor, he was authorized to enforce payment thereof by imprisonment of his body. The collector was required by section 10 of said chapter 12 to render to the levy court on the first Tuesday of March next after the date of his warrant a true account of all taxes it was his duty to collect, and of all the payments made, and of all delinquents.

By section 21 of chapter 8, Amend. Code, it was provided that "at the meeting in March in every year the levy court shall examine, adjust and settle the accounts of the collectors, making all just allowances, and the adjustment and settlement shall be final; and the court, if deemed expedient, may require other accounts from the collectors. They shall at the said meeting examine and settle the delinquent list of each collector, as well of state as of county taxes, and make allowance of delinquents; and upon such allowance the collector shall be credited with the amount thereof. The name of the delinquent, if he be dead, or have removed from the State, shall be struck from the assessment list, and also from the collector's duplicate; otherwise, it shall remain on the assessment, and be entered on the collector's duplicate for the succeeding year."

It was also provided by section 18 of said chapter 12 that "no collector, nor his executors or administrators, shall collect or receive any tax after two years from the date of the warrant. After that date it shall be extinguished. Nor shall he at any time collect or receive any tax allowed as delinquent, but the same shall be extinguished."

The foregoing system, and the statutory provisions relating to it, which are material to the present inquiry, are still in operation and full force, except so far as they have been modified by the Acts of 1873, which are, in their purpose and effect, merely amendatory and supplementary thereto.

Under the legislation prior to the enactments of 1873, provision was made expressly requiring the dropping of the names of those who had died or had removed from the State in any year from the assessment lists of the next ensuing year. But no such provision was made for the dropping also of the names of those who had been found by the collector to be incapable of paying any tax, or to be fictitious and non-existent, and therefore incapable of dying or removing from the State. Humanum est errare. In the nature of things, therefore, under said legislation, many such names would inevitably creep into and accumulate upon the assessment lists from year to year, for obvious reasons, in the administration, through human agencies, of a system which, though primarily designed for the raising of public revenue, yet also, incidentally, furnished the means for qualifying as voters,—especially for closely-contested elections,—by the payment of a county tax as prescribed by the Constitution of the State. But, unless the assessment of property and polls be accurate and reliable, it must necessarily follow that the tax rate based upon it for raising the amount of revenue needed in any year will be inadequate, and a deficit in the county treasury will consequently ensue.

The clear, explicit, unambiguous provisions of the Acts of 1873, throughout their entire extent and scope, disclose an unmistakable intention, and a pervading purpose, to supply the deficiencies of previous legislation, and secure a more accurate assessment of the property and polls in the several counties, in order to have a more exact basis for fixing an adequate rate of taxation in every year. Accordingly, the Act passed April 9, 1873, and entitled "An Act in Relation to the Duties of Assessors, and of the Levy Courts, in the Several Counties of this State," being 14 Del. Laws, chap. 371, makes express, explicit and very careful provision for the accomplishment of this purpose. It makes it unlawful for any assessor to place on the assessment list the name of any person who is not the owner of taxable real or personal property within his assessment district, unless he shall be satisfied, from personal knowledge, that such person is of lawful age, and is a bona fide resident of his district. It also requires every assessor, within ten days after completing his assessment list, to post the same as prescribed by the Act, and to give notice that he will attend, at the place, day and hours therein specified, to correct any errors in his assessment, and for the purpose of assessing any person who may have been omitted. He shall at the same time give notice that any person desiring to be assessed must apply in person before him, at the time and place mentioned in said notices, and prove his right to be assessed by the oath or affirmation of some respectable freeholder of the county that he (the applicant) is the identical person he represents himself to be, and known to said freeholder personally to be such, that he is twenty one years of age, and that he is a bona fide resident in the hundred and county of the assessor, and in the State of Delaware. If the assessor cannot complete the correction of his assessment on the day named in said notices, he may adjourn as prescribed in the Act. In case of inability, from any reason, to attend at the time specified in his notices, he shall appoint some other day, and give notice thereof in the same manner as aforesaid. The Act then, by express provisions, imposes severe penalties upon the assessor for the refusal or omission to place upon the assessment the name of any person who appears and makes proof, in the prescribed manner, of his right to be placed thereon. It also imposes penalties upon the assessor for knowingly placing upon the assessment any fictitious name, or the name of any person not at the time resident in the hundred or assessment district, and also upon any person who shall procure or cause to be placed upon the assessment in any hundred or assessment district the name of any person not entitled to be assessed in said hundred or district, or shall knowingly procure or cause to be placed thereon any fictitious or fraudulent name. It further provides "that it shall not be lawful for the levy court in either of the counties of this State, or any member thereof, to take from the assessment returned to the said levy court by any assessor the name of any person appearing thereon; nor shall it be lawful for such levy court, or any member thereof, to add to any assessment returned as aforesaid the name of any person, unless upon the personal application of such person, and upon proof of his right to be assessed" (§ 6), in the manner already stated; and for the violation of this provision a severe penalty is also imposed. The Act further provides, in section 9 thereof, "that it shall not be lawful for any assessor or any levy court, upon the personal application of anyone, or otherwise, to place upon the assessment in any hundred the name of any person who, having failed to pay the county tax assessed against him or her for the preceding year, was returned and allowed as a delinquent, until after the expiration of the twelve months from the time such allowance as delinquent was made by the levy court."

It is clear, beyond question, that the object of this Act was, through very specific provisions, enforced by positive penalties, to secure an accurate assessment, by excluding therefrom, in the first instance, so far as the assessors could detect them, and do so, all fictitious names, as well as the names of those who were disqualified for assessment for want of the prescribed age or residence. But it was manifest that, to make the assessment accurate, for the purpose of preventing a needless deficit, the lists must be purged, not only of these fictitious names which had escaped the vigilance of the assessors, and could subsequently be discovered by the collectors, but also of the names of all those whose tax the collector should find could not be effectually collected, even by means of legal process; in short, of those who should be ascertained to be unproductive as taxables. An Act auxiliary and supplementary to said chapter 371 was therefore needful. Accordingly, on the day next after the enactment of said chapter 371, the General Assembly passed an Act entitled "An Act in Relation to the Collection of Taxes in This State," being chapter 372, vol. 14, aforesaid. The provisions of this Statute are substantially as follows: Section 1 makes it the imperative duty of every collector of county taxes in each hundred or collection district in this State, within thirty days after he shall have received his duplicate list (in April of every year), to give public notice, in the manner prescribed in the Act, stating in such notice his place of residence or of business, and his readiness to receive taxes. They make it also his duty, in the month of January in each year, again to give public notice, as aforesaid, of at least ten days, which last mentioned notice "shall state the times and places at which such collector will attend for the purpose of receiving taxes then due and unpaid, and it shall be the duty of the levy court in every county, upon proof being made to them by the affidavit of the collector, verified by his oath or affirmation, and filed in the office of the clerk of the peace for the respective county, setting forth that he has given notice as required by this section, and that, in accordance with the notice last above mentioned, he did attend at the times and places designated in such notice for the reception of taxes, and did remain for the space of at least five hours in each day, and for the period of at least three days, in attendance, for the purpose of collection of taxes aforesaid, to allow said collector, as delinquencies, the taxes uncollected by him, and the names of such delinquents shall be dropped from the assessment list by the levy court, and shall not be placed thereon again for a period of twelve months from and after the date of such allowance." Section 1 also declares that these provisions shall apply to persons assessed and liable to pay poll tax. Section 2 provides "that the notices required to be given in section 1 of this Act by the collector aforesaid shall be deemed and taken to be sufficient demand upon taxables for the payment of taxes standing against them on the collector's duplicate of the several hundreds and collection districts of this State. Such notices, given as aforesaid, shall be considered a performance and full discharge of the duty of the collectors aforesaid to make demand for taxes; and they shall not be required thereafter to make further demand on any taxable for said taxes as a condition precedent to the employment of legal process as now provided by law for the collection of taxes." Section 3 makes it the duty of the collector to give receipt for taxes received, and, in addition to his signature, to make the impression of the seal (for which it makes provision) of the hundred or collection district of which he is collector upon all receipts given by him for county taxes. Sections 4 and 5 impose penalties upon the collector for using, or permitting the unlawful use of, said seal, and upon all others for counterfeiting said seal, or participating in the fraudulent use of the same. The salient feature of this Act is the mandatory provision that the levy court, upon the return of the collector's delinquent list, as provided by section 10, chap. 12, Amend. Code, and upon the evidence of his affidavit made and filed as prescribed in section 1 of the Act, shall allow said collector as delinquencies the taxes uncollected by him; and that the names of such delinquents shall be dropped from the assessment lists by the levy court, and shall not be placed thereon again for a period of twelve months from and after the date of such allowance.

Prior to the enactment of chapter 872, none but the names of delinquents who were dead or had removed from the State were permitted by law to be struck from the assessment list. All others were required to be retained thereon, and to be entered on the collector's duplicate for the next ensuing year. By the requirements of the foregoing provision of said chapter, therefore, in addition to the names of the dead, and of the removed from the State, the names of the fictitious which have been erroneously assessed by the assessors or the levy court, as well as of those whose taxes shall be found uncollectible by legal process, shall, when returned as delinquents by the collector, be dropped from the assessment, and shall not be placed thereon for the next ensuing year. The collector is thus made an efficient auxiliary in purging the lists of unproductive taxables, and securing an accurate assessment, thus preventing a deficit for the next ensuing year. Through the operation of section 1 of chapter 872, and of the penal provisions of section 9, chap. 871, the collector's return is made imperatively binding upon the assessors and the levy court. Each Act is therefore manifestly designed to operate in connection with the other as a component part of the pre existing county revenue system, and as amendatory of and supplementary thereto. The practical effect of their provisions is to make the collector exclusively the agent of the Legislature in its exercise of the taxing power; to ascertain and determine finally and conclusively, in the mode prescribed by law, whether or not those whom he shall return as delinquents will be productive taxables for the next ensuing year.

In addition to the foregoing, there are other important provisions of the Acts of 1872. They define with greater precision the duties of the county revenue officials, and prescribe specifically what shall be a performance and full discharge of duty in certain respects. In so doing, they relieve public functionaries from embarrassing uncertainty as to their duty, and from harassing anxieties as to their liability, which are unjust to the officer, and detrimental to the public service. At the same time, they afford the individual citizen due notice, and ample opportunity to become assessed and to pay his tax, if he exercise reasonable diligence, and take care to see that the obligations and the penalties which the law imposes are enforced against those officials who presume to violate those provisions which the Legislature has enacted for the vindication of his rights, and the promotion of the public welfare.

Further analysis of these Acts is needless. They speak for themselves. There is no ambiguity in their language, and no room for doubt as to their design. Everywhere throughout them there is apparent, in the natural meaning of their phraseology, and in the plain import of their provisions, a dominating purpose so to amend the revenue system as to provide for the assessment and collection of county taxes with greater exactness and regularity, and to define the duties and liabilities of the revenue officials with greater precision and certainty. This purpose is indicated in their titles, is implied in their reference only to the officers exclusively intrusted with duties pertaining to revenue and is disclosed through their essential and inseparable connection with the entire Code of county revenue legislation, of which, for their own effectual operation, they must necessarily form a constituent part. Hence, it cannot be maintained that they are primarily a regulation of the suffrage, and secondarily only a regulation of taxation. For, if this be true then it may be maintained with equal reason that the entire county assessment and collection system, since it is necessarily employed for the qualification of voters through the payment of a county tax, is therefore primarily intended and established to regulate the qualification for voting, rather than to provide for the collection of revenue. The mere statement of this proposition is sufficient for its refutation. Accordingly, the conclusion is irresistible that in their primary purpose and design the provisions drawn in question by the plaintiff's case are intended as an exercise of the taxing power by the Legislature with the view of improving the efficiency of the county revenue system. Whether or not it is the wisest and most effective plan for accomplishing this result which could be devised is immaterial to the question of their constitutional validity. They have been adopted as a means for effecting this result, which appeared to the legislative judgment, as we must presume, to be the most suitable and most effectual for its accomplishment. Being so, the said provisions must be presumed to be valid, and of binding force, until their enactment shall be shown to have been, in constitutional contemplation, unwarranted and prohibited. Cooley, Const. Lim. 108, and cases there cited.

We now come to the second general inquiry, whether or not, if the said provisions be considered as primarily a revenue regulation, they are a legitimate exercise of the true function of taxation, that is to say, in accord with its essential characteristics and purpose, and not in conflict with those limitations upon it which have been held by courts of high authority elsewhere to inhere in the very nature of the power of taxation itself, and to be equally imperative whether declared in written constitutions or not. Cooley, Taxn. 41, Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 62 Me. 62; State v. Readington, 30 N. J. L. 66; Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 108; Hammatt v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 181; Re Washington Avenue, 60 Pa. 300, 364; Knoxton v. Rock County, 9 Wis. 410.

Taxes are defined to be, to use the language of Judge Cooley, "burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes. The power to tax rests upon necessity, and is inherent in every sovereignty. The Legislature of every free State will possess it under the general grant of legislative power, whether particularly specified in the Constitution among the powers to be exercised by it or not." Cooley, Const. Lim. 479.

Chief Justice Marshall has said of this power: "The power of taxing the people and their property is essential to the very existence of government, and may be legitimately exercised on the objects to which it is applicable to the utmost extent to which the government may choose to carry it. . . . The people of a State, therefore, give to their government a right of taxing themselves and their property; and, as the exigencies of government cannot be limited, they prescribe no limits to the exercise of this right, resting confidently on the interest of the legislator, and on the influence of the constituents over their representative, to guard them against its abuse." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 420 [4 L. ed. 606].

Judge Cooley continues: "Having thus indicated the extent of the taxing power, it is necessary to add that certain elements are essential in all taxation, and that it will not follow, as of course, because the power is so vast, that everything which may be done under pretense of its exercise will leave the citizen without redress, even though there be no conflict with express constitutional inhibitions. Everything that may be done under the name of taxation is not necessarily a tax; and it may happen that an oppressive burden imposed by the government, when it comes to be carefully scrutinized, will prove, instead of a tax, to be an unlawful confiscation of property, unwarranted by any principle of constitutional government. In the first place, taxation having for its only legitimate object the raising of money for public purposes, and the proper needs of government, the exaction of moneys from the citizens for other purposes is not a proper exercise of this power, and must therefore be unauthorized." Cooley, Const. Lim. 487.

"In the second place, it is of the very essence of taxation that it be levied with equality and uniformity, and, to this end, that there should be some system of apportionment. Where the burden is common, there should be common contribution to discharge it." Id. 496.

"But, to render taxation uniform in any case, two things are essential. The first of these is that each taxing district should confine itself to the objects of taxation within its limits." Id. 499.

The second essential is that apportionment of taxes should reach all the objects of taxation within the district. Of the correctness of this as a principle there can be little doubt, though there may sometimes be difficulty in determining whether in practice it has been applied or not. Id. 501.

"Absolute equality and strict justice are unattainable in tax proceedings. The Legislature must be left to decide for itself how nearly it is possible to approximate so desirable a result. . . . The Legislature must also, except when an unbending rule has been prescribed for it by the Constitution, have power to select, in its discretion, the subjects of taxation. The rule of uniformity requires an apportionment among all the subjects of taxation within the districts, but it does not require that everything which the Legislature might make taxable shall be made so in fact. Many exemptions are usually made from taxation, from reasons the cogency of which is at once apparent." Id. 513, 514.

"The constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity only extends to such objects of taxation as the Legislature shall determine to be properly subject to the burden. The power to determine the persons and the objects to be taxed is trusted exclusively to the legislative department; but over all those objects the burden must be spread, or it will be unequal and unlawful as to such as are selected to make the payment." Id. 515.

"It is, moreover, essential to valid taxation that the taxing officers be able to show legislative authority for the burden they assume to impose in every instance. Taxes can only be voted by people's representatives." Id. 317.

The foregoing extracts from Judge Cooley's valuable treatise on Constitutional Limitations, present clearly, comprehensively and succinctly the leading principles illustrating the nature and extent of the power of taxation, and the limitations upon its exercise inherent in the nature thereof, which have been approved by courts and text-writers of acknowledged authority. Without being understood either to define or to declare to what extent, in all cases, said principles shall, in all respects, be applicable and authoritative in this State, it is nevertheless proper to consider whether the said provisions which are complained of in this case are not, so far as they affect the plaintiff, in accord, instead of in conflict, with said principles.

By section 1, art. 2, of the Constitution of Delaware, the legislative power of this State is vested in the General Assembly. There being no express grant of the power of taxation, it passed to the General Assembly, under the general grant of legislative power, as an attribute of sovereignty essential to the existence of the government, and indispensable to the promotion of the general welfare. Excepting the provisions of section 14, art. 2, of the Constitution of this State, respecting the mode of framing and passing bills for the raising of revenue, there is no express limitation therein upon the exercise by the Legislature of the taxing power. Unless, therefore, some clearly implied restriction be found, inherent in the nature of taxation itself, or in some express constitutional provision, the statutory provisions in question must be sustained as a valid exercise of the taxing power. It has not been shown that they were enacted for other than a public purpose. Nor does it appear anywhere in the case before us that they impose any fiscal burdens upon the plaintiff, and are for that reason not uniform and equal. As a matter of fact, instead of imposing taxation upon him for the year 1886, they demonstrate that he is incapable of paying a tax. Instead of discriminating arbitrarily and unequally, by making him bear the burdens of others belonging to his own poll class of taxables, the truth is that the non-delinquent taxables were obliged in 1886 to bear the extra taxation necessary to make good his delinquency in 1885. The latter might justly urge the unequal effect of the operation of said provisions, were it not for the fact that, owing to his inability to pay any tax (which must be presumed from the return of the collector), his exclusion from assessment, in reality, neither increased nor diminished their actual burdens thereafter.

But, even if it were otherwise, and the non-delinquents, by operation of the said provisions, could rightfully complain that thereby the non-assessment of the plaintiff because delinquent imposed his share of taxation upon them without due process of law, yet the plaintiff cannot in this case avail himself of their cause of action. He has sued in the case before us for damages, because, by operation of said provisions, no tax was imposed upon him in 1886, and not because he is wronged by an unequal burden of taxation. He cannot successfully urge that which is not an injury to himself as a ground for invalidating these statutory provisions. He does not complain on that ground, nor is he in a situation to so complain as being one who has been obliged to pay an unequal tax. It is well settled that the courts will never pronounce a statute unconstitutional because it may impair the right of others not complaining. A statute is assumed to be valid until someone complains whose right it invades. Antoni v. Wright, 22 Gratt. 857; Cooley, Const. Lim. 184.

As was said by this court, upon this very point, in Coyle v. Commissioners (1834, not yet published): "It will be time enough to consider this question, and the rights of the parties that may be affected thereby, when it shall be presented for our consideration by parties capable of making it, and having an interest in its determination. No such parties are before us."

As heretofore stated, the primary purpose of the enactment of said provisions of the Acts of 1873 was to secure a more reliable assessment, by excluding therefrom all unproductive taxables, in order to prevent a constantly recurring annual deficit. It is a well-settled rule of constitutional construction that when a Constitution gives a general power, or enjoins a duty, it also gives, by implication, every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one or the performance of the other. Therefore, the power to raise by taxation sufficient revenue for the needs of government necessarily includes the power to make reasonable provision for preventing a deficit. This, as has been shown, was the object of the Legislature in the enactment of the provisions complained of by the plaintiff. In its judgment, they were deemed necessary and appropriate to the object in view. For this purpose, they have, in effect, made the collector in each hundred and collection district the sole and final judge of the incapacity for the payment of a tax (and consequently of his unproductiveness as a taxable for the next ensuing year) of anyone whom the collector shall return as a delinquent in any year. He has been selected by the Legislature, in the exercise of the taxing power, as its agent, for this duty, because, as must be presumed, he is the most suitable revenue official for the purpose. Being charged by law with the special duty of collecting taxes, and employing legal process in that behalf, and being also under the obligations of his official bond to fully discharge his duty, he is, presumably, in the legislative judgment, the revenue official best qualified and most likely to discover the productiveness or unproductiveness of the taxables on his annual duplicate. Having given bond, and being liable civilly and also criminally for corrupt and malicious conduct in his office, he cannot reasonably be said to be an irresponsible officer. Nor is it true, as was contended for the plaintiff at the argument, that the collector is clothed, under the provisions of the Legislation of 1873, with authority, arbitrarily, and at his mere will and pleasure, to decide what poll taxables shall, and what poll taxables shall not, pay tax for the ensuing year, and with unrestrained power of choice as to whom he will return as delinquent. Under the provisions of sections 11-14, chap. 12, Amend. Code, it is made the imperative duty of the collector to sell the personal and real property of every taxable who shall fail to pay his tax to the collector after ten days' demand, in order to enforce payment thereof, and for the same purpose, in case he shall not find sufficient property, he is authorized by section 18 of said chapter 12 to take and imprison the body of every such taxable.

Again, under the provisions of section 10 of said chapter 12, the collector is also imperatively required, "on the first Tuesday of March next after the date of his warrant, to render to the levy court a true account of all taxes it was his duty to collect, and of all payments made, and of all delinquents." These provisions were not repealed nor altered by the Legislation of 1878, but, on the contrary, were recognized by it as of continuing force and obligation. Accordingly, the provisions of 1878 must be construed in connection with them. This being so, the absolute duty is imposed by law upon the collector to collect from all alike, without favor or discrimination, and to return all as delinquents and unproductive taxables whose tax cannot be collected on demand, or by legal process. If the collector shall act arbitrarily and corruptly, and disregard his duty, he will do so in direct violation of said statutory provisions, and of the meaning and purpose of the Legislation of 1878. He would therefore act not by authority of, but contrary to, the law. While this will be a good reason for the punishment of the offending collector, yet it is not recognized by the courts as a sufficient ground for declaring the provisions of a statute unconstitutional and void. Patterson v. Barlow, 60 Pa. 84. It is therefore the undeniable duty of the collector to make diligent inquiry, and exhaust legal process, wheresoever effectual, in the effort to collect the tax of the citizen, before he shall return him to the levy court as a delinquent or unproductive taxable. This is the duty which he owes to the public under the mandates of the law, and the obligations of his bond. He also owes to the individual citizen the duty of giving the two several notices prescribed by section 1 of said chapter 12, vol. 14, and the opportunity, in accordance therewith, to pay his tax. Upon the discharge of these several duties, he shall make his said return to the levy court, and the same shall be conclusive that the delinquent, in legislative contemplation, will be unproductive as a taxable for the next ensuing year, and accordingly his name shall be excluded from the assessment list for that year. It is necessary that this return shall be conclusive of this fact, in order to exclude him from the assessment list, and so prevent a deficit, in fulfillment of the purpose of the Statute. Unless such fact be ascertained during March of any year, it would become impossible to complete the assessment, and have the duplicate and warrant in the hands of the collector in April of such year, as prescribed by law. Consequently, unless this fact can constitutionally be ascertained in the mode and at the time prescribed, the provisions of the Act would be nugatory, and their primary purpose frustrated. Hence, this mode of ascertainment of a fact essential to the indispensable collection of public revenue with regularity and certainty is necessary to the proper execution of the taxing power, and is an appropriate and legitimate exercise thereof by the General Assembly. Hager v. Reclamation Dist 111 U. S. 701-715 [28 L. ed. 569-574], Wilson v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 5 Dal. Ch. 538, 546; Cooley, Const. Law, 87.

The delinquent cannot complain that he has had no "day in court," and no opportunity to disprove the fact conclusively established by the return. In contemplation of law, he has received notice to appear, through the notices given by the collector at the precise time specified for the giving thereof in said section 1 of chapter 12. Thereby he has his opportunity to show his capacity as a taxable for the next ensuing year by appearing in accordance with said notices, and paying his tax to the collector. Not having done so, he is legally concluded by the determination and the return of the collector. Hager v. Reclamation Dist, supra.

In the present instance the plaintiff admits, as the record discloses, that he was duly assessed as a poll taxable, and that he had legal notice and opportunity to appear before the collector, and show his capacity as a taxable for 1880, but that he did not do so. He admits that he had not, within two years next before the general election in that year, paid any tax, and does not allege or show that he was able or willing to pay any tax either for 1883 or 1884. He admits that the collector was in attendance for the reception of his tax, conformably to his notices given as prescribed by the Act, but he does not allege or show that the collector ever refused to receive it, or deprived him of a free and ample opportunity to pay it. Nor does he allege or show that the collector had not fully and in good faith discharged his official duty, and exhausted all lawful and effective means in an earnest effort to collect his tax before he returned him as a delinquent and unproductive taxable. So that the verity of the statutory presumption established by the collector's return is nowhere impeached by the record.

In this connection, some observations may be made which seem both appropriate and material to the present inquiry, as being illustrative of the serious and not trivial importance as well as of the real necessity of these legislative provisions for ascertaining what portion of the citizens belongs to the productive class, and what portion to the unproductive class, of poll taxables, with a view to securing an accurate assessment, and thus prevent, through so exact and business like administration of the county revenue system, an annually recurring deficit. As hereinbefore shown, the Collection Law of 1878 was enacted to be auxiliary to the Assessment Law of that year, for the purpose of excluding from the assessment lists in any year, through the inquiry and return of the collector, all fictitious names, and also the names of all others who would be unproductive taxables in such year, which had been placed upon the assessment list in the preceding year through the error, or otherwise, of the assessor or levy court. It was argued by counsel for plaintiff that thousands of poll taxables are annually returned as delinquents, but that this is done by the collectors arbitrarily, and without just reason or necessity. The fact is true as stated, but the deduction therefrom was unwarranted. The fact that thousands of poll taxables are annually returned as delinquents by the collectors is not shown by the record in the case before us, but it is shown by the official records of the county revenue officers. Careful examination of these shows that, in addition to those who subsequently die, or remove from the State, there have been placed upon the assessment lists in a single year, in Wilmington alone, not only hundreds, but thousands, of names of persons who never existed, and also great numbers of those whose taxes could not be collected even by legal process. That thousands of these were fictitious names of persons who never existed, is demonstrated by the disproportion which the assessment bears to the population as shown by the census reports. That thousands of the remainder were absolutely unproductive taxables, against whom legal process was wholly unavailing, is a fact which, beyond question, can be conclusively established. While this demonstrates the infirmity of human instrumentalities, and the inadequacy of even the present Assessment Laws and their penal provisions, it also significantly demonstrates the necessity for, and emphasizes the value of, the Collection Law of 1873, by operation of which these flagrant faults in the assessment lists are annually corrected through the agency of the collector.

The consideration of the third general inquiry is now reached. It is contended in behalf of the plaintiff that the provisions of the Acts of 1870, of which he complains, by causing his exclusion from the assessment lists for 1880, thereby operated to deprive him of the opportunity to pay a county poll tax, as his qualification for the enjoyment of the right of an elector of this State at the general election in that year, and therefore that these provisions are unconstitutional and void, as being violative of section 1, art. 4, and of section 2, art. 1, of the Constitution of this State. Section 1, art. 4, provides that a citizen of the age of twenty-two years or upwards (and otherwise qualified), "and having, within two years next before the election, paid a county tax, which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector." Section 2 of article 1 provides that "all elections shall be free and equal." It has been shown that said provisions of the Acts of 1870 were enacted by the Legislature in the legitimate exercise of the taxing power, and were appropriate and necessary to the due execution thereof, and were, in their primary purpose and design, a regulation of the collection and assessment of county taxes, and but incidentally and secondarily a regulation for the qualification of electors. The plaintiff's contention therefore, directly raises the question, Has the General Assembly, according to the true meaning and intent of the Constitution of this State, authority to exclude from assessment, in any particular year, a citizen who has been ascertained by a mode appropriate and essential to the effectual exercise of the taxing power, to be, in the legislative judgment, an unproductive taxable for that year? This is the controlling question in the case presented by the record. There is no need, upon the present occasion, of considering or declaring the extent of legislative power and discretion beyond the requirements of this pivotal question. If it shall be decided affirmatively, the controverted provisions of the Acts of 1870 must be sustained as constitutional and valid. The taxing power, and also the privilege of exercising the elective franchise, are both conferred by express but separate provisions of the same Constitution, —the former by section 1 of article 2, and the latter by said section 1 of article 4. No express limitation upon the taxing power in respect to suffrage is found in that instrument. Therefore, if any restriction upon such power exists, it must appear by clear implication from some other express provision of the Constitution. To ascertain this, resort must be had to a proper construction of the entire instrument. Every enactment of the State Legislature is presumed to be constitutional and valid until the contrary is shown. There is no safe rule for construing the extent or limitation of powers in a Constitution "other than is given by the language of the instrument which confers them, taken in connection with the purposes for which they were conferred." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 188 [6 L. ed. 69].

"But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its Acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 128 [3 L. ed. 169, 176].

If examined according to these approved rules of construction, can it be said that any restriction upon the taxing power, as exercised by the Legislature in the present instance, appears by clear implication from the said provisions of article 4 relating to the qualifications of electors? The language of said article, "having, within two years next before the election, paid a county tax, which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election," clearly contemplates the necessity of a preceding assessment. The right to qualify for the suffrage, therefore, is by the Constitution itself made dependent upon the action of the Legislature in the exercising of the taxing power. Unless the Legislature has authority to prescribe an appropriate and necessary mode of ascertaining who will be unproductive subjects of taxation in any year, and to exclude such from assessment in that year, it cannot successfully raise, with certainty and regularity, adequate revenue for support of the government, and thus fulfill the purpose for which it was vested with the taxing power; for, if required to assess those who have been ascertained by such mode to be unproductive as taxables, an annual deficit must inevitably result, and the purpose of the taxing power be thus frustrated. To hold, therefore, that the Legislature is imperatively required to assess a citizen so found to be unproductive is to assert that the existence of government is of subordinate importance to the privilege of suffrage. Such a proposition is untenable, as it is absurd. Without organized government, there can be neither qualification for, nor exercise of, the suffrage, nor protection of life, liberty or property, nor promotion of the general welfare. Without adequate revenue, raised with regularity and certainty, efficient and stable government cannot successfully be maintained. It necessarily follows that the authority of the Legislature, in the exercise of the taxing power, to prescribe all appropriate and needful regulations for the selection and assessment of those only who will be productive taxables, is paramount to any alleged right of the unproductive citizen to be assessed. When section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution vested the taxing power in the General Assembly, and gave to the Legislature the general power, and enjoined the duty, to provide for the raising annually, with certainty and regularity, of needful revenue for the support of the several county governments, it also gave by implication every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one, or the performance of the other.

The language of the above-quoted provision of article 4 should be construed, if possible, so as to harmonize with this implication of the general grant of the taxing power, and yet be operative according to its true meaning and purpose. This may be accomplished by construing said provision to mean that those citizens only shall be qualified for assessment in any particular year who have first been ascertained, by an appropriate mode prescribed by the Legislature, to be capable of paying a county tax for said year. In other words, it means that capacity to pay a county tax is the test of fitness to be assessed, and, as the framers of said provision manifestly designed, of the capacity essential to the proper exercise of the elective franchise. That this was the view of those who framed said provision of article 4 admits of no doubt, as will be found by recourse to the Debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1881, which adopted it. In that convention, the proposition was made to abolish the prerequisite of paying a tax as a qualification for voting. In the course of the very able discussion of this question, conducted by the most eminent constitutional lawyers of the State, the principle upon which that prerequisite is based was very forcibly and plainly stated. In reference to this subject, Judge Hall said: "I do not regard the tax qualification as making an invidious distinction between the poor and the rich. If I did, I should vote against it. But I look upon the assessment of a tax as the test of the capacity of a person to exercise the right of a voter. If a person has no property, you can, by our laws, tax his capacity. If he has neither property nor capacity to be taxed he ought not to be suffered to dispose of your rights. The tax is the test of capacity. . . . The principle of the Constitution is this: You shall not vote unless you are taxed." Harker's Debates Delaware Convention 1881, p. 18.

Similar views being expressed by Mr. Clayton and others, the principle was adopted by the convention, and imbedded in our present Constitution. In view of this convincing testimony of the authors of our Constitution, and of the additional reasons above stated, it does not seem reasonable to conclude that the said language of section 1, art. 4, can be recognized judicially as an implied inhibition of the enactment by the Legislature of the said provisions of the Acts of 1878, as regulations appropriate and essential to the effectual exercise of the taxing power.

The plaintiff's exclusion from assessment for the year 1896 as an unproductive taxable, pursuant to said enactments as such regulations, was in accord with the true meaning and purpose of the Constitution that he, and all those who have been similarly ascertained to be unproductive taxables for a particular year, shall not be qualified for assessment for such year. Such citizens, in constitutional contemplation, are not permitted, under the said provision of article 4, to qualify as electors by the paying of a tax for such year, and hence cannot belong to the "voting class." For this reason, the said provisions of the Acts of 1878 are not inhibited by the injunction of section 3 of article 1, that "all elections shall be free and equal." This injunction does not apply to those who have neither a right to vote, nor to qualify as electors, under the Constitution of this State, which establishes, exclusively, the qualifications of those entitled to vote therein. In reality, however, said provisions, in their operation, are equal, and do not discriminate between any persons belonging to the same class of citizens who are in like condition, situation or circumstances. The Constitution itself, in its intent, divides all citizens of the State into productive and unproductive classes of taxables, for the purpose of assessment and taxation, and empowers the Legislature to select the productive, and to reject the unproductive, class, as essential to the fulfillment of this purpose. In accordance with this constitutional purpose, said provisions were enacted. Consequently, if they authorize the assessment of the productive, and forbid that of the unproductive, poll taxables, they are not prohibited, but authorized by the Constitution to do so. Also, if they do not operate similarly towards property holders and non-property holders, it is not because of any invidious discrimination between them created by said provisions. It is because of the difference of condition and circumstances existing between them. All citizens, except minors and female citizens, who own property, are subject to poll-tax, as well as non-property holders. Again, said enactments do not exclude from assessment as a punishment or forfeiture for crime, but to prevent a deficit. Nor is their purpose to compel payment of his tax by disfranchising the delinquent taxable. It is to show that he is incapable of paying a tax, and therefore unproductive as a taxable, and that the assessment of him, and those in like condition, will produce a deficiency of revenue.

The conclusion, therefore, seems unavoidable that the said provisions of the Acts of 1878, considered with reference to the case of the plaintiff as presented by the record, are not unconstitutional and void, but the contrary, and that it should be so certified to the court below. The objections to their constitutional validity, with the numerous authorities in support thereof, which were presented by the counsel for the plaintiff so earnestly and so ably, have been carefully examined, and deliberately considered, as was due to the eminent counsel on both sides, and demanded by the gravity of the subject. But they have failed to show that the opposition between said provisions and the Constitution is such that, as Chief Justice Marshall observed in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 128 [8 L. ed. 175], "the judge feels a strong and clear conviction of their incompatibility with each other." On the contrary, their enactment appears to have been clearly within the constitutional power of the Legislature, as an appropriate and legitimate exercise of the taxing power. Being so, even though they may be unwise in policy, or defective and inefficient for the purpose designed in their enactment, the resort for their annulment or amendment must be, not to the courts, but to the representatives of the people, or, that failing, to the people themselves. The courts cannot annul these enactments, but they can and will enforce the penalties provided for their violation whenever any infraction thereof is properly presented and duly established.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Samuel LYON, Appt.,

v.

William C. DENISON et al.

(....Mich.....)

Shares of stock in a sporting club, incorporated under How. Stat., chap. 188, which has power to own a certain amount of property, with the general powers of corporations so far as they are applicable, cannot be sold on execution, under How. Stat., § 7697, providing for such sale of shares in any "bank, insurance company or any other joint-stock company," where the club is not compelled to issue any shares of stock, although it has done so, and, having provided for their transfer, has also provided that ownership thereof shall not entitle a person to any of the privileges of the club, unless he be duly elected a member.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kent County sustaining a demurrer to the bill in a suit brought to compel the transfer to complainant of certain corporate stock upon the books of the corporation and to enjoin a disposition of it by the person in whose name it stood. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Reuben Hatch, for complainant, appellant:

The words "joint-stock company," as used in § 7697 of Howell's Statutes, which permits the interest of a stockholder in any joint-stock company to be seized on execution, are synonymous with the word "corporation."

Blair v. Compton, 33 Mich. 414.

It can make no difference that the corporation was organized for pleasure or sporting rather than for business purposes, so long as the stock owned by the members of the corporation is an interest possessing value.

Messrs. Norris & Norris for defendant L. A. Denison, appellee

Messrs. Fletcher & Wanty, for defendant W. C. Denison, appellee:

At common law corporate stocks were not seizable on execution.

Blair v. Compton, 33 Mich. 423; Van Norman v. Jackson County Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 204.

Complainant's right to levy on this stock depends, then, wholly on the Statute.

§ How Stat. § 7697.

The club is organized under chapter 188, Howell's Statutes, an examination of the provisions of which shows that no capital stock is provided for, so that if there be any it exists by virtue of the agreement of members and the club's by-laws, and not by virtue of the Statute.

It is not alleged, and does not appear, that the club has any property.

It necessarily follows that this club is not a "joint-stock company," but rather a social organization, and that being such its stock cannot be seized on execution.

Van Norman v. Jackson County Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 211.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case states, substantially:

(1) That on the 17th day of July, A. D. 1889, he, the complainant, recovered judgment before Thomas Walsh, Esq., one of the justices of the peace of the City of Grand Rapids, against William C. Denison, in an action of assumpsit, for $127.84 damages, and $3 costs of suit; that, upon showing made on oath of complainant to the satisfaction of said justice, execution was ordered issued forthwith on said judgment, and that execution was so issued by said justice on said 17th day of July, 1889, to any constable of said county, which execution was in the usual form; that on July 19, 1889, the said constable levied said execution upon share of the capital stock of the Pottawatomie Club represented by certificate No. 9, issued to said William C. Denison.

(2) That the Pottawatomie Club aforesaid is, and was at the time of said levy, a corporation or joint-stock company, within the meaning of section 7697 of Howell's Statutes, existing under the laws of this State, and organized under and by virtue of chapter 188 of Howell's Statutes.

(3) That said officer made said levy by leaving a copy of said execution, certified by him, with Charles E. Kusterer, then treasurer of the said Pottawatomie Club.

(4) That said constable, having given due notice of the sale of said stock at public vendue, by notices signed by him, and put up on the 24th day of July, 1889, at three public places in the City of Grand Rapids aforesaid, where the said stock was levied upon, advertising the same for sale at public vendue to the highest bidder, at the outer front door of "Court Block," so called, on Lyon Street, in the City of Grand Rapids aforesaid, on the 31st day of July, 1889, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, at the place aforesaid, offered said share of stock for sale at public vendue to the highest bidder, and that, said complainant being the highest bidder, the said stock was struck off and sold to him by said constable for the sum of $1, that being the highest sum bid therefor.

(5) That on the 8th day of August, 1880, a copy of said execution, and the return of said constable thereon, certified by said constable, was left with Charles F. Kusterer, treasurer of said Pottawatomie Club, and the officer whose duty it was to keep a record of the transfer of shares, by Reuben Hatch, attorney for said complainant, at the office of said treasurer, in the City of Grand Rapids aforesaid. Reuben Hatch, as attorney for said complainant, then and there demanded of said Charles F. Kusterer, for said complainant, a certificate of the share so bought by him at the said constable's sale, the said Reuben Hatch offering to pay the fees thereof, and for recording the transfer of said certificate to said complainant, which the said Charles F. Kusterer, as treasurer of said Pottawatomie Club, then and there refused.

(6) That on the 8th day of August, 1880, the said Reuben Hatch, as attorney for said complainant, left with Mark Norris, secretary of said Pottawatomie Club, another copy of said execution, and return thereon, certified by said constable, and demanded the certificate of said share of stock so bought by said complainant, at the same time offering to pay the fees therefor, and for recording the transfer, which the said Mark Norris, as secretary of the said club, refused.

(7) The return of said constable indorsed upon said execution, a certified copy of which was indorsed upon the copies of said execution so left with said Charles F. Kusterer, treasurer of the said club, and with Mark Norris, secretary of the said club, was in words and figures following, to wit:

"I do hereby certify and return that on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1880, at 3 o'clock P. M., I sold at the outer front door of 'Court Block,' so called, on Lyon Street, in the City of Grand Rapids, Michigan, at public vendue, one share of the capital stock of the Pottawatomie Club, represented by certificate No. 9, issued to William C. Denison, the defendant within named, being the same stock levied upon by me by virtue of the within writ, to Samuel Lyon, plaintiff within named, for the sum of $1, that being the highest sum bid therefor, and he being the highest bidder; having given due public notice of said sale as required by law, by advertisement signed by me, and put up at three public places in the City of Grand Rapids aforesaid, where said stock was levied upon on the 24th day of July, A. D. 1880.

"J. C. Pitkin, Constable."

That the levy upon said stock was indorsed upon said original execution in words and figures following, to wit:

"July 19, 1880. The within execution levied upon one share of the capital stock of the Pottawatomie Club, represented by certificate No. 9, the property of William C. Denison, the defendant within named. J. C. Pitkin, Constable."

—a certified copy of which was also indorsed upon said certified copies of said executions so served as aforesaid upon the said Charles F. Kusterer, treasurer, and Mark Norris, secretary, of the said Pottawatomie Club.

(8) That on the day following said levy said Charles F. Kusterer, as treasurer of said Pottawatomie Club, delivered to said constable a certificate in words and figures following, to wit:

"I, Charles F. Kusterer, treasurer of the Pottawatomie Club, a corporation organized under and by virtue of chapter 188 of Howell's Statutes, and the officer of said club appointed to keep a record of the shares of the stockholders therein, do hereby certify that on July 19, 1880, at the hour of noon (at which time there was served on me a certified copy of an execution issued by Thomas Walsh, justice of the peace, in favor of Samuel Lyon, and against the goods and chattels of William C. Denison) and Denison appeared on the books of said club to be the holder and owner of one share of the stock of said club, and that a copy of the certificate of stock issued to said Denison is annexed hereto; and I do further certify that on the same day, and prior to the service on me of said execution, one Lavello A. Denison notified me that said stock had been purchased by him, and said stock certificate assigned and delivered to him, on the 10th day of July, 1880. Charles F. Kusterer, Treasurer of the Pottawatomie Club, July 19, 1880."

"Copy of Certificate. No. 9. 1 share.

"The Pottawatomie Club of Grand Rapids, Michigan.

"This certifies that William C. Denison is entitled to one share, of the par value of $100 each, of the capital stock of the Pottawatomie Club. This certificate may be transferred on the books of the treasurer of the club, who is transfer agent, to any person, on the surrender of this certificate, properly indorsed; but the ownership of said stock shall not entitle the person owning the same to any of the privileges of the club, unless such person be duly elected a member of said club. The club has a lien on this stock for all unpaid dues and assessments. One hundred dollars have been paid on each share of stock represented by this certificate.

"E. B. Holmes, President.

"N. Fred Avery, Treasurer.

"Grand Rapids, August 17, 1880."

That at the time of said levy your orator had no knowledge of the pretended transfer of said stock to said Lavello A. Denison.

(9) That at the time of said levy the capital stock of said Pottawatomie Club was divided into shares, and certificates thereof had been previously issued to the members or stockholders of said club; that the stock so levied upon and sold was at the time of said levy owned by said William C. Denison; that said William C. Denison appeared to be owner thereof on the books of the said club, and that no transfer of the same from said William C. Denison to any other person had been entered on the books of said club so as to show the names of the parties by and to whom the same was transferred, the number and designation of shares, or the date of the transfer, nor in any other manner; that as your orator is informed and believes, at the time of said levy the said Charles F. Kusterer, who was the transfer officer of said club, and kept the record of the stock and transfer thereof, had received no notice whatever from said William C. Denison, or from any other person, of any transfer of said stock from William C. Denison to the said Lavello A. Denison, neither had the said Mark Norris, as secretary of said club, received notice, at the time of said levy, of any transfer of said stock from said William C. Denison to Lavello A. Denison.

(10) That the said Lavello A. Denison is the son of the said William C. Denison, and was at the time of said levy, and of the pretended transfer of said stock from the said William C. Denison to the said Lavello A. Denison, mentioned in the certificate of Charles F. Kusterer herein before set forth, in the employ of said William C. Denison; that, as your orator is informed and believes, no consideration was ever paid by the said Lavello A. Denison to the said William C. Denison for said stock; and that the pretended transfer of said stock from said William C. Denison to said Lavello A. Denison is fraudulent and void as to your orator, and was made for the purpose, and with the intent on the part of the said William C. Denison and Lavello A. Denison, of defrauding your orator, and defeating collection of said judgment in favor of your orator, and against said William C. Denison.

(11) That said pretended transfer of said stock by said William C. Denison to his said son is, as your orator is informed and believes, merely colorable, and made with a view of protecting the property and effects of the said William C. Denison, and said stock especially, and placing the same beyond the reach of your orator's said judgment, and enabling said William C. Denison to control and enjoy the same.

(12) That your orator is now, by virtue of said constable's sale, and his purchase of said stock thereat, the true and rightful owner of said stock, and entitled to a certificate thereof from the proper officer of the said Pottawatomie Club, and that he was, upon the service of certified copy of said execution, with the return of said constable indorsed thereon, upon Charles F. Kusterer, treasurer of said club, as aforesaid, entitled to a certificate of said stock, and that it was the duty of said treasurer upon such service, and upon the offer of your orator's said attorney to pay the charges therefor, to have issued to your orator a certificate of said stock as such purchaser; that said stock is worth at least $500; that the attorney of Lavello A. Denison attended said sale, and warned all persons not to bid, and that is one reason why said stock brought so little.

(13) But now, so it is, may it please this honorable court, that the said William C. Denison and Lavello A. Denison, combining and confederating together to and with divers other persons as yet unknown to your orator, but whose names when discovered your orators pray may be inserted herein as defendants, and they made parties hereto, with proper and apt words to charge them, how to injure and oppress your orator, the said confederates respectively do refuse to allow to be issued to your orator a certificate of the share of the stock in said club so bought by him at said constable's sale, pretending that before the said levy upon said stock by said constable, under and by virtue of said execution, said William C. Denison assigned and transferred said stock to his said son, Lavello A. Denison, and that the said Lavello A. Denison, by virtue of said transfer and assignment, is a bona fide purchaser thereof; whereas, your orator expressly charges the truth to be that the said Lavello A. Denison is not a bona fide purchaser of said stock, and that the said assignment and transfer are a mere sham and pretense, in order to cheat and defraud your orator out of the collection of said judgment,—all of which actings, doings and pretenses of the said confederates are contrary to equity and good conscience, and tend to the manifest wrong, injury and oppression of your orator. In tender consideration whereof, and for as much as your orator is remediless in the premises at and by the strict rules of the common law, and is only relievable in a court of equity, where matters of this nature are properly cognizable and relievable. The bill calls for answer, the answer on oath being waived, and prays that the pretended assignment and transfer of said stock by said William C. Denison to his said son may be declared void as a fraud upon the rights of the complainant, and that the same may be canceled, and the said club decreed and directed to issue a certificate of the share of stock to the complainant so bought by him at said sale upon his paying the fees therefor, and that William C. Denison and Lavello A. Denison may be enjoined and restrained from selling, assigning, transferring, delivering, negotiating, incumbering or in any way or manner disposing of said stock to any other person, etc. The bill also contains the usual prayer for other and further relief. This bill was duly verified.

The defendant William C. Denison filed a general demurrer to the bill. Defendant Lavello A. Denison appeared and filed his answer, containing a demurrer clause. By consent of parties the cause came on to be heard on the general demurrer of William C. Denison and the answer of Lavello A. Denison, settling up, among other things, that complainant's bill did not make or state such a case as entitled him to the relief prayed, and praying the benefit of a demurrer. The demurrers only were passed upon by the court, who dismissed the bill, with costs, on October 14, 1888. Complainant appeals.

Counsel for defendant's Denisons in this court contend (1) that the bill shows no jurisdiction in the justice to render the judgment or to issue the execution; (2) that the stock seized is not subject to levy, even had it not been transferred; (3) that it was equitable assets, and therefore not subject to levy. (4) that complainant ought to have filed his bill to settle the title to his stock before selling it under the execution; (5) that the bill fails to show that complainant's debt was in existence prior to the transfer of the stock, and hence shows no right to maintain this suit.

From the view we take of the case, however, it does not become necessary to discuss but one question, and that is, whether these shares of stock can be sold on execution.

The Pottawatomie Club was organized under chapter 188 of Howell's Statutes. Section 1 provides "that any ten or more persons of full ago, at least six of whom shall be citizens of this State, who shall desire to associate themselves for yachting, hunting, fishing, boating, rowing or other lawful sporting purposes, may make, sign and acknowledge . . . and file in the office of the secretary of state . . . a certificate in writing, in which shall be stated the name or title by which such association shall be known in law," etc. Section 2 of the Act provides that such association shall be a body politic and corporate, and in their corporate name "shall, in law and equity, be capable of taking and receiving real and personal estate, either by purchase, gift, grant, lease or bargain and sale, devise and bequest, not exceeding $25,000, in the aggregate, for the purpose of their corporation, but for no other purpose, and the same at pleasure grant, bargain mortgage, sell or lease for the use of said association, make all needful rules, regulations and by laws for the management of its affairs," etc., and appoint officers and agents for the management of its business. The Act also provides for succession by the election of officers and a board of directors for the management of its affairs. Section 7 of the Act provides that said association shall possess the general powers conferred by, and be subject to the provisions and restrictions of, chapter 55, title 10, Rev. Stat. 1846 (How. Stat. chap. 191), so far as the same may be made applicable to associations formed under this Act. Section 7, chap. 191, How. Stat., provides that whenever the capital stock of any such corporation is divided into shares, and certificates thereof are issued, such shares may be transferred by indorsement and delivery of the certificates thereof, such indorsement being by the signature of the proprietor or his attorney or legal representative; but such transfer shall not be valid, except between the parties thereto, until the same shall be so entered on the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number and designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer. Section 7007 of Howell's Statutes provides that "any share or interest of a stockholder in any bank, insurance company or any other joint-stock company, that is or may be incorporated under the authority of or authorized to be created by any law of this State, may be taken in execution and sold, in the following manner "

It is insisted that the Pottawatomie Club is not a joint stock company within the meaning of section 7007, above quoted; that the Act under which it was incorporated does not provide for the issuing of any certificates of shares of stock, and that the bill does not allege that the club has any property. It is evident that the Legislature, by section 7007, did not intend to limit the right of levy under execution to joint-stock companies as they were known at the common law, as it gives the right to levy upon the shares of stock in any bank, insurance company or any other joint-stock company. Banks or insurance companies may be, and usually are, corporations, and yet the shares of stock issued by such corporations may be levied upon and sold under the provisions of this Statute. A joint-stock company, at the common law, lies midway between a corporation and a co-partnership. It is an association of persons for the purpose of business, having a capital stock divided into shares, and governed by articles of association, which prescribe its objects, organization and procedure, and the rights and liabilities of its members, except that the article cannot release the members from their liability as partners to the creditors of the company. Cook, Stock and Stockholders, 2d ed. § 504.

There is an essential difference between a joint-stock company as it existed at the common law, and a joint stock company having extensive statutory powers conferred upon it by the State within which it is organized. It is not within the contemplation of the Statute under which the club was organized that it should carry on a business for profit, but to hold a limited amount of property for the purposes for which it was organized, to wit, "yachting, hunting, fishing, boating, rowing or other lawful sporting purposes;" and it is quite evident the Legislature never intended that its shares of stock, if any were provided for by its articles of association or by-laws, should be regarded merely as property to be bartered and sold like shares of stock in a purely business concern, and to be treated subject to levy and sale under execution, within the provisions of section 7007. They are not, by the terms of the Statute, compelled to issue stock in order to keep up and maintain their corporation. Their privilege and franchises are to be enjoyed by compliance with the Statute under which they were organized. They have, however, issued certificates of shares of stock. Whether this is provided for in their articles or by-laws is not made to appear by the bill. From an inspection of this certificate it appears that the same may be transferred upon the books of the company by a surrender of the certificate properly indorsed, but it is also provided that the ownership of such stock shall not entitle the person owning the same to any of the privileges of the club, unless such person be duly elected a member of the club. That is, one holding and owning a share of stock has none of the rights and privileges of members of the club, of yachting, hunting, etc. Just what rights one holding such a certificate as owner might be entitled to, it is not necessary to determine upon this record. We are satisfied that the case does not come within the provisions of the Statute authorizing the levy and sale of shares of stock of a bank, insurance company or any other joint-stock company.

The decree of the court below sustaining the demurrer must be affirmed, with costs.

The other Justices concurred.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

SMITH, Pf. in Err.,v.

(....Ga....)

"The marriage of a boy in his sixteenth year, although declared by the Code to be void in the sense of being absolutely void, may nevertheless be ratified and confirmed by continuing, after arriving at the age of seventeen years, to cohabit with his wife as such. The Code of 1863 required a license, or the publication of banns, as a condition to the validity of any marriage; but this provision of the Code was repealed by the Act of December, 1868, by which repeal the common law as to informal marriages was restored. The power to make marriage by consent and cohabitation being thus reinstated, the power to complete and confirm by like means an inchoate and imperfect marriage was also revived.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Muscogee County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought by an alleged wife to recover possession of her deceased husband's property. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.
Messrs. C. J. Thornton and A. A. Dondor for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. McNeill & Levy for defendants in error.

Blackley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The actual marriage took place in Alabama in 1880, and was celebrated by a magistrate. Nothing is suggested as to any defect in the magistrate's authority, whether from want of license or otherwise. The groom was between fifteen and sixteen years of age; the bride was older. Both parties resided in Georgia, in which State a license had been applied for, and refused, because of an objection interposed by the groom's mother, his father being dead. After the marriage ceremony, the parties returned immediately to Georgia, where they continued to reside. The evidence indicates that they cohabited as man and wife up to November, 1888, when the husband died, his age being then upwards of eighteen years. The present suit is by the wife against the guardian of the husband and the sureties upon his bond to recover so much of the husband's estate as the guardian may be accountable for, the plaintiff claiming to be the sole heir-at-law of her deceased husband. The action was defended upon the ground, among others, that she was never his lawful wife, and therefore could not inherit. The Statute Law of Alabama as to the ages of consent is the same as our own, namely, seventeen years in males and fourteen in females. Tested by the law of that State, the marriage was not absolutely void, but voidable only, and until disaffirmed was a marriage in fact. Hoppe v. State, 35 Ala. 108.

Our Code (§ 1710), however, declares that

"all marriages solemnized in another State, by parties intending at the time to reside in this State, shall have the same legal consequences and effect as if solemnized in this State. Parties residing in this State cannot evade any of the provisions of its laws as to marriage by going into another State for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony." The rights of the plaintiff, therefore, resulting from the marriage, and what followed thereupon, are to be measured by the laws of this State.

Prior to the Code of 1863, the common law prevailed here as to the validity of the marriage relation established by mere act of the parties without any ceremonial observances, civil or ecclesiastical. Astew v. Dupree, 30 Ga. 178.

Provisions contained in penal statutes treated the marriage of idiots or lunatics as void, and expressly declared polygamous and inter-Levitical marriages void. Cobb, Dig. 814, 818, 819.

By the Act of 1806 (Id. 235) the issue of divorced parents in all cases were declared legitimate. The grounds of divorce remained as at common law (Head v. Head, 2 Ga. 191) until 1850. By an Act of that year (Cobb, Dig. 290) the antenuptial causes of total divorce recognized were the following: intermarriages within the Levitical degrees of consanguinity or affinity; mental incapacity; impotency; force, menaces or duress; pregnancy of the wife unknown to the husband. These same causes were recognized in the Code of 1863, with two changes, the first substituting "prohibited degrees" for "Levitical degrees," and the second introducing "fraud" as an additional ground. Code 1863 § 1670.

By that Code, which went into effect on the 1st day of January, the following provisions on the subject of marriage (with others not material to this discussion) became part of our written law, viz.: "Sec. 1653. To constitute a valid marriage in this State, there must be (1) parties able to contract; (2) an actual contract; (3) consummation according to law. Sec. 1654. To be able to contract marriage, a person must be of sound mind, if a male at least seventeen years of age, and if a female at least fourteen years of age, and laboring under neither of the following disabilities, viz.: (1) previous marriage undissolved; (2) nearness of relationship by blood or marriage, as hereinafter explained; (3) impotency. Sec. 1655. Persons related by consanguinity within the fourth degree of the civil law are prohibited from intermarrying. Marriages between persons related by affinity in the following manner are prohibited, viz.: A man shall not marry his step-mother, or mother-in-law, or widow of his uncle, or daughter-in-law, or step-daughter, or granddaughter of his wife. A woman shall not marry her corresponding relatives. Marriages within the degrees prohibited by this section are incestuous. Sec. 1656. To constitute an actual contract of marriage, the parties must be consenting thereto voluntarily, and without any fraud practiced on either. Drunkenness at the time of marriage, brought about by art or contrivance to induce consent, shall be held a fraud. Sec. 1657. Marriages of persons unable to contract, or unwilling to contract, or fraudulently induced to contract, are void. The issue of such marriages, before they are annulled and declared void by a competent court, are legitimate. In the latter two cases, however, a subsequent consent and ratification of the marriage, freely and voluntarily made, accompanied by cohabitation as husband and wife, shall render valid the marriage. Sec. 1658. To render valid a marriage in this State, there must be either a license previously granted by the proper officer authorizing such marriage, or a publication of the banns of marriage in a neighboring church, in the presence of the congregation, for at least three Sabbath days prior to its solemnization."

The Code, by these provisions, innovated upon the common law in the following particulars: (1) It raised the age of consent for males from fourteen to seventeen, and for females from twelve to fourteen; (2) It brought first cousins, etc., within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity; (3) It virtually obliterated the distinction between canonical and civil disabilities, and consequently between void and voidable marriages, and (4) It exacted license, or the publication of banns, as a condition to the validity of any marriage whatsoever, and thereby made marriage impossible without some preliminary from the State or the church. For there to be any marriage at all which the law would treat as valid, it had to take place under a license, or after the publication of banns. In the absence of both these preliminaries, no matrimonial connection could be formed, however competent the parties might be to assume the bonds of wedlock, or however free and voluntary might be their action in attempting to do so. By applying the one word "void" to all the enumerated instances of marriages, the intention, no doubt, was to use it in the same legal sense as to each and every instance enumerated. The safest and most probable construction is that the sense contemplated was the strict and comprehensive one of utter nullity. This construction is borne out in some degree by what is said in section 1659, as to the effect of divorce: "A total divorce annuls the marriage from the time of its rendition, except it be for a cause rendering the marriage void originally, but in no case of divorce shall the issue be rendered bastards, except in case of pregnancy of the wife at the time of the marriage." This use of the words, "except it be for a cause rendering the marriage void originally," carries the implication that any such marriage would be so utterly void as to require no judgment to dissolve or annul it. Still there is some obstacle to this construction, for, though canonical impediments rendered marriages voidable only, yet, "if the cause existed previous to the marriage, and was such a one as rendered the marriage unlawful ab initio, as consanguinity, corporal imbecility or the like, in this case the law looks upon the marriage to have been always null and void, being contracted in fraudem legis, and decrees not only a separation from bed and board, but a vinculo matrimonii itself." 8 Bl. Com. 94.

The Code deals with the subject of ratifying void marriages, expressly allowing it in the two cases of force and fraud. Under the rule that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another, there is no probability that there was any intention to allow ratification by mere consent and cohabitation at any age whatever, if either of the parties was under the age of consent at the time when the marriage was celebrated. The phrase "consummation according to law," found in the first section above quoted (§ 1658), meant consummation under license, or after the publication of banns for, as there could be no valid marriage without one of these antecedents, there could, without one or both of them, be no consummation according to law. But these new conditions introduced by the Code were not long acceptable to the Legislature, for, before they had been operative for a single year, the Act of December 14, 1868 (Pamph. Laws, 49), was passed, by which section 1658 of the Code was repealed, the preamble of the Act reciting: "Whereas, by the above-cited paragraph of the Revised Code of Georgia, all marriages not solemnized in conformity with the other provisions of said Code are declared to be invalid; and whereas, said innovation upon the law as it stood before the adoption of said Revised Code will have the effect of giving rise to perplexing questions of legitimacy of children and rights of property, and to domestic unhappiness, therefore," etc. The common law as to informal marriages was thus restored and reinstated. It follows that a lawful marriage may be contracted between parties prematurely married, if at any time after arriving at the age of consent they so agree, and their marriage may become complete without the observance of any prescribed form. If Smith and wife, after he had become seventeen years of age, had actually agreed to live together as husband and wife, and had continued to cohabit accordingly, a true matrimonial relation would have been established between them. If cohabitation based on express agreement would have had this effect, why should not cohabitation based on acquiescence in their premature marriage have a like effect? Cohabitation referable to that marriage would seem to be as free from moral impurity, and as wholesome to private conscience and public order and decorum, as if it followed upon a new affirmative agreement, consciously entered into for the distinct purpose of inaugurating marriage. Indeed, if persons who unite matrimonially while too young to enter wedlock are to remain together at all after coming to the full age of discretion, it would seem that the more delicate and decorous way to do it, if they can be allowed to omit public forms, is to recognize the past as not abruptly severed from the present and the future by the wide chasm which divides illicit intercourse from matrimonial union. The making of a new agreement would necessarily bring into consciousness a suggestion of something gross and repulsive in the past cohabitation. For a young husband, on consummating his seventeenth year, to propose marriage to the wife with whom he had lived for a year or two previously as a wife, might be necessary under a system of law such as that which the Code attempted to introduce; but we cannot think it necessary under the old system, which the Legislature designed to reinstate, and did reinstate, by the Repealing Act of 1868. While the Code put an implied negative upon the power of ratification except in the two instances enumerated, it failed to negative the power in any express terms, and we think the implied negative underwent an implied repeal by the Act of 1868. The only formidable obstacle to this construction is the general leading doctrine that void contracts are not curable by ratification. But marriage is a peculiar contract, and the marriage of infants, when over the age of seven years, but under the full age of consent, is peculiar in the law of marriage itself. Indeed, the distinction between void and voidable, as applied to contracts of infants generally, is involved in much confusion. 3 Kent, Com. 234, Tyler, Infancy, § 8.

In all our books, except the Code, the contracts of infants are treated as generally voidable; yet the Code says (§ 2781). "The contracts of an infant under twenty-one years of age are void, except for necessities," etc. But coming back to the contract of marriage, the authorities all agree that, under the age of seven, a child (except when reasons of state are involved) is incompetent to marry at all; but between seven and fourteen in males, and seven and twelve in females, they all agree that an inchoate and imperfect marriage may take place, which is subject to be made good by mutual ratification or confirmation after the age of consent is attained. Disability for want of age is classed with civil, not canonical, disabilities.

Shelford says (Mar. and Div. 479) that it makes a marriage contract void ab initio, not merely voidable.

Bishop says (1 Mar. and Div. §§ 147, 150, 153) that the marriage is inchoate or imperfect, and may be affirmed; that it is voidable, not void.

Addison (3 Cont. § 1874) says it is inchoate and imperfect, not absolutely void.

Pollock (Cont. *57) says it is not absolutely void, but good, if agreed to at the age of consent.

Story (1 Cont. § 194) says it is voidable at the will of either party.

Schouler (Dom. Rel. § 34) says it is neither strictly void nor strictly voidable, but rather inchoate and imperfect.

Stewart (Mar. and Div. §§ 51, 58, 148) declares it void to all intents and purposes unless and until duly confirmed.

Blackstone, after treating canonical disabilities, and saying that they make marriage voidable, and not ipso facto void, until sentence of nullity is obtained, adds (1 Com. 435): "The other sort of disabilities are those which are created, or at least enforced, by the municipal laws. . . . These civil disabilities make the contract void ab initio, and not merely voidable; . . . and, if any persons under these legal incapacities come together, it is a meretricious, and not a matrimonial union." He then treats disability consequent upon having a living wife or husband, and proceeds thus: "The next legal disability is want of age. This is sufficient to avoid all other contracts, on account of the imbecility of judgment in the parties contracting; a fortiori, therefore, it ought to avoid this, the most important contract of any. Therefore, if a boy under fourteen, or a girl under twelve years of age, marries, this marriage is only inchoate and imperfect; and, when either of them comes to the age of consent aforesaid, they may disagree and declare the marriage void, without any divorce or sentence in the spiritual court. This is founded on the civil law. . . . And in our law it is so far a marriage that, if at the age of consent they agree to continue together, they need not be married again." To the same effect, see 1 Minor, Inst. 263, 264.

Tyler on Infancy, § 234, says: "Of course, if the parties cohabit as husband and wife after attaining the age of consent, the marriage is affirmed, and cannot be avoided."

Lord Coke (1 Inst. 79a) uses this language: "The time of agreement or disagreement when they marrie infra annos nubiles, is for the woman at twelve or after, and for the man at fourteen or after, and there need be no new marriage if they so agree; but disagree they cannot before the said ages, and then they may disagree and marrie againe to others without any divorce; and, if they once after give consent, they can never disagree after."

From Burn (3 Eccl. Law, 394) it appears that espousals could supervene upon a void marriage, and that, though they who give girls unto boys under the age of seven years do nothing, espousals would begin after the seventh year if it appeared by word or deed that the parties continued in the same mind. The latest, and perhaps the most distinct, instance of void marriage furnishing a basis for the conjugal relation by acquiescence or ratification, is that of slaves after the change of their status from slavery to freedom.

Mr. Bishop (1 Mar. & Div. § 163), in commenting upon this class of cases, says: "If the parties, having been married while slaves in the form usual among this class of persons, live together as husband and wife after they are emancipated, this, their subsequent mutual acknowledgment, should be held to complete the act of matrimony, so as to make them lawfully and fully married from the time at which such subsequent living together commenced. In those localities in which mutual consent constitutes of itself, without any superadded forms, perfect matrimony, the facts thus indicated would seem to be sufficient without any aid from what took place during slavery; and, where a superadded ceremony is necessary, there appears no reason why such ceremony, performed during slavery,—whether it was not the same which the law made necessary to constitute marriage between whites, still it was the ceremony which the law of usage had established for the blacks,—should not be deemed to combine with the consent which passed after emancipation, so as to make the nuptials complete. We have seen that such is the law of marriage celebrated during a temporary insanity of the parties, or celebrated when they were too young to pass the consent which constitutes complete matrimony; and in future pages we shall see that the same rule applies to cases of fraud, of impotence and perhaps of some other impediments."

As in the case of slaves, so in that of children under the age of consent, by our law, there is no penalty imposed upon the matrimonial parties. They do not, by the mere act of marrying or going through the form of marriage, commit any offence. The marriage of such persons is not so much contrary to law as unauthorized by law. Indeed, it stands related to criminal law precisely as did the marriage of boys under fourteen, and of girls under twelve, by the common law. The only change made by the Code, as it now stands, since the repeal wrought by the Act of 1868 above cited, is that the age of consent is moved upward, and the term "void" is applied to the marriage by express statute. But the same Statute applies the term to marriages procured by force or fraud, and yet it expressly allows them to become valid by ratification. This shows there is no absolute incompatibility—no positive incongruity—between a void marriage and a marriage which is susceptible of being ratified, and thereby made valid. Whether its validity is to date from the time of ratification only, or from the original, imperfect and incomplete marriage, we need not undertake now to determine, for the present controversy does not involve that question. All we hold is that such a marriage as we have under consideration is capable of being ratified when the parties arrive at the age of consent, and that continuous cohabitation as husband and wife after the attainment of that age, is, or may be, sufficient evidence of such ratification. Of course, if either of the parties, notwithstanding their competency as to age, should be wanting in mental capacity to agree to the marriage, that would render him or her incapable of confirming it by ratification. The view we take of the main question involved in the case renders a new trial necessary.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

John B. WITTY, Appt.,

MICHIGAN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.

(....Ind....)

Blanks in the body of a note where the amount and place of payment should be named will not render the note non-negotiable, if the amount is expressed in figures at the head of the note, especially under a statute making negotiable any written promise to pay money which is signed by the promisor.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount due upon a certain alleged promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Hanna, for appellant:

Bills and notes must express the sum for which they are given in the body of the instrument; and an instrument in the form of a note, given for a blank sum, though superscribed with the correct amount and transferred in that condition, is not a promissory note.

Mr. Horace Speed for appellee.

Berkshire, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the appellee against the appellant on the following writing:

Four months after date I promise to pay to the order of the Michigan Mutual Life Insurance Company ——— dollars, and five per cent attorney's fees thereon per annum from date until paid, value received, without relief from valuation or appraisement laws of the State of Indiana. The indorsers jointly and severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and nonpayment of this note, and expressly agree, jointly and severally, that the holder may renew or extend the time of payment hereof from time to time, and receive interest, in advance or otherwise, from either of the makers or indorsers for any extension so made, without releasing them hereon. Negotiable and payable at ———.

J. B. Witty.

Nov. 28th—81—84. Indiana.

The appellee in its complaint did not ask for a reformation of the instrument, but relied on it as a promissory note complete in itself. The appellant answered by the general denial only. The cause was submitted to the court at special term, and a finding made for the appellee. The appellant filed a motion for a new trial, which the court overruled, and he excepted. An appeal was taken to general term, and upon the errors assigned the judgment at special term was affirmed, and from the judgment in general term this appeal is prosecuted.

There is but one question presented for our consideration: Is the written instrument, as it appears in the record, an enforceable obligation? We are of the opinion that it is,—if not so otherwise, by virtue of § 5501, Rev. Stat. 1881,*—and is negotiable by indorsement. It is signed by the appellant, and, when taken as an entirety, we think it contains a promise to pay $147.70, together with 5 per cent attorney's fees. By the very terms of the instrument the appellant obligates himself to pay to the appellee "dollars," and it is expressly recited that the promise rests upon a valuable consideration. No one can read the writing without at once coming to the conclusion that the appellant intended to obligate himself to the appellee for the payment of some definite amount of money, and that the appellee understood that it was receiving such an obligation. Though there may be some formal imperfections in the written obligation or contract which parties have entered into, if it contains matter sufficient to enable the court to ascertain the terms and conditions of the obligation or contract to which the parties intended to bind themselves, it is sufficient.

In the language of Lord Campbell in Warrington v. Early, 2 El. & Bl. 768: "The contract must be collected from the four corners of the document, and no part of what appears there is to be excluded." We can imagine no good reason why the marginal figures upon the writing in question should be disregarded. We know, as a part of the commercial history of the country, that the universal practice has been, for a period so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, to represent by superscription in figures upon all obligations for the payment of money the amount or sum which is written in the body of the instrument. The superscription is always intended to represent the amount found in the body of the instrument, and not a different amount. If, therefore, an obligation is found where there is a promise to pay "dollars," but the number of dollars in the body of the instrument is blank, and the margin of the instrument is found to contain a superscription which states a number of dollars, why, in view of the usage or custom which has so long prevailed, should the body of the instrument not be aided by the superscription? We think in such a case the figures found in the margin should be taken as the amount which the obligor intended to obligate himself to pay, and the obligation enforced accordingly.

We do not think in such a case that the courts would be justified in disregarding the evident intention of the parties, as indicated by the superscription upon the paper, and in holding the instrument void for uncertainty, or on the ground that it is not a perfect writing; and especially are we of the opinion stated in view of the liberal Statute which we have on the subject of promissory notes and other written obligations, and their negotiation. Section 5501, supra. In the case under consideration, the action is between the original parties to the instrument, and upon it in the form and condition in which it was executed; and therefore we do not think it would be profitable to consider questions which might arise where the obligation is made payable at a bank, the blank number of dollars afterwards filled in by the payee, and indorsed by him to an innocent holder for value before maturity.

As to whether the writing would be a negotiable instrument in its present condition but for our Statute, we find some conflict of authority. We cite the following authorities for and against the proposition. For: Ice v. Farmers Bank, 2 Allen, 286; Shoemaker v. French, 18 Met. 262; Petty v. Pleiser, 31 Tex. 169; Corgan v. Frew, 39 Ill. 31; Williamson v. Smith, 1 Coldw. 1. Against: Norwich Bank v. Hyde, 13 Conn. 279; Edwards, Bills and Notes, 166; Hollen v. Davis, 59 Iowa, 444, 44 Am. Rep. 686, with note.

We find no error in the record.
Judgment affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Wyley G. COOPER

RICHMOND & DANVILLE R. CO.

(....Fed. Rep....)

"The circuit court will not inquire into the truth of the affidavit and grounds for removal where a foreign corporation, defendant in the cause, files a petition for removal accompanied by an affidavit made by a proper person, stating that, of affiant's own knowledge, from prejudice and local influence, the petitioner will not be able to obtain justice in the state courts.

MOTION to remand to the state court a case removed therefrom on the alleged ground of prejudice and local influence. Denied.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff, in support of the motion:

The defendant removed this case on the mere affidavit of its superintendent that from prejudice or local influence the defendant would not be able to obtain justice in the state court. This does not sufficiently "make it appear," as required by the Act of 1887. The change of the verbiage from the Local Prejudice Act of 1867 meant something. Under the Act of 1887, the existence of prejudice or local influence should be "made to appear" by competent and sufficient evidence. A mere affidavit that it exists, no matter how strongly it is stated, is nothing more than the opinion or conclusion of the affiant, and is not competent evidence. Facts and circumstances should be shown to exist from which the court could draw its own conclusion. The defendant did nothing more than was required by the Act of 1867 in this case.

Messrs. Jackson & Jackson and Pope & Barrow for defendant, contra.

Newman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case removed to this court from the state court under the Act of March 3, 1887, by the defendant corporation, on the ground of "prejudice and local influence." The questions for determination arise over the sufficiency of the affidavit made on behalf of the defendant, and on which the order for removal was made. In connection with the petition, in setting forth the facts as to the amount involved, the citizenship of the parties and the residence of the plaintiff and defendant, the subject matter of the suit and the prayer for removal, which is sworn to by counsel, defendant presented an affidavit made by S. G. Hammond, acting superintendent of the road in Georgia, who states therein that "from very many years' experience in railroad matters, and especially with litigation against the defendant, Richmond & Danville Railroad, in this particular, in the courts of Atlanta, in said Fulton County, State of Georgia, I know that from prejudice and local influence defendant will not be able to obtain justice in the Superior Court of Fulton County of the State of Georgia, nor in any other court to which the petitioner may, under the laws of said State, have the right, on account of such prejudice or local influence, to remove said cause."

The motion of the plaintiff is in these words: "And now comes the plaintiff in the above-stated case and makes application to the court to examine into the truth of the affidavit and grounds for removal of said case to this court, and remand said case to the Superior Court of Fulton County on the ground that it is not true that the said defendant is unable to obtain justice in said state court, from prejudice or local influence."

Two questions have been argued and submitted: first, whether or not the court was justified in signing the order for removal on the affidavit of defendant's acting superintendent, above quoted; second, whether or not the court will now hear evidence as to the existence of prejudice or local influence, or, in other words, ascertain by evidence aliunde as to the existence or non-existence of the grounds for removal. There is decided conflict in the decisions and opinions of the various circuit courts upon both of these questions. The following decisions are upon this subject: Plak v. Henaria, 23 Fed. Rep. 417; Short v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 23 Fed. Rep. 114; Hills v. Richmond & D. R. Co., Id. 81; Whelan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 25 Fed. Rep. 849; Plak v. Henaria, Id. 280; Taylor County v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., Id. 161; Malone v. Richmond & D. R. Co., Id. 625; Southworth v. Reid, 26 Fed. Rep. 451; Huskins v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co., 27 Fed. Rep. 504; Goldworthy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 28 Fed. Rep. 760; Dennison v. Brown, Id. 525; Amy v. Manning, Id. 525; Carron & R. L. Co. v. Hotelaw, 29 Fed. Rep. 625; Hales v. Burns, 40 Fed. Rep. 311; Maniak v. Union Ins. Co., Id. 269.

After a careful examination of all the cases, we are disposed to adopt the conclusion, and the reasoning by which he arrives at that conclusion, of Judge Jackson in the case of Whelan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., supra, and to hold that where the petition for removal is accompanied by an affidavit on behalf of the defendant, by a person authorized to make it, stating of his own knowledge, as in this case, the existence of prejudice and local influence, it is sufficient to justify the order for removal; in other words, when it is "made to appear" to this court by affidavit made on the affiant's own knowledge, that the prejudice and local influence exist, that it is a compliance with the Statute. There is nothing whatever in the Act of 1887 to show how it shall be "made to appear" to this court that the prejudice and local influence exist, and unless subdivision 3 of section 580 of the Revised Statutes (Act 1887) remains of force, there is no law prescribing a method of procedure.

The language of the court in the Whelan Case, supra, is as follows: "It is further contended that no proper proceedings have been had or taken by the defendant, even conceding its right of removal, to effect such removal. By the 3d section of the Act of 1887 the steps required to be taken in removal cases generally are indicated, but that section excepts from its operation cases sought to be removed on the ground of local prejudice, in respect to which clause 4 of amended section 3 prescribes no mode or method of effecting that class of removals. What procedure may, then, be adopted by the party seeking or entitled to remove under this clause? In conferring the right Congress certainly intended that some process for its exercise should be within reach of the party so entitled. We think the method of procedure for effectuating the right so conferred by said clause may be found in the two paragraphs of § 630, Rev. Stat., which succeed the third sub-division of said section. These two paragraphs prescribing the method of accomplishing removals are not in conflict with the Act of 1887, and may therefore be considered as still in force, and furnishing the proper and appropriate remedy to be employed by the party seeking a removal, and in making it appear to said circuit court that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in the state courts. It is not indicated in the Act of 1887 how, or in what manner, the fact that the removing party cannot obtain justice in the local courts on account of such prejudice or local influence shall be made 'to appear' to the circuit court. Judge Dundy, in Plak v. Henaria, 23 Fed. Rep. 417-421 (Nov. 20 1887), held that the last clause of section 630, Rev. Stat., which immediately follows sub-division 3 of said section, might reasonably be looked to as furnishing the machinery for making it 'appear' to the circuit court that the petitioning party could not obtain justice in the state court because of prejudice or local influence. If this suggestion of that learned judge, in which I concur, is not deemed correct, then, in the absence of all provision as to the method or mode of presenting the application for removal, this court would be left free to adopt proper and suitable rules, prescribing and regulating the practice in such cases; and such rule would naturally be made to conform to the practice and procedure heretofore in force in like cases. In either view of the subject, we think the mode adopted by the defendant in this case is not open to any serious objection. A formal petition, properly sworn to, was duly presented to this court, setting forth all the conditions required by the Act to entitle said defendant to remove the suit. This petition was accompanied and supported by the affidavit of the proper officer of the defendant company, stating, not what the affiant had reason to and did believe in respect to the existence of local prejudice, but in direct terms, and in the very language of the Act, "that from prejudice and local influence said railroad company will not be able to obtain justice in said courts of common pleas, or in any other state court to which it has, under the laws of the State of Ohio, a right, on account of such prejudice or local influence, to remove said cause," etc. This makes a prima facie showing as to what was required "to be made to appear to the circuit court."

In the case of Hills v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 22 Fed. Rep. 31, decided in this court by the district judge presiding therein, and in the case of Fisk v. Henric, supra, decided by Judge Deady in the Circuit Court of Oregon, it was held that the old Act, so far as the method of procedure for removal was concerned, remained of force, and that when an affidavit was made in accordance with the Act of 1867 it was sufficient to justify removal. It seems the better practice now, however, even if it be that it is not required by the law, that the existence of the prejudice and local influence should be stated of the affiant's own knowledge. That has been done in this case, and we think the affidavit was sufficient to justify the order for removal.

Now, the affidavit named being sufficient to authorize the order for removal, will the court permit the other party to traverse the grounds of the affidavit and bear evidence as to the existence of prejudice and local influence? We adopt the conclusion of the court in the Whelan Case upon this subject also. The argument of Judge Jackson upon this subject, in the case named (pp. 361-366), leaves nothing to be added by us. It seems to us conclusive upon this question. We have had occasion in this case and in some other similar cases, arising here, to examine a copy of the bill (presented informally and discussed in a former case) which passed the House and after amendments in the Senate was concurred in by the House, and resulted in the Act of March 3, 1867. This shows the bill as it passed the House, and the various particulars in which it was amended, by striking out and inserting language, in the Senate. From this it appears that as the bill went from the House to the Senate, it read, so far as pertinent to the questions here, as follows: "When it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that from prejudice or local influence," etc. In the Senate, the words "the satisfaction of the" were stricken and the words "said circuit," before court, inserted, so that it read as it went back from the Senate to the House, and was passed as the Act now reads, "When it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court," etc. It will be seen from the history of this part of the Act that by the House Bill it was contemplated that it should be made to appear "to the satisfaction of the court" (probably the state court), that the prejudice or local influence existed, and that the Senate changed it so that it should clearly provide for the application to be made to the circuit court, and refused to agree to the language which was stricken, above quoted.

This undoubtedly indicates an intention not to allow a provision looking to investigation and inquiry as to the existence of prejudice or local influence to become a part of the Act. If this part of the history of the Act of 1867 be a proper matter for consideration, it greatly strengthens the argument in favor of construing the clause in question as indicated above. The Supreme Court of the United States in Blake v. National City Bank, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 307 (23 L. ed. 118), adopted this method of interpreting an Act of 1870, taxing incomes from dividends, etc. The rule there announced is that "a badly expressed and apparently contradictory enactment (such as the one above mentioned) interpreted by a reference to the journal of Congress, where it appeared that that the peculiar phraseology was the result of an amendment introduced without due reference to language in the original bill."

If the history of this Act in the respects named be the proper subject for consideration, it seems to us conclusive upon the questions now presented, and clearly negatives the idea that any investigation or inquiry such as we are requested to make here as to the existence of grounds of removal, was contemplated by Congress. Irrespective of this, however, it appears that when Congress came to deal with the cases which had been removed to this court by plaintiff, before the passage of the Act, it provided that "the circuit court shall, on application of either party, examine into the truth of said affidavit, and the grounds thereof, and unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court that said party will not be able to obtain justice in such said court, it shall cause the same to be remanded thereto." It appears from this that when an examination into the truth of the affidavit and the ground thereof was contemplated, it was so stated in express terms, and the statement of it there, we think, gives emphasis to its omission in the preceding part of section 3 in making provision for removal by the defendant. So that giving no weight whatever to the history of the Act, and construing it by what appears upon its face, the clear statement of the duty of the court in one case, and its entire omission in the other, is very significant and leads to the conclusion that in the latter case no such duty was intended to be imposed.

Motion denied.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

MAYOR, etc., OF BIRMINGHAM, Appts.,

John KLEIN et al.

(....Ala....)

A local assessment against property to pay for pavements constructed along its front, to be apportioned with reference to the benefits which are assumed to accrue to the owners of the property, is not a tax within the meaning of constitutional provisions requiring that "all taxes levied on property in this State shall be assessed in exact proportion to the value of the property," and limiting the amount of taxes that can be levied or collected in any one year.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in a proceeding to enforce payment of certain local assessments made for street improvements. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Moore, Cahalan & Weakley, for appellants;

The assessment authorized by the Act of the General Assembly is in no just sense a tax, as that term is used in our Constitution.

Article 13, § 15, Constitution of 1901, was as follows: "It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated towns, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment and contracting of debt."

The use of the word "assessment" showed that the word "taxation" did not include them. People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec.

NOTE.—Taxation; constitutional restriction of power; valuation, equality and uniformity.

A constitutional provision that "all property shall be taxed according to its value," the same to be equal and uniform throughout the State in the manner of ascertaining the same, has been held to apply only to state revenue, and not to taxes levied for local purposes. Washington v. State, 18 Ark. 728; Chambers v. Battersea, 40 Cal. 407; Allen v. Galveston, 51 Tex. 302; Re Cascaibo and Moreau Streets, 20 La. Ann. 497; Hundley v. Lincoln Park Comrs. 67 Ill. 559; Moore v. People, 108 Ill. 378; Francis v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 19 Kan. 318.

Such constitutional provisions apply only to taxation for general purposes of government. Re Washington Avenue, 66 Pa. 262, 2 Desty. Taxn. 1251-1253; Norfolk v. Ellis, 26 Gratt. 227.

That special assessments for local improvements according to benefits may be laid notwithstanding the restrictions of the Constitution as to valuation of property assessed, and uniformity in the mode of assessment, has been very generally sustained. Chicago v. Larned, 24 Ill. 323; Bedard v. Hall, 44 Ill. 91; Wright v. Chicago, 46 Ill. 44; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 228; Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329; *Turpin v. Eagle Creek & L. W. L. G. R. Cannot be imposed where the benefit is general. See note to Moore v. Barry (S. C.) 4 L. R. A. 294.

That an assessment is called a tax in the statute will not preclude its being sustained as an assessment. People v. Austin, 67 Cal. 322.

Assessment for special benefits.

The city council is solely vested with power to determine what proportion of the total cost of a local improvement shall be paid by the public by general taxation. Watson v. Chicago, 1 West. Rep. 620, 115 Ill. 78.

A provision in an ordinance "that commissioners shall assess to the property benefited," means that the benefited property shall pay the amount of benefits to the property, the public to pay all in excess thereof. Ibid.

The determination of the city council that the excess, if any, shall be paid by general taxation, is binding on the commissioners, and they cannot add to or lessen such amount. Ibid.

When the ordinance provides how much of the cost shall be paid by general taxation, that amount, neither more nor less, is so to be paid. Ibid.

The ordinance providing for an improvement, the cost whereof shall be paid by special assessment of property benefited, the remainder to be paid by general taxation, is authorized by the Act to Incorporate Cities and Villages. The provisions of § 139 do not apply where the city authorities fix the amount paid by general taxation. Watson v. Chicago, 1 West. Rep. 622, 115 Ill. 78.

Mason, Roquemore, White & McKenna also filed a brief on behalf of appellant:

An assessment for improvements is not considered as a burden, but an equivalent or compensation for the enhanced value which the property derives from the improvement.

People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 420; Brooks v. Baltimore, 48 Md. 265; Shackan v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 50 Mo. 155; Stein v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 617.

In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the power of the General Assembly to authorize municipal corporations to improve streets and sidewalks at the expense of adjacent landed proprietors is undoubted.

Irwin v. Mobile, 57 Ala. 6; Stein v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 591, Burroughs, Texn. § 45, note 1, p. 400, and cases cited therein; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 479; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 616-735 et seq., § 761; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 420.

As opposed to the doctrine laid down in Mable v. Dargan, 45 Ala. 310, we have in our own State, and from this court, the following cases:

Stein v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 591, Irwin v. Mobile, 57 Ala. 6; Winter v. Montgomery, 38 Ala. 589; Western U. Tel. Co. v. State, 30 Ala. 278; Strenna v. Montgomery, 36 Ala. 340.

Constitutional declarations to the effect that all taxes levied on property must be in proportion to its value do not place an inhibition upon the grant of power to municipal corporations to make "local assessments."

Municipal corporations: authority of under delegated powers.

The Legislature is authorized to vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns and villages with power to make local improvements by means of special assessments without restriction as to the property to be assessed. McLean County v. Bloomington, 100 Ill. 308.

Grants of power to make local assessments are strictly construed, and must be strictly followed. Keene v. Denver, 10 Colo. 113.

Corporate authorities of cities and villages are vested with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation, or both, of contiguous property, as they shall by ordinance prescribe; and in such cases the doctrine of equality and uniformity does not apply, as in cases of taxation for all other purposes. *Murphy v. Where a council is given power to make assessments upon premises abutting on improved streets § L. R. A.

and upon other premises benefited thereby, it must designate the taxing district, it cannot delegate power to do so. Whitney v. Hudson, 12 West. Rep. 301, 60 Mich. 129.

Under a city charter providing that the common council "shall determine and prescribe the limits within which private property shall be deemed benefited by the proposed improvement and be assessed and charged," the council must define the assessment district; but whether any particular piece of property therein is benefited is a question for the jury. *Kansas City v. Mr. Jackson E. Long, for appellees:

An assessment is a tax.

There is no recognition in our Constitution of a local assessment as not included in the general word "tax."

Ala. Const., Stein v. Mobile, 34 Ala. 611; Mobile v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 58 Ala. 584.

Decisions under constitutions expressly recognizing a local assessment as distinct from and not included in the general word "taxation" can have no weight in the determination of the question here, the condition being different.

Taylor v. Chandler, 9 Helsk. 349, 24 Am. Rep. 308; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 420, 55 Am. Dec. 266; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co. 28 Cal. 345; Bouvier, L. Dict. Assessment.

Where merely the word "taxation" is used, and not "all," the language in its ordinary signification comprehends all taxation.

Mobile v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 58 Ala. 588.

The word "tax" or "taxation," when similarly used in a Constitution, applies to all taxes—a tax such as this is included.

Mobile v. Dargan, 45 Ala. 310; Taylor v. Chandler, supra; Chicago v. Larned, 34 Ill. 208; Irwin v. Mobile, 57 Ala. 6; Mobile v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 58 Ala. 579; *Pray v. Rep. 723; Mobile v. Royal St. R. Co. 45 Ala. 322.

The opinion in Mobile v. Dargan was rendered in 1871, construing a clause in the Constitution of 1868. Our present Constitution was adopted in 1875 and that identical clause was adopted without change. This was a legislative adoption of that judicial construction.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves the constitutionality of an Act "to Authorize and Empower the Mayor and Aldermen of Birmingham to Improve the Sidewalks of the City of Birmingham, Alabama, at the Cost of Parties whose Property Abuts such Sidewalks," approved February 16, 1885. Sess. Acts 1884-85, pp. 620-622.

Those sections of the Act which are necessary to an understanding of the point under consideration are the following: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Alabama that the Mayor and Aldermen of Birmingham shall have full power and authority

For re-paving.

The paving of a street may be renewed at the expense of the owners of abutting lots. Coates v. Dubuque, 30 Iowa, 500.

The question whether the renewal of the paving of a street is demanded for the public good is to be determined by the city council; and their determination is conclusive, except for want of authority, or for fraud or oppression. Ibid.

That a street has been once paved, and the cost paid by assessment, does not render invalid an assessment for re-paving with improved pavement. State v. Newark, 3 Cent. Rep. 234, 45 N. J. L. 101.

An assessment, under Act March 27, 1882, is not defeated on the ground that the tax ordinance did not mention particular streets. Ibid.

Assessments for benefits may be levied to pay for the re-paving of a street, although the cost of the work is already raised by a general tax. Ibid.

Under a general power to construct sidewalks the expense of the removal of a sidewalk and re-paving of that portion of street, where such action is necessary, may be assigned to the general fund appropriated to the general expenses of the paving department. Atty-Gen. v. Boston, 3 New Eng. Rep. 622, 142 Mass. 200.

In Pennsylvania it has been held that the cost of re-paving a public street cannot be legally charged against the property fronting thereon, notwithstanding the original cost of paving the street was paid out of the public treasury. Williamsport v. Buck, 126 Pa. 147.

The power to assess the expense of re-paving or re-planking a street on the adjacent proprietors, who had borne the expense of the original construction, has been generally affirmed. Gurnee v. Chicago, 40 Ill. 166; Bradley v. McAtee, 7 Bush, 607; Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 6 Bush, 8 L. R. A.

Cost of grading.

Special assessments are made for the cost of grading streets, or changing their grade. Buffalo Cemetery Assn. v. Buffalo, 112 N. Y. 61; Wray v. Pittsburgh, 46 Pa. 265; State v. Dean, 23 N. J. L. 506; Holmes v. Jersey City, 19 N. J. Eq. 206; Lafayette v. Fowler, 34 Ind. 140.

The cost of grading a city street, as distinguished from paving it, cannot be assessed to the owners of the abutting lots. Code, § 465.

But where grading is necessary to secure a proper foundation for a pavement, and the grading is done as an incident to the paving, the cost may be regarded as a part of the cost of paving, for which the owners of abutting lots may be taxed. Code, § 466; Schofield v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 603.

Rule of apportionment.

Every valid assessment must be based on a legally ordained basis of apportionment. Detroit v. Daly, 13 West. Rep. 151, 45 Mich. 508.

Local assessments may be laid either in proportion to the benefits or in proportion to the frontage of the lands benefited. Mots v. Detroit, 12 Mich. 66; Hoyt v. East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 30.

An assessment apportioned according to benefits is a legitimate exercise of the taxing power. State v. Newark, 37 N. J. L. 191; Seattle v. Yealer, 1 Wash. T. 371.

to cause and procure all sidewalks along the streets, avenues and alleys now established, or hereafter to be established, in said city, to be graded, leveled, curbed, graveled, slagged, cindered, paved or macadamized, or to be re-graded, re-leveled, re-curbed, re-graveled, re-slagged, re-cindered, re-paved or re-macadamized, in such manner and by such methods and with such material as they may deem best and proper. Sec. 2. Be it further enacted that the said Mayor and Aldermen of Birmingham shall have the power to have such work done, or cause the same to be done, and the expense thereof shall, after the completion thereof, be by said Mayor and Aldermen of Birmingham assessed upon the abutting owners of lands or lots lying along and adjacent to the streets or alleys along which such work is done, in proportion to the amount of the benefit accruing to such abutting owner; and all such assessments shall be and constitute a lien upon the lands and lots respectively upon which they shall be so assessed.

It thus appears that the purpose of the Act and its effect, if valid, is to authorize local assessments against property to pay for pavements constructed along its front; the cost, as between different owners, to be apportioned with reference to the benefits which are assumed to accrue to them severally from the betterment. However the relative benefits are to be determined in a given case, and the sum to be charged on a particular lot ascertained,—whether by reference to the superficial area of the property or the length of its abutment on the sidewalk, or the uses to which it is devoted as being to a greater or less extent facilitated by the improvement, or the enhancement thereby of its value compared with other property subject to the gross assessment,—one thing is assured: that the assessment is not made with reference to the value of the property, nor with

The general rule for determining the amount of the benefit is to ascertain the market value of the property with the improvement and without it; the excess of value with the improvement over that without it being the amount of benefit. Elwood v. Rochester, 48 Hun. 102.

The provisions and policy of the Revised Statutes as to the assessment and valuation of lots for the cost of local improvements were intended to equalize the expense upon all the lots benefited. Parmales v. Youngstown, 1 West. Rep. 48, 49 Ohio St. 162.

A statute apportioning the cost of street improvements to lots or parcels of ground extending from the street to be improved to the centre of the block, according to the value of the ground exclusive of improvements, is not unconstitutional. Newman v. Emporia, 41 Kan. 582.

When an assessment for a public improvement has been levied under a statute which required the assessors to assess all the lands benefited, the Legislature cannot authorize a further assessment for the improvement to be levied against other lands of the same owners, so long as the original assessment remains valid against those owners. State v. Essex Public Road Board, 51 N. J. L. 162.

If in the judgment of the assessors the special benefits of a public improvement extend at all to a lot of land which is so circumstanced that a reasonable owner would use it or offer it for sale only as an entirety, then they should levy the assessment upon the whole lot, and not merely upon such part of the lot as lies within lines previously fixed by them as the limit of assessable benefits. Ibid.;

Mode of assessment.

The Legislature is not confined to one mode of assessment but may adopt the front-foot, the square-foot, the square-acre or the ad valorem basis, in its discretion. Daily v. Swope, 47 Miss. 557; Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 522.

When the charter requires the property to be assessed according to benefits received, it cannot be assessed according to frontage. Ordin v. Hudson, 29 N. J. L. 104; St. John v. East St. Louis, 50 Ill. 82.

In Arkansas paving taxes must be assessed according to the value of the lots assessed, and it is not competent to apportion the assessment according to frontage. Peay v. Little Rock, 23 Ark. 21; Palmer v. Way, 8 Colo. 164. See Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 242; Chicago v. Larned, 84 Ill. 302.

Municipal assessments for the improvement of streets must be ad valorem, and not according to frontage, and must be upon both vacant and occupied lots similarly situated. The exception of one § 1. R. A.

violates the constitutional principle of uniformity in the imposition of the burden. Monticello v. Banks, 45 Ark. 251.

The front-foot rule.

It is not unconstitutional to provide for the apportionment of the expenses of local improvements on adjacent property by the "front foot." Rutherford v. Hamilton, 97 Mo. 242.

A delegation of authority to levy assessments for local improvements in proportion to the frontage of the land assessed, and not in proportion to benefits, is not in violation of the California Constitution. Jennings v. Le Breton, 20 Cal. 2.

Assessments for special improvements, under Rev. Stat., §§ 2262, 2270, were intended to equalize the expense upon land benefited. Where there is benefited land not subdivided into lots, and its value is found by the front foot, such value is its value for taxation. Parmales v. Youngstown, 1 West. Rep. 48, 49 Ohio St. 162.

Prima facie, all land within the city limits is subject to the frontage rule; and the burden of proving land rural rests upon the owner. Stewart v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 374.

Where assessment by the front foot has been made, each lot is separately liable. Younglove v. Heckman, 1 West. Rep. 22, 49 Ohio St. 82.

No power exists to charge rural property for paving roads by the foot-front measure applicable to city property. Philadelphia v. Keith (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 222.

The fact that application of the front-foot rule of assessment for municipal improvements will amount to more than the value of a long, narrow lot fronting on the street lengthwise is no objection to the application of such rule in assessing the lot. Harrisburg v. McCormick, 125 Pa. 212.

Where a tax is to be levied upon lots and lands upon the streets to be improved in proportion to frontage, the lots are only those upon the line of the streets upon which they front or abut. Wilbur v. Springfield, 12 West. Rep. 222, 120 Ill. 202.

In California it has been held that the assessment of abutting property in proportion to its frontage is not in violation of the constitutional provision as to valuation, equality and uniformity. Burnett v. Sacramento, 12 Cal. 72; People v. Burr, 12 Cal. 242; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co. 20 Cal. 242; Emery v. Bradford, 20 Cal. 72; Wain v. Mathews, 20 Cal. 122; Taylor v. Palmer, 21 Cal. 242; Crosby v. Lyon, 27 Cal. 242; Chambers v. Battersea, 40 Cal. 457; Reclamation Dist. v. Hager, 6 Sawy. 242; Oakland Pav. Co. v. Rier, 20 Cal. 270; Whiting v. Quackenbush, 44 Cal. 201.

reference to the limitations on the rate of municipal taxation. It is manifest, therefore, that if the assessment is a "tax," within the meaning of the Constitution of Alabama, the Statute authorizing it is repugnant to section 1 of article 11 of that instrument, which requires that "all taxes levied on property in this State shall be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property," and also to section 7 of that article, which provides that "no city, town or other municipal corporation . . . shall levy or collect a larger rate of taxation in any one year, on the property thereof, than one half of one per centum of the value of such property as assessed for state taxation during the preceding year."

There is no longer any doubt but that organic limitations on the taxing power, though expressed in general terms, apply as well to the exercise of that power through the medium of municipal corporations and for municipal purposes as to its exercise directly by the Legislature for state purposes, and hence the requirement that all taxes levied on property in this State shall be assessed ad valorem would obtain, with respect to municipal taxation, even in the absence of the other provision quoted, requiring such taxation to be based on the value of property as assessed for state taxation. Mobile v. Stonecrull, 122 Ala. 570.

Both the sections noted therefore bear upon assessments for municipal purposes; and, if either covers the local assessment under consideration, the law authorizing it must fail. It is a fair, if not necessary, inference that the terms "taxes" and "taxation" have respectively the same meaning wherever found in article 11 of the Constitution. The "taxes" which must be laid on a basis of value in section 1 constitute the "taxation" referred to for state purposes in section 4, for county purposes in section 5 and for municipal purposes in section 7, and therefore the only municipal taxation which the Constitution requires to be assessed in exact proportion to the value of property is that embraced in the terms of section 7. The most liberal construction of which the language of that section is susceptible will not admit of its application to local assessment to provide for local improvements of sidewalks. By the very terms employed throughout the article, the taxes and taxation, whether state, county or municipal, are those which make up the general revenues of the one or the other political division, as the case may be,—revenues which come from all the property in the territory and go to defray general governmental expenditures, as distinguished from special outlays to provide for purely local exigencies. With respect to section 7, this is made to appear with great clearness by its reference to the property to which the limitation it imposes is made to apply, and by its requirement as to the assessment upon which the municipal levy must be predicated. Not only is the levy by any city to be made "on the property thereof," i. e., the whole taxable property thereof, but it must be made on "such property as assessed for state taxation during the preceding year." No such thing is known, or was known when the Constitution of 1875 was adopted, or had ever been known, as local assessments of property for state taxation. The state assessment upon which the only municipal levy treated of in the Organic Law is required to be based is a general assessment of all property within the corporate limits, and is intended, as the provisions to section 7 show, to provide a fund for the general expenses of the city government. The city's levy there limited must be put upon the whole property taxed by the State, at the valuation fixed by the State's agents. This necessarily and wholly excludes any idea of a local assessment of particular property for any purpose, or to be laid in any manner, under the Constitution. Nothing in that instrument refers, or can be made applicable, to such a local charge. If this species of taxation—for it is taxation and referable to the taxing power, though differing, as we shall see, from the "taxes" and "taxation" regulated in State Constitutions—is to be upheld, it must be referred to the sovereign power of the General Assembly, which has been curtailed only to the extent of express constitutional limitations. If article 11 contains no inhibition upon the power of the Legislature in respect to local assessments by cities and towns, the Act under consideration is valid and the assessment involved here was well laid; for no proposition is now better established in the law than that Constitutions are not in the nature of Enabling Acts, but are limitations upon the otherwise boundless powers of Legislatures, or, in other words, that the General Assembly is not to look to the Organic Law to ascertain what is permitted it to do, but only to find what inhibitions are thereby put on its action. Cooley, Const. Lim. 479, Burroughs, Texn. § 145; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 757, Jones v. Mobile, 67 Ala. 6, Dorman v. State, 34 Ala. 201; Hare v. Kennerly, 30 Ala. 605.

Having attempted to demonstrate that the assessment here could not have been made under the provisions of the Constitution either as it was made, on a basis of benefits, or even on a basis of the value of the particular property, it next becomes necessary to determine whether the Organic Law is exclusive of all other assessments against property than those of which it treats, in such sort as to amount to a prohibition upon the Legislature in respect to an assessment of the class under consideration. It is not questioned but that the power which this Statute undertakes to delegate to the municipality of Birmingham is a part of the taxing power inherent in all government, and without limitations other than those expressed in the Organic Law. It is equally free from doubt that the power of taxation is never to be taken to be surrendered by intendment or implication, and that, without an expressed surrender, clear and explicit in its terms, it must be held to reside undiminished in the Legislature. Glasgow v. Rouse, 43 Mo. 470-489, Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 6 Gill, 268, 40 Am. Dec. 581; Buttle v. Mobile, 9 Ala. 234, 44 Am. Dec. 436, note 441; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 752.

Are the provisions of article 11, referring, as we have seen, to general taxes and taxation, and to such only, expressed limitations on the power of the Legislature with respect to local assessments on property to pay for local improvements which benefit that particular property? We think not. The overwhelming weight of authority is against such a construction and in favor of the validity of such assessments. In considering the question, jurists and judges have proceeded on the theory that such charges were not taxes in the ordinary sense, or within the meaning and intent of constitutional provisions similar to those of Alabama, but that they are in the nature of compensation for a benefit peculiar to the owner of the abutting property, and traceable to him, that such assessments are not exacted for the general public welfare, and do not go to the support of governmental agencies, from the existence and maintenance of which each citizen derives a like benefit, but that they are demandable because the government has expended an equivalent sum in improving the property against which they are laid, and thereby, not the public, but the individual owner of the property improved, has been to that extent the gainer.

A tax, it is said, is a contribution to the general fund. The amount of it is taken from the individual, and nothing which benefits him individually as distinguished from the mass of citizens is given in the place of it. He pays, and by the amount he pays is poorer than he was before. Not so with an assessment of the class we are considering. The property owner pays it, but, in legal contemplation, he loses nothing. He receives the value of his money in the betterment of his property; and, in addition to this, he is benefited to the same extent that all other citizens are, in that a thoroughfare of the city in which his property is situated, and he probably lives, is improved. The authorities almost universally take such an imposition, though confessedly laid under the taxing power, out of the category of "taxes" and "taxation," as those terms are employed in organic limitations on legislative power to levy or authorize the levying of taxes, and in general statutes. Cooley, Taxn. 636-637; Burroughs, Taxn. 400-403; 3 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 752, 753, 761 et seq.; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 430; Sheehan v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 60 Mo. 155; Dergon v. Boston, 13 Allen, 238; Nichols v. Bridgeport, 23 Conn. 189; Garrett v. St. Louis, 25 Mo. 506; Cunn v. Davis County, 80 N. C. 8; Skuford v. Lincoln County, Id. 553; Hill v. Hayden, 5 Ohio St. 343; King v. Portland, 9 Or. 140; Norfolk v. Ellis, 38 Gratt. 237; Roundtree v. Galveston, 43 Tex. 612; Baltimore v. Green Mountain Cemetery Co. 7 Md. 517; Chambers v. Butterlee, 40 Cal. 407; Edgerton v. Green Cove Springs, 19 Fla. 140; Goodrich v. Winchester & D. Turnp. Co. 26 Ind. 119; Hines v. Lawrenceville, 3 Kan. 180; Municipality No. 2 v. Dunn, 10 La. Ann. 87; Mott v. Detroit, 18 Mich. 495; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Minn. 209; Mason v. Patty, 57 Minn. 379; People v. Austin, 47 Cal. 353; Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 86 Conn. 255; Hayden v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 817; Harber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Cypress (La.) 15 So. Rep. 548; Escobier P. & Mfg. Co. v. Green, 30 La. Ann. 437.

On the other hand, the decisions in three or four States are to the effect that local assessments of this character cannot be made under constitutional provisions requiring equality and uniformity of taxation and assessments in proportion to the value of property. The leading case maintaining this view is that of Chicago v. Larned, 34 Ill. 200. The conclusion is that case may perhaps find some justification in the peculiar phraseology of the constitutional provisions supposed to bear on the question, though an opposite conclusion was reached by the Virginia court on substantially the same provisions. Norfolk v. Ellis, supra.

The effect of this Illinois decision was subsequently remedied by an amendment of the Constitution. The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in Pray v. Little Rock, 22 Ark. 81, followed this Illinois decision, and another by the Wisconsin court (Works v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 243), which is, perhaps, also referable to peculiar terms of the Constitution, and which, at most, only imports doubt as to whether the requirement for uniformity of taxation applied to and defeated local assessments,—and held such local assessments could not be authorized under a constitution which required property to be taxed uniformly and according to value. This Arkansas decision is not reconcilable with the earlier case of McGahan v. Mathis, 31 Ark. 40, on substantially the same point. A like conclusion has been reached in Tennessee and Colorado; but, as in the Illinois case, the terms of the Organic Law which were supposed to enforce the result were something more than general requirements for uniformity and equality of taxation, and assessments on the basis of value. Palmer v. Way, 6 Colo. 110; Taylor v. Chandler, 9 Hoek. 340.

When to these cases are added those of Mobile v. Dergon and Mobile v. Royal St. R. Co., decided by this court, which will be presently considered more particularly, it is believed that the full array of adjudications against the constitutionality of laws like that involved here is presented. After marshalling the authorities pro and con, on this question, Judge Cooley concludes: "The fact very clearly appears that, while there is not such a concurrence of judicial opinion as would be desirable, the overwhelming weight of authority is in favor of the position that all such provisions for equality and uniformity in taxation, and for taxation by value, have no application to these special assessments" against abutting property to pay for the construction of sidewalks. Cooley, Taxn. 604.

We now recur to the two cases decided by the Supreme Court of this State, and noted above. They each involve the validity of the same Statute, and were decided at the same term, the one being cited as the authority to support the other, and the one thus cited itself being, on this point, unsupported by reference to any authority. Not only is this true, but the opinion omits no argument in support of the conclusion reached, nor enters upon any question so important—decided, for aught that appears, as upon first impression—would have elicited.

In the opinion in Mobile v. Royal St. R. Co., moreover, there is an intimation that, had the assessment been by benefits instead of by frontage, the Act authorizing it would not have been open to the objection of unconstitutionality. Very clearly, if the Constitution applied at all, it would have been equally fatal whether the assessment were by frontage or by benefits, since neither mode would meet the organic requirement of assessment in exact proportion to the value of property. Mobile v. Dargan, 45 Ala. 310; Mobile v. Royal St. R. Co. Id. 322.

Not only are these cases opposed to the great weight of judicial opinion in other States and to all authoritative texts, but they are in conflict with the later adjudication of this court.

In the case of Irwin v. Mobile, 57 Ala. 6, the Act declared in Mobile v. Dargan to have been repealed by the Constitution of 1868 again came under review with reference to an assessment which had been made before that Constitution became the supreme law of the State. This court intimated such doubt of the correctness of the decision in Dargan's Case as is implied by citing a preponderating run of authorities holding the opposite view, and by declining to again decide the point, because it was not necessary to the case in hand. The court then proceeds to pass on the validity of the law authorizing the levy of local assessments against lands to pay for improvements upon which they abut, as brought to the touch of constitutional provisions of force before the Constitution of 1868. The conclusion was that such a law was not repugnant to the provisions of the Organic Law theretofore in force. Inasmuch as the Constitutions of 1819, 1861 and 1865 each contained a clause requiring that "all lands liable to taxation in this State shall be taxed in proportion to their value," we are unable to escape the conclusion that the court took the view held by nearly all other courts, that general organic provisions for taxation by valuation have no application to local assessments for local street improvement; otherwise, it could not have reached the conclusion announced. That conclusion, therefore, is in irreconcilable conflict with the opinion in Dargan's Case, and is no more or less, in effect, than a later adjudication by this court that the former decision is unsound.

But, aside from this, the cases of Mobile v. Dargan and Mobile v. Royal St. R. Co. are unsound in principle, and opposed to the great weight of authority. It is true the clause of the Constitution involved in those cases was re-ordained after that decision was made; and ordinarily the re-enactment of a law after it has been judicially interpreted will be held to impress the judicial construction upon it. But this is not a universal canon of construction, even where identically the same language has been employed; and in this case, while section 1 of article 11 of the Constitution of 1875 is identical with section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1868, yet the presumption that the convention of 1875 intended that section should bear the construction put on it in Dargan's Case is rebutted by the succeeding sections of that article, which are new to the Constitution of 1875, and which demonstrate that the framers of the present Organic Law had in mind, and intended to provide for, regulate and limit, in and by the ordinance of article 11, only general taxation for general governmental purposes,—state, county and municipal. The rule of construction referred to, it thus appears, rests upon a presumption of intention which is rebutted by the language employed by the makers of the present Constitution. We cannot give it any operation in this case; and we cannot follow the cases relied on, and would not, even had their soundness not been already drawn in question in the case of Irwin v. Mobile, supra.

The sounder view is that taken in the very numerous cases cited above,—and, though very numerous, they are by no means all that so hold,—to the effect that provisions, whether in statutes or constitutions, relating to general taxation for state, county and municipal purposes, or either, have no application to special assessments laid against abutting property to pay for street improvements which have benefited and enhanced the value of the property so assessed. The Statute authorizing such assessments in the City of Birmingham is a valid enactment.

The judgment of the City Court, involving a contrary ruling, is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Margaret B. WHEAT et al., Appts.,

v.

G. W. DINGLE, Admr., etc., of G. J. Luhn, Deceased, Resp't.

(....S. C....)

A dividend from a decedent's assets, which are not sufficient to pay creditors in full, can be computed in favor of a mortgage creditor only on the balance of the mortgage debt, where he has accepted the proceeds of the mortgaged premises on a sale thereof to pay debts as part payment of his claim.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County in favor of defendant in a controversy submitted to the court without action for the purpose of determining the amount of the dividends to which complainants were entitled, to be paid out of the assets of the estate of defendant's intestate. Affirmed.

The agreed statement of facts upon which the controversy was submitted is as follows:

"Margaret B. Wheat claims to recover of G. W. Dingle, as administrator of G. J. Luhn, a dividend upon $16,082.98; and the said administrator resists said claim, but is willing to pay her a dividend upon $6,082.98.

"The Paragon Building & Loan Association claims to recover of G. W. Dingle, as administrator as aforesaid, a dividend upon $11,237.63, which claim said administrator resists, but is willing to pay a dividend upon $5,817.76.

"B. F. Simmons claims to recover of G. W. Dingle, as administrator as aforesaid, a dividend upon $8,284.40, which claim said administrator resists, but is willing to pay him a dividend upon $4,014.

"H. M. Harmon, executrix of Eleazer Harmon, claims to recover of G. W. Dingle, as administrator as aforesaid, a dividend upon $18,- $89.47, which claim said administrator resists, but is willing to pay her a dividend upon $3,085.20.

"The following are the facts upon which the said controversy depends.

"(1) Margaret B. Wheat is a creditor of the said G. J. Luhn upon a claim, which at the time of his death, with interest to the 1st of June, 1889, amounted to the said sum of $16,083.98, upon which a dividend is claimed.

"(2) For this claim she held as collateral security a policy of insurance effected by the said G. J. Luhn in his own name upon his own life, and which he assigned in his lifetime to his said creditor to secure said debt. Mrs. Wheat since his death has realized $10,000 from this security and applied the same towards her claim.

"(3) The administrator of G. J. Luhn has in his hands a large amount, the proceeds of assets for distribution, and is willing to pay the proper dividend upon $6,083.98, being the deficiency upon Mrs. Wheat's claim after the application thereto of the proceeds of the security as aforesaid, but the said Mrs. Wheat claims she is entitled to a proper dividend upon the entire amount of the indebtedness as it stood at the time of the death of the said G. J. Luhn, together with the interest thereon up to the time of distribution, regardless of what was realized upon the security.

"(4) If the said claim by Mrs. Wheat is well founded, and distribution be made accordingly, she will not receive from all sources more than the amount of the debt to her by G. J. Luhn.

"(5) The other parties named as plaintiffs in this controversy are each and all bond creditors of said G. J. Luhn, who held mortgages given by him upon his real estate to secure his respective bonds to them.

"(6) The said administrator filed his complaint against the heirs of G. J. Luhn for a sale of his real estate in aid of personal assets in an action to which all the mortgagees were parties. In this action they set up their mortgages, the real estate was sold by order of the court, and the proceeds applied to said liens according to their priorities. No one of the said bonds was paid in full from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises applicable thereto.

"In the case of the Paragon Building & Loan Association the deficiency was $3,817.76.

"In the case of B. F. Simmons the deficiency was $6,014.

"In the case of H. M. Harmon, executrix, deficiency was $5,985.20.

"(7) The said administrator has in his hands a large amount of the proceeds of personal assets for distribution, and is willing to pay the proper dividend upon said deficiencies; but the said creditors claim that they are each entitled to a proper dividend upon the entire amount of the indebtedness as it stood at the time of the death of the said G. J. Luhn, together with interest thereon up to the time of distribution, regardless of what was realized from the mortgage of each respectively.

"(8) If the said position of the creditors be correct, and distribution be made accordingly, no one of them will receive from all sources more than the total of the said indebtedness to each by G. J. Luhn.

"The questions submitted to the court upon this are as follows:

"Are the aforesaid creditors, or any of them, entitled to a dividend from the said administrator upon the aforesaid respective deficiencies only?

"Or are they, or any of them, entitled to a dividend upon their entire indebtedness to each as it stood at the time of the death of the said G. J. Luhn, with interest up to the time of distribution?

"And the administrator is to be directed by the court according to its determination of the same.

"It is further agreed as a part of this case that, in the case of G. W. Dinkie, Administrator, v. H. M. Harmon, Executrix, et al., to which all the mortgagees were parties, which said case was for the sale of the real estate, and did not concern the personalty, an order was made that, if the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property were insufficient to pay the several amounts reported due to the respective mortgagees, with interest and costs, as aforesaid, that the master specify the amount of said deficiencies, respectively, in his report of sales, and that the parties respectively entitled to such amounts so deficient have leave to enter up judgment therefor against the administrator, the same to be paid, according to the priorities of the respective debts upon which they are granted, out of the assets of the estate of said intestate which may be applicable thereto, either in the hands of the master or of the said administrator."

Mr. J. E. Burke, for the Paragon B. & L. Association, appellant:

Appellants are entitled to a proportion of the assets based upon the amount of their respective debts as they existed at the death of the intestate, and before the securities had been applied thereto, always providing that in no event can more than the debt be paid.

Wilson v. McConnell, 9 Rich. Eq. 500; Morton v. Caldwell, 3 Strobb. Eq. 161; Wilson v. Kelly, 19 B. C. 107.

The amount to be paid at any time by an estate is one thing, and the debt or amount upon which a creditor's share for the payment thereof is to be based is another thing; and these two things are separate and independent. The debt is as fixed in amount at the moment of death as it is in character, and no payment out of the assets of an estate to the debt of a decedent can alter the amount of the debt to which each and every part of the estate is applicable according to priorities of that debt.

Morton v. Caldwell, supra.

A creditor cannot use the two-fund doctrine to injure another creditor.

State Ins. Bank v. Harbin, 19 B. C. 481; Witte v. Clarke, 17 B. C. 283.

A mortgagee has a double security; he has a right to proceed against both, and to make the best he can of both; why he should be deprived of this right because the debtor dies insolvent, it is not easy to see.

See note to Aldridge v. Cooper, 3 Lead. Can. in Eq. 978, and cases there noted; Mason v. Bogg, 3 Myl. & Cr. 448.

Mr. J. W. Mathews for H. M. Harmon, appellant.

Messrs. Lord & Hyde for respondent.

McGowan, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a controversy without action. The agreed statement of facts should appear in the report of the case. It seems that one G. J. Luhn, being largely indebted by mortgage and otherwise, died intestate, and G. W. Dingle administered upon his estate, and took proceedings to sell the real estate in aid of assets. Upon nearly every parcel of the intestate's real estate there was a mortgage securing a debt. The different mortgage creditors were made parties to these proceedings, and the respective pieces of realty were sold, the proceeds applied to the liens in each case, and a balance left unpaid, for which balances the parties were by decree entitled to enter up judgment against the administrator, to be paid out of the assets of the estate which may be applicable thereto. All the appellants, creditors of the intestate, save Mrs. Wheat, were mortgage creditors in the condition above stated; and Mrs. Wheat had as security a policy of insurance upon the life of the intestate, assigned to her in his lifetime; and that, being realized upon after his death, left a balance still due her upon simple contract. She had no part in the proceedings to sell the lands. All the appellants claim that they are entitled, there being a deficiency of personal assets, to a proportion thereof based upon the amounts of their respective debts as they existed at the death of the intestate, and before the securities (mortgages) had been applied thereto, always providing that in no event more than the debt be paid. The administrator contests this view, and claims that they are only entitled to prove for the deficiency which may remain after exhausting their respective securities. The facts were submitted to Judge Presley, who held and adjudged that the plaintiffs, creditors, are entitled to prove only the balance of their respective debts in prorating with the general creditors out of the remaining assets. The plaintiffs appeal upon the ground that his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to prove only the balance of their respective debts in prorating with the general creditors out of the remaining assets, but, on the contrary, should have adjudged that, in accordance with the rule of law in this State, they, and each of them, were entitled to prove for the full amount of their respective debts as they existed at the death of the intestate, provided only that in no event should the entire amount obtained by any creditor out of the estate exceed the debt as it stood at the time of such death," etc.

In the ground of appeal, as in the argument, reference was made to "a rule of law as established in this State," which, if adhered to, must be considered as conclusive of this case; and in that connection were cited the cases of Morton v. Caldwell, 3 Brobb. Eq. 166, and of Wilson v. McConnell, 9 Rich. Eq. 500. We have examined these cases carefully, and we fail to find their supposed analogy to this case. In both those cases the debts were divided into two distinct parts as against the partnership and an individual member of the partnership, and it was held that, "In ascertaining the pro rata due a copartnership creditor from the separate estate of a deceased copartner, who died insolvent, the debt should be regarded as standing in the precise condition in which it stood at the death of the copartner, without regard to any subsequent payments derived from the copartnership assets, though, to avoid double satisfaction, such creditor is not entitled to receive more than the balance due after deducting such payments," etc. Wilson v. McConnell, supra.

This was manifestly on the ground that the payments by the partnership assets were by a person other than the individual debtor.

As was stated by Chancellor Johnston in Morton v. Caldwell, supra: "It would appear from all these views that the proper mode for determining the proportions of assets liable to the respective creditors of a deceased debtor is to assign them according to the amount of the debts as they exist at his death. If, upon any of the demands thus taken into consideration, any payments had been subsequently made by a third party, that does not release the proportion of the deceased's assets originally liable to the creditors if there still remain due on the demand a balance requiring that proportion to satisfy it."

This seems to us, considering the facts, strictly correct; but suppose that the payments referred to, instead of having been made by a third party, had been made out of the estate proper of the debtor himself. Would it be for a moment contended that such payments did not release that much of the deceased's assets originally liable to the creditor? It seems to us that such result would not only be in violation of all principle, but entirely unjust. As we understand it, the cases above cited did not involve the precise point now under consideration, which, as far as we are able to see, is now for the first time raised in this State. Here there is no pretense or allegation that anyone is liable for those debts, or any part of them, except the estate of the intestate himself. All are creditors of his estate alone. Some have mortgages upon particular parcels of land, while others have none, but there is no doubt that the whole of the debtor's estate, real and personal, mortgaged and not mortgaged, is liable for his debts; and it does seem to us that, when any part of his debts is paid by the sale of lands belonging to the estate, that cannot, in any proper sense, be called a payment by a third party, as the payment by the partnership in Morton v. Caldwell, supra.

Besides, it is settled in this State that a mortgage has priority over specialty and simple contract debts only to the extent of the property mortgaged. Paster v. Paster, 23 S. C. 140.

After the property mortgaged has been sold and applied to the debt, leaving a balance of the debt unpaid, as to that balance the creditor is no longer a mortgage creditor, but stands only where his evidence of indebtedness places him; and he gets judgment for the balance alone on his claims, whatever it may be, from which has already been eliminated what was a mortgage debt. In this controversy without action, the case states that "the administrator filed his complaint against the heirs of G. J. Luhn for a sale of his real estate, in aid of personal assets, in an action to which all the mortgagees were parties. In this action they set up their mortgages. The real estate was sold by order of the court, and the proceeds applied to said liens according to their priorities, etc. So that the respective mortgagees, in effect, assented to that application; and it is therefore now too late to present their whole bonds, withholding their mortgages, as suggested by Lord Cottenham in the English case cited of Mason v. Bagg, 3 Myl. & Cr. 447.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

v.

CALIFORNIA POWDER WORKS, Incorporated, etc., App.

(...N. M....)

Ownership of gunpowder consigned for sale on commission does not render the owners liable for an explosion which occurs while it is in the hands of the consignee.

APPEAL by defendant, the California Powder Works, from a judgment of the District Court for Grant County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries resulting from the explosion of certain powder alleged to have belonged to defendant. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Catron, Knobel & Olmsted, for appellant:

Commission merchants, with no right of charging storage, clerk-hire, or other expenses, are not agents of the consignor within the rule which imposes liability on the principal for the consequences of imperfect or negligent conduct of the agent.

Slack v. Tucker & Co. 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 329, 330 (23 L. ed. 146); St. Paul Water Co. v. Ware, 85 U. S. 16 Wall. 576 (31 L. ed. 484); Blake v. Ferris, 5 N. Y. 48-60 et seq.; Seymour v. Wyckoff, 10 N. Y. 316.

Mr. Gideon D. Banta for appellee.

Leo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case, by the plaintiff, David Abraham, against the defendant, the California Powder Company, and also the Safety Nitro-Powder Company, corporations organized under the laws of California, to recover damages for an alleged injury to a brick hotel building situated in the Town of Silver City, in the County of Grant, from an explosion of a certain lot of powder stored in a powder-house in said Town of Silver City, which powder-house, it is alleged, was erected, kept and maintained, and which powder was stored in said house, by the defendants. The defendants pleaded not guilty. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict for $300 against the California Powder Company, and, by direction of the court, not guilty as to the Safety Nitro Powder Company. The California Powder Company brings this case to this court by appeal.

belonging to defendant, the California Powder Company, which was consigned to Neff & Stevens for sale on commission. Evidence was introduced on the part of the defendant tending to show that the powder in question, the eighty kegs, was not a consignment, but an absolute sale, to Neff & Stevens. We will consider the case as if the position of the plaintiff was the correct one, in this respect.

As to the ownership and control of the powder-house, the evidence on the part of the plaintiff is indefinite and uncertain. The witness Neff testifies that Higbee and Cohn told him it belonged to the defendant, the California Powder Company, but says he does not know of any connection Cohn had with the defendant Company; that his understanding is that Higbee had been an agent of the Company, and that he built the house. The nature and character of the agency of Higbee, if one existed, is not shown, nor does it appear what authority either Higbee or Cohn had for giving him the information, or what source of knowledge they possessed on the subject. Neither does it appear that Gould had any authority to make any statement as to ownership. The building of the magazine took place many years before the explosion occurred. There appear to have been several transfers of the business with which it was connected before reaching Neff & Stevens. It does not appear in the evidence that these defendant companies agreed to, or were consulted in regard to, the transfers. No attempt was made to prove that the defendants authorized, or assented to, or had any knowledge of, the storage of any powder in the building in question; but, on the part of defendant, the California Powder Company, it was shown that it not only never authorized nor assented to such storage, but that it had no knowledge whatever of the manner in which Neff & Stevens kept the powder; that they never owned the building, or had any interest in it. Taking the facts as shown on the part of the plaintiff to be true, if the defendants are liable for the damages resulting from the explosion of the powder in question, such liability must attach to them from the fact that they were owners of the powder which was consigned to Neff & Stevens, to be sold by them on commission.

The vital question—that upon which the case hinges—is whether, upon such a state of facts, the defendant Companies stood in relation to Neff & Stevens, the parties who stored the powder in the house, and appear to have had full control of it, so that the maxim, respondent superior, will apply.

The rule is adopted by Wharton, in his Law of Negligence, § 176, in which he quotes as follows: "The principle to be extracted from the case is said to be that a person, natural or artificial, is not liable for the acts or negligence of another, unless the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, exist between them, and that when an injury is done by a person exercising an independent employment the person employing him is not responsible to the person injured."

Again, in section 188, the same author says: "We strike, when pursuing the distinctions which have been taken by the courts in this relation, on the fundamental principle, elsewhere fully discussed, that, wherever there is liberty to act, there, to the party thus free, liability for a tort committed by him is imputable. If the master is at liberty to act in a particular matter, then the tort is imputable to the master. If the servant is at liberty to act, then, if this liberty be one of entire emancipation in the particular relation of the master's control, the tort is imputable, not to the master, but to the servant."

In a very able review of this question in the case of De Forrest v. Wright, 2 Mich. 808, the court says: "This greatly vexed question, as an eminent judge has pronounced it, has been very much discussed, not only in the English courts, but in our own. The difficulty in deciding cases involving the question presented has been in determining what facts and circumstances legally constitute the relation of master and servant, or under what circumstances one person will be held liable for injuries occasioned by the negligence or unskillfulness of another employed in his behalf. To hold that every person, under all circumstances, would be responsible for injuries committed by another person while employed in his behalf, involves an absurdity no one would countenance. It would create a penalty from which few could escape; for every man is, or ought to be, directly or indirectly, nearly or remotely, engaged in the service, or on behalf, of his fellow men. But, from an examination and comparison of the adjudged cases, the rule now seems very clearly to be this: that where the person employed is in the exercise of an independent and distinct employment, and not under the immediate control, direction or supervision of the employer, the latter is not responsible for the negligence or misdoings of the former."

So, in the case of Gulson v. Tyler, 64 Cal. 334, which was a suit for damages against the owners of a steamboat, it was proven on the trial that the owners did not have control and management of the boat at the time the damages occurred. The court says: "The rule as stated by Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 501, is that if the owner of property lets or lends it, and transfers the entire possession and control of it to another, the owner is not responsible for the wrongful use or mismanagement of it by the transferee. Whoever had the exclusive possession, management and control of the boat, its officers and men, was alone responsible for its mismanagement; and, whether rightfully or wrongfully in such possession, the liability would rest on them alone. Under the rule, respondent superior, this must be so."

The act of the servant is not the act of the master, even in legal intentment or effect, unless the master previously directs or subsequently adopts it. Parsons v. Winchell, 5 Cuth. 592.

In order to clearly understand the application of the foregoing principle to this case, it may be well to refer more particularly to the evidence as to the relationship as proven. Gould, an agent of the California Powder Company, in 1884 called upon Neff & Stevens, requesting them to take the agency of the Company, which they declined, for the reason that they had a large amount of powder of the other company on hand. They desired a certain amount of black powder, which they were short of, which he agreed to have sent them; and it was sent, and billed as follows:

"Tucson, Arizona, November 11th, 1884.

"Messrs. Neff & Stevens, Silver City:

"Bot. of the California Works, 80 California Street. Consigned, eighty kegs blasting, $4.00, $320.00."

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that this powder was sent as a consignment, to be sold on commission, as other powder belonging to the defendant that had been turned over to them by Cohn, assignee of Crawford. The defendant claims that these eighty kegs were an absolute sale. There was also a letter from William A. Scott, agent at Tucson, Ariz., dated March 18, 1885, which is as follows:

Messrs. Neff & Stevens, Silver City, N. M.

Gentlemen: Your favor of the 10th inst. is at hand. Please to send account sales at $4.00 per keg, and send draft on me for 10 per cent of the amount of the same, as if the draft was cash, for so I will count it. The account sales must be at $4.00 per keg, and I need your receipt for the commission of 10 per cent. You are duly credited with account for $16.85.

Respectfully, Wm. A. Scott, Agent.

The above bill and letter, together with the oral evidence introduced on the trial, clearly show that Neff & Stevens were handling this powder as factors, commission merchants or consignees. There is no evidence in any way limiting their power as such, or directing the manner of handling it. As factors, under the law, they would have full possession of the goods, with a special property therein. Story Ag. § 97.

The court instructed the jury: "If they should find that said black powder was kept and maintained by the defendant or their agents at the time," etc. The word "agents" in the instruction, must be understood in the sense in which it appears from the evidence; and, if instruction No. 6, which was asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, had been given, the issues would have been fairly presented to the jury; which instruction was: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant corporations each owned a portion of the powder stored in the powder-house at the time of the explosion, but that such powder and powder-house was under exclusive control of Neff & Stevens, as consignees of said corporations, respectively, at the time of the explosion, then, in that case, unless you further believe from the evidence that such explosion was caused by some willful and malicious act of defendant, the California Powder Company, you will find the defendant not guilty."

The first part of this instruction would have brought the case under the rule laid down by the authorities we have referred to, and which is unquestionably the correct law, as applicable to this case. The evidence does not show anything upon which the doctrine of respondent superior could be based. So far as the evidence shows, the relationship of Neff & Stevens to the defendant was that of an independent employment, free of action. There is a total lack of all the elements of master and servant, which must exist to constitute responsibility on the part of the defendant. We think the court should have given the first part of this instruction, or instructed the jury in accordance with the views herein expressed.

The case will be reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

(...N. C....)

The words "I guarantee payment of the foregoing bond," with signature and seal, written at the foot of the bond of another person under seal, constitute a separate sealed instrument, the signer of which can be sued as a principal obligor and not merely as surety to the preceding bond; and such action therefore is not barred in three years by the Statute of Limitations applicable to sureties, but may be brought at any time within ten years, under Code, § 152, par. 2, relating to actions against principal obligors on sealed instruments.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Johnston County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of the guarantor of a sealed bond. Reversed.

The bond and the guaranty were as follows:

Smithfield, N. C., September 27, 1881.

Twelve months after the completion of the Midland North Carolina Railway from Goldsboro to Smithfield, and the arrival of the first train at the depot, within three fourths of a mile of the court-house at Smithfield, I promise to pay W. J. Best, president of said railway company, one hundred dollars, with interest from the date of said completion, in consideration of the running of said road to or near Smithfield.

NOTE.—Contract of guaranty.

A guaranty is a solemn assurance, covenant or stipulation that something shall be or shall be done, a promise "to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage" of another. Anderson, Law Dict.

A contract by which one person is bound to another, for the fulfillment of the promise or engagement of a third party, is a contract of guaranty. 2 Parsons, Cont. & Story, Prom. Notes, § 457; 3 Kent, Com. 121.

So a collateral undertaking to pay the debt of another in case he does not pay is a guaranty. Dole v. Young, 24 Pick. 252; Hill v. Smith, 62 U. S. 21 How. 283 (16 L. ed. 114).

A guaranty is an undertaking by one person that another shall perform his contract or fulfill his obligation, or that if he does not the guarantor will do it for him. Gridley v. Capen, 72 Ill. 13.

Construction of contract of guaranty.

The contract of guaranty, although that of a surety, is to be construed as a mercantile instrument, in furtherance of its spirit, and liberally, to promote the use and convenience of commercial intercourse. Davis v. Wells, 104 U. S. 159 (26 L. ed. 680).

Generally, all instruments of suretyship are construed strictly as mere matters of legal right; but the rule is otherwise where they are founded upon a valuable consideration. Mauran v. Bullus, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 522 (10 L. ed. 1036).

The general rule is that the words of a guaranty are to be taken as strongly against the guarantor as the sense will admit. Drummond v. Preetman, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 515 (6 L. ed. 712).

Where a mercantile guaranty is preceded by a recital definite in terms, to which the general words obviously refer, the liability is limited within the terms of the recital in restraint of the general words. Bell v. Bruen, 42 U. S. 1 How. 160 (11 L. ed. 89).

In construing a contract the court will look at the surrounding circumstances to ascertain the intention of the party, and will not be controlled by the technical meaning of the word "guarantee." Weiler v. Henarie, 15 Or. 28.

Guaranties are to be interpreted and enforced according to the meaning and intent, and in the manner, designed by the parties at their execution, giving due effect to every part of the same. People v. Lee, 7 Cent. Rep. 88, 104 N. Y. 441.

Where the plain intention of the parties to an agreement appears to have been to jointly bind themselves to pay for brick delivered for the erection of a certain building, it will be construed accordingly. Goldner v. Finn, 11 West. Rep. 177, 67 Mich. 340.

A letter of guaranty written in the United States to a house in England is construed according to the laws of that country (which are the same as in this). Bell v. Bruen, supra.

Letters of recommendation requesting, in favor of the persons recommended, "that you will endeavor to render them every assistance in your power," do not constitute a contract of guaranty. Russell v. Clark, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 69 (3 L. ed. 271).

It seems that a clause in a letter of introduction, "You may be assured of their complying fully with any contracts or engagements they may enter into with you," does not import an undertak-

Shepherd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented in this appeal is whether the action is barred, as to the defendant Fuller, by the Statute of Limitations. Code, § 152, par. 2, provides that "an action upon a sealed instrument, against the principal thereto," must be commenced within ten years after the cause of action accrues. The guaranty executed by the defendant Fuller is under seal, and is written at the foot of the bond, which was executed by the defendant Earp. It is contended by Fuller, the appellant, that he is not a principal to "a sealed instrument," within the above provision of the Code, but that he is simply a surety to the bond, and as such is within the principle of Welfare v. Thompson, 83 N. C. 276, and other similar decisions, which apply the three-years Statute of Limitations. This leads us therefore to the consideration of the nature and liability of the contract of guaranty. A guaranty is a contract in and of itself, but it also has relation to some other contract or obligation, with reference to which it is collateral. Anderson, Law Dict.; Carpenter v. Wall, 4 Dev. & B. 144.

"A surety is bound with his principal as an original promisor. . . . On the other hand, the contract of a guarantor is his own separate contract. . . . It is in the nature of a warranty by him that the thing guaranteed to be done by the principal shall be done, and not merely an engagement jointly with the principal to do the thing." Baylies, Sur. 4.

A "guarantor is not an indorser or surety." 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 849.

"The surety's promise is to pay a debt, which becomes his own debt when the principal falls to pay it. . . . But the guarantor's promise is always to pay the debt of another." "But he is not an indorser nor a surety." 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 117, 118.

"A guaranty is a special contract, and the guarantor is not in any sense a party to the note." Lamourieuz v. Hewit, 5 Wend. 307; Ellis v. Brown, 6 Barb. 282; Miller v. Gaston, 2 Hill, 188, 190, Story, Prom. Notes, § 2.

It is a special contract, and must be specially declared on. Baylies, Sur. 4.

These authorities very abundantly show that the contract of a guarantor is a separate and distinct obligation. Fuller is no party to the bond of Earp, and as to his contract of guaranty he cannot be regarded otherwise than as principal. If this were not so, we would have the anomaly of a contract with only one contracting party. It is said, however, that there is a distinction growing out of the fact that the guaranty is written upon the same paper as the bond. This does not in the least alter the character of the obligation. Lamourieuz v. Hewit, supra.

"This engagement or contract of guaranty may be, and often is, written on the back of the note or bill, but it may as well, so far as the guaranty is concerned, be written on a separate piece of paper." 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 119.

This feature becomes material only upon questions arising upon the negotiability or assignment of such contracts. No such questions are involved in this appeal. We conclude that Fuller is not a surety to the bond, but a principal to the guaranty, "a sealed instrument;" and, this being a separate contract, the suit is not barred until ten years after the cause of action accrued.

Continuing guaranty.

An undertaking to be responsible for moneys to be advanced, or goods to be sold to another from time to time, is a continuing guaranty. Addison, Cont. 682; Buck v. Burk, 18 N. Y. 342.

Where a person agrees to guarantee a stated sum for goods sold his principal, and, after the latter has purchased a larger amount, agrees to become his surety in twice the original sum, instead of the sum "as heretofore," the agreement is a continuing guaranty. Gardner v. Watson (Tex.) Feb. 4, 1890.

A reply by one person to a letter of another asking if the former is financially responsible for a third person, to the effect that if the latter is unable at any time to pay his bills promptly the former will see that the latter is taken care of, constitutes a continuing guaranty that such third person will pay his bills at maturity. Dover Stamping Co. v. Noyes (Mass.) April 2, 1900.

A guaranty of 1 per cent per annum in dividends so long as the purchaser should retain the stock sold him, given by a firm as an inducement for the purchase from them of shares of stock, is not limited to the duration of the partnership or the lives of the copartners. Kernochan v. Murray, 2 L. R. A. 108, 111 N. Y. 302.

A guaranty of the amount of dividends that shall be received from stock, made by the seller as an inducement to the purchase of the stock, is an original, and not a collateral, undertaking, and the guarantors are principals, and not sureties, in such obligation. Ibid.

The following writing: "You will send P a full line of samples, suitable for spring and summer, at the lowest figures, and I will guarantee payment of the goods you may sell him,"—is not a continuing guaranty, but only for the sale of goods ordered from samples suitable for the ensuing spring and summer. Schwartz v. Hyman, 10 Cent. Rep. 268, 109 N. Y. 500.

Parol evidence; when not admissible to show a guaranty a continuing one. See notes to Kernochan v. Murray (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 108.

A sealed continuing guaranty is revoked by the death of the guarantor. Slagle v. Forney (Pa.) 20 W. N. C. 457.

So the death of the mortgagor revokes the authority to sell goods to a third person on the security of a mortgage given in part to secure indebtedness arising from future sales to him by the mortgagor. Hyland v. Habich, 6 L. R. A. 282, 189 Mass. 112.

Effect of death of guarantor. See notes to Kernochan v. Murray, supra.

A guaranty to secure a running account at a bank, where consideration is separable, is terminated by the guarantor's death. National Eagle Bank v. Hunt, 5 New Eng. Rep. 777, R. I. Index BB, 117.

Upon a collateral undertaking, as a continuing guaranty, no action is maintainable under a count for money lent and money had and received. Douglas v. Reynolds, 20 U. S. & P. 112 (2 L. ed. 681).

In an action upon a letter of guaranty, evidence is admissible to establish that credit had been given

Davis, J., dissenting:

At the bottom of Earp's note or bond is the following:

I guarantee payment of the foregoing bond, Sept. 27, 1881.

[Signed] D. W. Fuller [Seal]

There is only one promise to pay, and that is by Earp to Best. Earp is, unquestionably, the only principal to that obligation. Fuller guarantees the payment, and that, it is said, is a distinct undertaking,—a special contract,—to which he is principal. But the guaranty itself is only for the payment of the debt, which Earp, the principal, was promised to pay, and is not a primary obligation. Earp is principal to the thing guaranteed, and, if you eliminate his promise, Fuller was promised to do nothing. He is not primarily liable for the debt. He is not the principal to any promise to pay money. He is not the principal in the one, and only one, "sealed instrument" promising to pay money, and, if he is to be held liable on a separate and independent contract or undertaking, then there was a collateral security, and as insisted in the answer, as it was by Mr. Busbee in his argument, it was not assignable. We are construing the instrument in view of a statute which, it seems to me, was plainly intended to limit only the liability of the "principal" in a contract under seal to ten years, and to limit the liability of all persons secondarily liable, whether under seal or not, to three years. It seems to me that there was only one principal to the obligation to pay Best the $100, and that principal was Earp. I am not sure that a guarantor is ever called a principal as to the thing guaranteed to be done, and, whether you call him guarantor or surety to the original and principal obligation, I think neither the spirit nor the letter of section 152, par. 2, Code, makes him "principal thereto." Judge Daniel says: "A guaranty is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another person who is himself, in the first instance, liable to such payment or performance." Corpus v. Wall, 4 Dev. & B. 144.

I think this other person is everywhere and in all cases spoken of as the principal. I do not think a case can be found in which the guarantor for the payment of another is spoken of as principal. It is said that the contract of guaranty is co-extensive with that of the principal. The answer is, so is that of any other surety under seal, but for our Statute; and it is that which makes the distinction between the limit of the liability of the principal and the person bound to answer for him, whether as surety or (I think) guarantor for the judgment.

Baylies, on Sureties and Guarantors, throughout speaks of the relation between the parties as surety and principal, guarantor and principal, and of contracts of guaranty and contracts of surety; and he also says that, "if the guaranty is made with one person, it cannot be extended to another." Pages 113, 133, 146, 147.

Would not Fuller, in an action against him and Best, or against him and Best's assignee, be entitled to the benefits of sections 2100 and 2101 of the Code? Would he not have the right to show in what relation he stood to the parties, and that he was only surety for the payment of the $100, and that it was so understood by the parties,—that he was not principal? Welfare v. Thompson, 83 N. C. 276; Louder v. Noding, 8 Ired. Eq. 208.

I think that in this case it sufficiently appears that the guarantor, as is often the case in single guaranties for the payment of money by another, is really a surety, and only a surety, for the principal; and, if that were not the fair and necessary construction of the instrument, he would have a right to show that it was so intended and so understood by the parties, and that he would have the right to show this by parol. Welfare v. Thompson, supra.

I think there was no error in the ruling of the judge below.

on the faith of the guaranty, and that it was treated as a continuing guaranty. Ibid.

Continuing guaranty. See note to National Bank v. Gay (Conn.) 4 L. R. A. 323.

Liability of guarantor: accruable.

In a contract of guaranty, the liability of the principal and that of the guarantor are several, and they cannot be joined as parties in the same action. Tyler v. Taulatin Academy & Pacific Univ. 14 Or. 465.

A guaranty of a certain sum per month payable in advance for a specified period, aggregating a stated sum, for rent of premises, is a severable contract of guaranty, and the guarantor is liable upon default of the lessee in making any payment. Waller v. Honario, 15 Or. 23.

A guaranty, for a valuable consideration, of the punctual payment of principal and interest of bonds which have coupons attached, is an original undertaking which gives the holders of the coupons a right to proceed at once against the guarantor. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Knight, 134 Pa. 33.

Where a person purchases of an association several bonds secured by mortgage, upon the procurement of another, who gave a written guaranty of the payment of three of the bonds, and after the purchaser's death his widow assented to an adjustment and a surrender of the bonds upon the same L. R. A.

cution of a guaranty that in case the bonds or former guaranty be canceled, destroyed or otherwise disposed of, the guaranty shall remain in full force and effect, and be a continuing running guaranty for the payment of the par value of the bonds and interest, the latter agreement is an instrument of guaranty, and nothing more. Miller v. Bluebart, 119 N. Y. 326.

In an action upon a bond to answer for the debt or default of an agent of the obligee, the defendant may aver and prove the original transaction and agreement between the obligee and the agent. The bond and the contract of agency, having been executed contemporaneously, are to be read together. Wood Sewing Mach. Co. v. Winchell, 8 West. Rep. 324, 107 Ind. 300; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Forsyth, 5 West. Rep. 320, 108 Ind. 334.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

GARDINER

v.

Edward L. B. GARDINER et al., Appts.

(.....N. H.)

1. An interlineation and erasure by a testatrix, changing a provision in her will, where the word erased is not so obliterated as to be illegible, is not a revocation, but an alteration; and if the instrument, as altered, is not executed as required by the Statute to make a valid will, codicil or instrument of revocation, the will remains intact as before.

2. The presumption in favor of the revocation of a portion of a will by canceling is repelled, where the cancellation is made with a view to a new disposition of the property, which fails to be carried into effect, and partial intestacy will result by such cancellation. In such case the will will stand as originally framed.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Probate Court for Rockingham County admitting to probate the will of Elizabeth D. Cutler, deceased, and adjudging that defendants were cut off from participation in its provisions by reason of the erasure of their names therefrom. Reversed.

The third article of the will originally provided as follows: "All the estate of which I shall die seized and possessed . . . I give, devise and bequeath in manner following: One undivided fourteenth part thereof to each of the following persons, to wit, Edward L. B. Gardiner, Susan I. Gardiner, both of Passaic, New Jersey, children of my nephew, George A. Gardiner," and seven other persons named and described,—thus disposing of nine fourteenths of the estate.

The remaining five fourteenths are subsequently specifically disposed of and there is no residuary clause.

After the will was executed testatrix drew a light line with a pencil through the word "fourteenth" in the above quotation and wrote the word "twelfth" above it.

She also drew a light pencil mark through the following words:

"Edward L. B. Gardiner, Susan I. Gardiner, both of Passaic, New Jersey, children of my nephew George A. Gardiner."

The will came up for probate in solemn form, and the judge of probate entered a decree approving and allowing it, to which decree was added the following: "And whereas the said Elizabeth D. Cutler, after making said will, made certain erasures and interlineations in the same, it is adjudged and decreed that the word 'twelfth' interlined is not in law a part of said will, not having been inserted in the presence of three witnesses, as required by law, and that the word 'fourteenth' erased, for which said word 'twelfth' was substituted, is a part of said will, and the following words erased, namely, 'Edward L. B. Gardiner, Susan I. Gardiner, both of Passaic, N. J., children of my nephew George A. Gardiner,' are not, in law, a part of said will, said words having been erased with the intention on the part of the said Elizabeth D. Cutler to revoke the legacies to said persons whose names are erased, and that said instrument be proved and allowed as the last will and testament of Elizabeth D. Cutler, and so be recorded in accordance with this decree."

Edward L. B. Gardiner and Susan I. Gardiner thereupon took this appeal.

Messrs. Frink & Batchelder for appellants.

Messrs. Marston & Eastman and Wiggin & Fernald for the executor.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Statute of Wills provides that "no will shall be effectual to pass any real or personal estate, or to change or in any way affect the same, unless made by a person of the age of twenty-one years, of sound mind, in writing, signed and sealed by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his express direction, and attested and subscribed in his presence by three or more credible witnesses," and that "no will or clause thereof shall be revoked unless by some other valid will or codicil, or by some writing executed in the same manner, or by canceling, tearing, obliterating or otherwise destroying the same, by the testator, or by some person by his consent and in his presence." Gen. Laws, chap. 198, §§ 6, 14.

The mode of revoking a will is therefore as definitely prescribed by the Statute as the mode of making it; and no essential part of the one can be dispensed with any more than the other.

The first question for adjudication presented by this case arises from the attempt of the testatrix to increase a smaller devise to a larger one by substituting "twelfth" for "fourteenth," by interlineation and erasure. While, in one sense, this was a revocation by the testatrix of what she had previously done, in the true sense it was an alteration. To revoke a testamentary disposition is to annul it, so that, in legal contemplation, it ceases to exist, and becomes as inoperative as if it had never been written. But when, by the substitution of certain words for others, a different meaning is imported, there is not a mere revocation. There is something more than the destruction of that which has been antecedently done.

NOTE.—Interlineations in will.

Where there is nothing to explain obliterations and interlineations appearing on the face of a will, it will be presumed they were made after its execution. Burgoyne v. Showler, 1 Robt. Eccl. 5, 8 Jur. 814; Cooper v. Bockett, 4 Moore, P. C. 419; Greville v. Tylec, 7 Moore, P. C. 280.

As bearing upon the question of revocation or no revocation by an act done to the instrument, the 8 L. R. A.

declarations of the testator may be shown at the probate as evincing the intent. Evans' App. 60 Pa. 235.

Under the Alabama Code a will cannot be revoked pro tanto by expunging the name of a single legatee by drawing a pen through it: Law v. Law, 68 Ala. 437; but if made with intention to revoke the whole will as manifested by declarations of the testator, it is effectual for that purpose. Ibid.

There is a transmutation, by which a new clause is created. There is another and a different testamentary disposition, which, to have validity, must be authenticated by the observance of the statutory requirements. McDonald v. Collins, 61 Md. 478.

It follows that the failure of the testatrix to execute her purpose in the manner prescribed by the Statute (§ 6) prevented it from going into effect as a testamentary disposition, and, as it is apparent that she had no intent to revoke except by way of alteration, and the word erased not having been so obliterated as to be illegible, there was no revocation, and the will remained intact as before (Jackson v. Holloway, 7 Johns. 394, McPherson v. Clark, 3 Bradf. 93; Quinn v. Quinn, 1 Thomp. & C. 4-7, Wolf v. Bollinger, 69 Ill. 303, Wright v. Wright, 3 Ind. 359, Re Penniman's Will, 20 Mon. 246 (Gil. 220), Stoer v. Kendall, 1 Coldw. 637; Bethell v. Moore, 3 Dev. & B. L. 316, Wheeler v. Bent, 7 Pick. 61; Short v. Smith, 4 East, 419; Kirke v. Kirke, 4 Russ. 435, Martins v. Gardner, 3 Blm. 73, Leake v. James, 18 L. J. N. S. Exch. 186 Lawson v. Morrison, 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 5th ed 501; 1 Redf. Wills, 325, 336; Eckbach v. Collins, supra, Pringle v. McPherson, 2 Brev. 379), in other words the effect of the alteration is the same as it would have been had it been made by a codicil imperfectly executed.

The remaining question is as to the effect upon the appellants of the cancellation of their names from the list of legatees named in the first clause of the third article of the will. The appellants contend that it had no effect, while the executor contends that it effected a revocation. We think the contention of the appellants must be sustained. Canceling and obliterating have always been considered peculiarly equivocal acts of revocation (Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 490; Smith v. Cunningham, 1 Addams, Eccl. 455); and eminent authorities hold that where a pencil instead of a pen is used, the cancellation is prima facie deliberative, and not final. 1 Jarm. Wills, 5th Am. ed. 291, 3 Greenl. Ev. § 681, and cases cited.

If this be so, it is decisive of the contention, because no collateral evidence is presented which rebuts the presumption. On the contrary the lightness of the pencil lines, and the failure to change "fourteenths" to "twelfths" in the succeeding clause, tend strongly to show that the act of the testatrix was conditional merely.

But it is not necessary to invoke the doctrine of Jarman and of Greenleaf. There are other and more satisfactory reasons which lead to the same result. The competency of a testator to make revocation of a devise by the simple erasure or cancellation of the name of the devisee is undoubted, but when the act of cancellation is not a substantive, independent act, but is connected with and dependent upon another, and both form but one transaction, the entire design and purpose must be considered, in order to ascertain whether a revocation has been accomplished. When this is done in the case before us, it is at once apparent that the cancellation in question must be considered in connection with the preceding erasure and interlineation, and may properly be treated as relative or dependent thereon, because all the evidence indicates that the only purpose of the testatrix was to make a new disposition as to a portion of her property. There is no reason whatever to suppose that she would have revoked the legacies to the appellants if she had been aware that the proposed disposition could not be carried into effect; but, on the other hand, the fair presumption is that her wishes with regard to her property, as originally expressed, would have remained unchanged, in the absence of any known reason for changing them. And this presumption is further strengthened by the fact that otherwise there would be an intestacy as to the two fourteenths of the estate bequeathed to the appellants; for there is no residuary clause into which it can properly fall, or into which the testatrix intended it should fall. It is clear that the testatrix did not contemplate an intestacy as to any part of her estate. She evidently intended to make a testamentary disposition of the whole of it; and, upon well-settled principles, her intention may be effectuated.

"When a portion of a will is canceled with a view to a new disposition of the property, and the proposed disposition fails to be carried into effect, the presumption in favor of a revocation by the canceling will be repelled, and the will will stand as originally framed." Re Penniman's Will, supra; Lawson v. Morrison, 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 501; Short v. Smith, Bethell v. Moore, McPherson v. Clark, Wolf v. Bollinger and Eckbach v. Collins, supra.

We are therefore of opinion, and without regard to the presumption arising from the manner of its performance, that, as the cancellation was not done with intent to revoke the bequests to the appellants simply, but with intent to make a new disposition of a portion of the testatrix's estate, which failed of accomplishment, the canceling which was done only in the view of, and in order to effect, that object, should be esteemed for nothing, and be considered as not having been done absolutely, but only conditionally, and upon the proposed disposition being made effectual. To give it effect, under the circumstances, would not only be against the authorities, but would thwart the actual intention of the testatrix, and make her intestate as to one seventh of her estate, when a contrary intent is plainly manifested in her will. Wolf v. Bollinger, supra.

The decree of the Probate Court upon this branch of the case is reversed, and the appeal sustained.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MISSOURI PACIFIC R. CO., Plf. in Err.,

J. W. SHARITT.

(....Kan....)

"Where an employe and resident of this State performs labor in this State for a railway company, a corporation of another State, but also doing business in this State, and the wages of such employe are exempt in this as well as in the other State.—Held, in an action by the employe to recover such wages in this State, the fact that the corporation has been garnished in such other State by a creditor of such employe before the bringing of this action in this State, and service of summons obtained upon the employe only by publication, is no defense to such action.

(November 2, 1888.)

ERROR to the District Court for Franklin County to review a judgment rendered upon appeal from a justice's court in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover wages alleged to be due and which had been garnished in a foreign jurisdiction. Affirmed.

Statement by Ologston, C.:

Sharitt, plaintiff below, commenced this action on the 27th day of July, 1887, against the plaintiff in error, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, to recover wages due him. The action was brought before a justice of the peace in Franklin County, and judgment was rendered against the defendant. An appeal was taken to the District Court of Franklin County, and trial was had by the court, and the court made findings of fact and conclusions of law which are as follows: "(1) Plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant at Council Grove, Kan., during the month of June, 1887, performing manual labor in and about coupling cars and making up trains, and the like, and was styled a 'yard master.' (2) As such laborer, he earned, and became and was entitled to receive from the defendant for such month's services, the sum of $79, $75 of which sum has not been paid. (3) That plaintiff is a citizen, resident and householder of the State, and has been for more than two years last past. During said month of June, 1887, and ever since, the plaintiff had a family, to wit, a wife and three children, supported by his labor, and his said earnings were necessary for the support of said family. (4) While the action was pending before the justice, it appeared that certain garnishee proceedings were pending in Morris County, Kan., whereby it was sought to subject said wages to the claim of a certain party there; and it was then agreed between the attorneys for the respective parties in this case that the suit here should be continued ten days, and that if, in the meantime, said garnishee proceedings were dismissed, the defendant would pay plaintiff's claim, or submit to judgment thereon, if plaintiff would pay costs. Accordingly, at the expiration of said ten days, said proceedings having been dismissed, the justice entered judgment accordingly. On the 13th day of July, 1887, at St. Louis, Mo., the defendant Company was garnished by and before a justice of the peace of that State at the suit of W. P. Stewart, a resident of Missouri, against said J. W. Sharitt, and ordered to answer therein, in which it did on July 28, 1887; and the Company was, on September 29, 1887, ordered to pay into that court the amount so due the plaintiff. The plaintiff, Sharitt, defendant in that suit, was not served in said action otherwise than by publication. From the order so requiring said Company to pay said moneys the said Company appealed to the Circuit Court of St. Louis County, Mo., which said action is now pending and undetermined. Neither party or their attorneys had notice or knowledge of these proceedings in St. Louis when the agreement referred to in the fourth finding was made. I conclude, as matter of law, that said personal earnings were and are exempt from the payment of plaintiff's debts, and that he is entitled to recover the same in this action, and judgment will be rendered accordingly."

Judgment thereon was rendered for the plaintiff. Defendant now brings the case here.

Movrs. John W. Deford and W. G. gener. Martin & Orr, for plaintiff in error.

That court which first acquires jurisdiction over the fund, whether in this State or another, is justly entitled to deal with it until its jurisdiction is exhausted by the exercise of it, or lost by dismissal or other proper method.

St. Rep. 755; Ferguson v. Bank of Kansas City, 25 Kan. 333.

A prior judicial proceeding in another jurisdiction should be respected, and no violence to the rights of a party by a subsequent proceeding here tolerated.

U. S. Const. art. 11, § 1; Ferguson v. Bank of Kansas City, 25 Kan. 333.

The fact that the service on Mr. Sharitt in the case in Missouri was by publication only is irrelevant. Under our statutes and those of Missouri such service is just as good and effectual as personal service to bind the fund in the hands of the garnishee.

Kansas Justice's Code, §§ 83, 87, 43, 51, 54c, 54d; Kansas Code Civil Proc. §§ 73, 193, 200, 208, 215-219; Attachment in Justice Courts, 1 Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 473-479; Attachments in Courts of Record, 1 Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 420, 434, 435, 3494.

It has never heretofore been hinted that if the defendant was a nonresident absentee, a credit due him by a resident of this State could not be subjected here because of an imaginary situs of the credit in the State of the residence of the defendant.

The garnishment lien attaches when the garnishee is served with notice and continues until the attachment is dissolved, or the plaintiff's claim is satisfied.

Atchison Board of Education v. Knoxville, 13 Kan. 39.

Mr. Amos Harpole for defendant in error.

Ologston, C., filed the following opinion:

It is not contended that the claim sued on is not exempt under the Exemption Laws of this State, but it is contended that, because the garnishment proceedings were commenced in Missouri, and the court of that State obtained jurisdiction of the subject matter before this suit was brought in Kansas, for that reason the defendant Company became liable under its answer in Missouri under said proceedings, and should not again be held liable in this State in this action. The plaintiff in error recognizes the rule laid down by this court that, if the garnishment proceedings had been commenced in this State, no question could have been raised, and also recognizes the rule, adopted in this State, that the garnishee has the same right in his answer to raise all the questions that the debtor himself might raise, and plead the Exemption Law as completely as the debtor might plead it. But plaintiff in error says no such rule exists in Missouri, that, under the decisions of that State, it is precluded from asserting this right, and therefore, if it is compelled to pay this judgment, it will again have to pay the claim under its answer in Missouri. This seems to present a hardship, but, as the claim is exempt under the laws of this State, and presumably exempt under the laws of Missouri,—for it is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the laws of Missouri are the same as the Statute of this State—therefore, if this claim is exempt under both the laws of Missouri and of Kansas, it would be unjust to the defendant in error if, by reason of some construction of the Statute of Missouri, he should be prevented from securing the benefit of the exemption.

It has been held in this State that the garnishee may plead the Exemption Law, and be protected thereby as completely as the debtor would be. See Mull v. Jones, 39 Kan. 112.

This seems to be the well recognized doctrine elsewhere; and, while there is some conflict in the authorities on this subject, the great weight of authority is with our court. We see no reason why an exception should be made in this case to a rule so well established. Under the rule laid down in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Matthy, 34 Kan. 181, and Kansas City, St. J. & U. B. R. Co. v. Gough, 35 Kan. 1, this judgment must be affirmed. See also Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 60 Mich. 108, 10 West. Rep. 730.

Under those decisions, this claim would be exempt to the plaintiff below had he resided either in the State of Missouri, or, as he does, in Kansas; and such exemption ought to be a good defense for the defendant Company in Missouri. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

S. L. R. A.

Per Curiam: It is so ordered.

Horton, C. J., and Johnston, J., concur.

Valentine, J.:

I concur in the decision of this case for the reason that I believe it is sustained by reason and the weight of authority. It seems to be generally held that the laws of any country where a debt is created enter into the contract upon which the debt is founded, so far as they are applicable and material, and form a part thereof. Grear v. McCarter, 5 Kan. 18, 23; Derrig v. Regie, 8 Kan. 532 at sup., and cases there cited.

Also, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it will be presumed by the courts that the laws of all the other States are similar to their own. Furrow v. Chapin, 13 Kan. 107; Dodge v. Coffin, 15 Kan. 285 at sup., and cases there cited; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Outter, 16 Kan. 508; Broughman v. Broughman, 30 Kan. 331.

And, when the situs of a debt is changed from the State or jurisdiction in which the debt was created to some other State or jurisdiction, all its incidents and conditions materially affecting it will be transferred with it, and its interpretation, scope and validity will be governed by the lex loci contractus. For instance, if the debt is exempt from judicial process in the State where it is created, the exemption will follow the debt, as an incident thereto, into any other State or jurisdiction into which the debt may be supposed to be carried. Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 60 Mich. 108, 13 West. Rep. 730; Wright v. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co., 19 Neb. 175; Raylin v. Houghton, 15 Vt. 626; Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 66 Wis. 268. And see, especially, the opinion in the case of Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Matthy, 34 Kan. 125, 128.

In the language of the Michigan case above cited, the exemption of the debt from judicial process "becomes a vested right in rem, which follows the debt into any jurisdiction where the debt may be considered as going." Also, the situs of a debt is either with the owner thereof or at his domicile, or where the debt is to be paid; and it cannot be subjected to a proceeding in garnishment anywhere else. See the numerous authorities hereafter cited, commencing with the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Doolley, 78 Ala. 534.

I shall now proceed to consider this case with reference to its facts.

The Missouri Pacific Railway Company, a Missouri corporation doing business in Missouri and Kansas and other States, and operating over 2,000 miles of railway in Kansas, owes a debt, not evidenced by any instrument in writing, to J. W. Sharitt, a resident of Kansas, for wages earned by him as yard master for the Railway Company at Council Grove, Kan., and presumably payable at that place, which wages are, under the laws of Kansas, and presumably under the laws of Missouri, as nothing appears to the contrary, exempt from execution, attachment, garnishment and other process. W. P. Stewart, a resident of Missouri, who puts forth the claim that Sharitt owes him, instituted a garnishment proceeding before a justice of the peace of that State against the Railway Company to procure the payment to him of the debt which the Railway Company owes to Sharitt. Such proceeding is now pending in the Circuit Court of St. Louis, Mo. No service of summons was ever made upon Sharitt in that case except by publication. The question now arises, and it is the principal question involved in this case, whether Sharitt is bound by such garnishment proceedings or not. Now, unless the Missouri court has jurisdiction of Sharitt, or of something belonging to him, of course the proceeding is void as to him, and, as no personal service of summons was ever made upon him, it will be admitted that the proceeding is without jurisdiction and void as to him personally. But the further question remains, is the proceeding without jurisdiction and void as to any property belonging to Sharitt? Or, in other words, has the Missouri court any jurisdiction, as against Sharitt, over the debt which the Railway Company owes to Sharitt? Sharitt is not a resident of Missouri, nor is he in that State; but, on the contrary, he is a resident of Kansas, and in Kansas, and he has never been served, personally, with any summons in the garnishment proceeding. The debt is not evidenced by any written instrument, but, if it were, the instrument would presumably be in Kansas and in the hands of Sharitt. It is not payable in Missouri, but on the contrary, it is presumably payable in Kansas, where it was created, and where Sharitt resides; and in Kansas, and presumably in Missouri, it is exempt from all judicial process. It is not claimed that the Railway Company has ever set apart any fund, either in Missouri, or in Kansas or elsewhere, for the purpose of paying this particular debt. Hence there is no specific fund connected with this debt, nor any tangible thing to which any jurisdiction could attach. But, if it should be supposed that any particular fund had been set apart to pay this debt, then it should be supposed that it was so set apart in Kansas, as the debt was created in Kansas, is already due in Kansas and is payable in Kansas, and probably the Railway Company could not set apart a fund in Missouri so as to defeat Sharitt's claim in Kansas. The debt is really and in fact a mere chose in action, resting wholly in parol, and is of such an intangible character that it could not be actually seized by any kind of process. And it can hardly be said to have any actual situs anywhere; but, if it should be considered as having any actual situs anywhere, then its more natural situs is where it is to be paid,—in Kansas, and to Sharitt.

It is seldom, and perhaps never, held that the property in a debt, a mere chose in action, can be carried around with the debtor wherever he may go, and exist wherever he may be. Drake, Attachm. §§ 474, 481; Wade, Attachm. § 344. Wheat v. Platte City & Ft. D. R. Co. 4 Kan. 370.

But, on the contrary, the situs of a debt is generally held to be with the creditor, or at his domicile, or at the place where it is made payable. It is the creditor that owns the debt, and not the debtor, and the situs of the debt must be considered as being either with the owner or at his domicile, or where it is to be paid. Indeed, the more natural situs of any contract, whether a debt or not, would seem to be where it is to be performed. Even tangible property is not subject to garnishment proceedings in a State or jurisdiction in which the property is not situated. See the above authorities, and also Bates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 60 Wis. 206, 304, 305. See also Sutherland v. Second Nat. Bank, 78 Ky 250.

Now, under the facts of this case, we do not think that the Missouri court has any jurisdiction, either of Sharitt, or of anything belonging or appertaining to him; and hence the garnishment proceeding is void as to him. We think the weight of authority sustains this view of the case. See the authorities already cited, and also the following: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dooley, 78 Ala. 524; Lecky v. Albee, 33 Me 414; Lawrence v. Smith, 45 N. H. 618; Miller v. Hens, 2 Cranch, C. C. 622; Hamilton v. Rogers, 67 Mich. 123, 10 West. Rep. 908; Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 69 Mich. 168, 13 West. Rep. 720; Bayliss v. Houghton, 15 Vt. 626; Toule v. Wilder, 57 Vt. 623; Wright v. Chicago, R. & O. R. Co. 19 Neb. 175; Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 209; Tingley v. Bateman, 10 Mass. 249; Nye v. Liscombe, 21 Pick. 263; Sawyer v. Thompson, 24 N. H. 310; Western R. Co. v. Thornton, 60 Ga. 300; Green v. Farmers & C. Bank, 23 Conn. 458; Cronin v. Foster, 12 R. I. 196; Bates v. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. 4 Abb. Pr. 72; Willet v. Equitable Ins. Co. 10 Abb. Pr. 193; Noble v. Thompson Oil Co. 70 Pa. 254; Meyer v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 40 Md. 505; Wheat v. Platte City & Ft. D. R. Co. 4 Kan. 370.

As before stated, it is not the debtor who can carry or transfer or transport the property in a debt from one State or jurisdiction into another. The situs of the property in a debt can be changed only by the change of location of the creditor who is the owner thereof, or with his consent.

It will be seen from what has been said that my concurrence in the decision in this case is founded almost wholly upon the theory that the Missouri court has no jurisdiction of Sharitt or of anything belonging or appertaining to him, and therefore that there can be no such thing as a lis pendens by virtue of the Missouri proceeding, with regard to the subject matter of this action, which is the debt, and nothing in the Missouri proceeding that can be considered as valid or binding as against Sharitt. And all my argument is also based upon the theory that the court first obtaining jurisdiction of the subject matter of an action has the superior right to exercise jurisdiction over such subject matter. But, not wishing to be misunderstood in this case, I will be a little more explicit as to some matters. I think that the Missouri court has jurisdiction of Stewart, the plaintiff in the Missouri action, and of the Railway Company, the garnishee; and that any judgment or order which might be rendered or made by the Missouri court as against Stewart or the Railway Company would be valid and binding as against them. And if Stewart, the plaintiff in that action, had obtained personal service of summons in Missouri upon Sharitt, then any judgment or order which might be rendered or made by the Missouri court as against Sharitt, or against the garnishee, would also be valid and binding as to Sharitt. And, even without personal service of summons upon Sharitt, if he had any tangible property in Missouri, which the Missouri court could seize, even money in the hands of some other person, any judgment or order of such court which might be made or rendered after the seizure of such property would be valid as against Sharitt. And, further, if it could be considered that the debt owing by the Railway Company to Sharitt had a situs in Missouri, then any judgment or order made or rendered by such court respecting such debt would be valid; and, if Sharitt were a resident of Missouri, or was even temporarily there, at the time of the attempted seizure of the debt, or if the debt was made payable in Missouri, it might perhaps be considered that the debt had such a situs in Missouri that it might be subject to the order or judgment of the Missouri court. But none of these things exist in this case; and hence, in my opinion, the Missouri court has no jurisdiction of Sharitt, or of anything appertaining or belonging to Sharitt.

Of course, the laws of a State can have no extraterritorial force; and therefore, if exempt tangible property, such as could be seized by process, were carried into another State or jurisdiction, such property might cease to be exempt, and might be seized and held in attachment or garnishment proceedings for the payment of debts, but debts existing in Kansas are not at the same time that kind of property in Missouri. Whether what we have just said with respect to tangible property would apply to debts created under contracts made under laws exempting such debts from all judicial process, it is not necessary, in this case, to express any opinion. But, generally, contracts with respect to everything of substance inhering in them—and the laws of the country where the contracts are made, so far as such laws affect the contracts, are generally considered as inhering in the contracts—are governed and determined by the lex loci contractus, in whatever jurisdiction the construction or character of such contracts comes into consideration. Several cases are referred to as enunciating doctrines adverse to the views herein expressed, to wit: Pirguson v. Bank of Kansas City, 25 Kan. 333; Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 180; Zimmerman v. Pranks, 34 Kan. 650; Stark v. Bere, 39 Kan. 100; Daniels v. Clark, 38 Iowa, 550; Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 285; Leiber v. Union Pac. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 693; Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 340; Green v. Van Buren, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 129 [14 L. ed. 100]; Connor v. Hanover Ins. Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 549; Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 63; Osborne v. Schutt, 67 Mo. 712; Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 286; Sturtevant v. Robinson, 18 Pick. 173; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 25 Ohio St. 347; Snook v. Snetser, Id. 316; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 33 Ala. 462.

Scarcely any of the above cases have any application to the question whether a court of one State, by virtue of a garnishment proceeding against a resident garnishee, but against a nonresident and absent defendant, residing in another State, and owing a debt created and payable to him in his own State, and by virtue of a service of summons upon the defendant only by publication, could obtain sufficient jurisdiction over the nonresident and absent defendant, or over the debt created and payable to him in the State of his residence, that such court could render a judgment or make an order against the garnishee that would be valid and binding as against the defendant.

The case of Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 180, is relied upon principally among the Kansas cases, but no such question was presented or decided in that case. In the opinion in that case, it is said, among other things: "Again, no question arises here as to the effect of a judgment against the garnishee in the courts of this State, as against proceedings to collect the debt in the State of Nebraska, where the debt was created. As to that question, the cases of Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 36 Wis. 228, and Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 43 Iowa, 285, supra, seem to be divergent. As to which states the law correctly, we need not now inquire. The question in this case is not what is the effect of a judgment against a garnishee, but what ought to be such judgment." 31 Kan. 194.

In the leading Iowa case of Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 43 Iowa, 285, jurisdiction was conceded. See opinion, p. 287.

This was also the case in the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 25 Ohio St. 347. In that case, jurisdiction was admitted by the pleadings.

In the case of Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 286, the question was not one of jurisdiction, but one of assignment. Besides, the actual situs of the debt in that case was, in all probability, just where the proceedings were commenced. The debt was probably payable there.

The case of Green v. Van Buren, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 129 [14 L. ed. 100], has no application to this case. No debt was attempted to be taken in attachment or garnishment in that case.

The case of Connor v. Hanover Ins. Co., 28 Fed. Rep. 549, has perhaps some application to this case, though it certainly does not furnish much authority against the views herein expressed. It also criticizes unfavorably the decision made by this court in the case of Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 180.

The case of Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 59, is probably applicable. And yet the owner of the debt in that case was served personally with notice the next morning after the garnishment proceeding was instituted. This service of notice, however, was probably, for reasons not necessary to mention, not sufficient to give the foreign court jurisdiction.

In the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 33 Ala. 462, the owner of the debt was served personally with summons in the foreign jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to mention more particularly the other cases cited for the Railway Company.

The principal argument urged against holding that the Railroad Company is liable in the present case is that by such holding, and by the possible judgment of the Missouri court, the Company might be required to pay the debt twice. This would certainly be wrong, but wherein would the wrong consist? If this court is right, should it refrain from doing its duty because of some possible wrong somewhere else? Should this court violate its own laws because some foreign court may ignore them? Besides, is the Railroad Company the only party entitled to sympathy? Is not the owner of the debt, with his family, also entitled to some consideration? The debt is his personal earnings, for his own personal services for less than three months—indeed, for less than one month—next preceding the issuing of the garnishment process, and is necessary for the support of his family, and, by the laws of his own State, is exempt from the payment of his debts, and from all judicial process. Now, notwithstanding the fact that this fund is set apart by the laws of the State for the support of himself and family, and is necessary for their support, may it be taken away from them by a foreign jurisdiction four or five hundred miles away,—and it might be thousands of miles away,—and, possibly, upon some false or trumped-up charge, without any personal service of summons upon him? Is he not entitled to have his day in court, and in a court that has first rightfully obtained jurisdiction of him personally, or of his debt? If it be said that the garnishee should serve notice upon him, then what is such notice for? Is such notice necessary in order to give the foreign court jurisdiction of the owner of the debt, or of the debt? Will it be admitted that, without such a notice from the garnishee, the judgment or order rendered or made by the foreign court would be without jurisdiction and void as to the owner of the debt, and still claimed that, with such notice, such judgment or order would be valid and binding as to him? Besides, the garnishee might be unable to give the notice; and, if he could not, then what? I would hardly think that such a notice could give jurisdiction to the foreign court, if it did not have jurisdiction prior to that notice. Besides, why compel the owner of the debt, upon such a notice, to go four or five hundred miles or more to defend an action, and thereby spend more money than the amount of his debt? It might be better for him and his family to lose the debt entirely, and let the laws of the State setting it apart for the benefit and support of himself and family become nugatory and inoperative. Of course, the debt in this case is small,—only $75; but it is a great deal to the laborer who earned it, and his family, and the State has set it apart for the support of his family; and the principle as to jurisdiction is the same as though the debt amounted to many thousands of dollars. If the rule contended for by the Railroad Company should be adopted, then it would be prudent for every creditor to continually watch his debtor, and to follow him around into every jurisdiction into which he might go, for fear that some unscrupulous person, who really had no just claim, might institute a garnishment proceeding and obtain the debt before the creditor could have an opportunity to prevent it. I concur in affirming the judgment of the court below.

A motion for rehearing was subsequently filed and in response thereto the following opinions were filed:

For Curiam:

Now comes on for decision the motion for a rehearing of this cause, and thereupon it is ordered that the said motion be overruled.

C. L. R. A.

Kerton, Ch. J., dissenting:

When the judgment of affirmance was rendered in this court, I had grave doubts whether the law had been properly declared. Since then, I have re-examined the facts disclosed by the record, the decisions referred to by the attorneys and the authorities in the opinions heretofore filed. My opinion now is that a rehearing should be granted, and that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed. My reasons are as follows:

It appears that Sharritt, the employé, during the month of June, 1887, performed manual labor for the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, which system extends through Missouri and Kansas. For these services the Railway Company owed its employé wages,—a debt. These wages are exempt from attachment or garnishment under the laws of this State. W. P. Stewart, a creditor of Sharritt, who resided in St. Louis, Mo., brought an action against him by attachment in St. Louis on the 18th day of July, 1887, and garnished the Railway Company, which answered on July 28, 1887, to the facts of its indebtedness to the employé; and, upon its answer, judgment was rendered against the Company. The employé was served by publication. From the order of judgment requiring the Company to pay the wages or debt to the creditor, the Company appealed to the Circuit Court of St. Louis, Mo., where the action is now pending. Subsequent to the commencement of the action by attachment in St. Louis, Mo., and on the 27th day of July, 1887, Sharritt commenced his action before a justice of the peace in Franklin County, of this State, to recover the same wages or debt which had been garnished in St. Louis, Mo. The justice of the peace rendered judgment against the Railway Company. The Company took an appeal to the District Court of Franklin County, and that court also rendered judgment in favor of the employé, and against the Railway Company. This is complained of.

The question in the case therefore is, Can the employé of the Railway Company bring his action in this State, and recover his wages, notwithstanding the defendant Company has been garnished for the same wages by the employé's creditor in Missouri? Although the amount in dispute is small, the principles involved are important. Several great lines of railroad, like the Atchison, the Missouri Pacific, the Rock Island and others, extend through this into other States. These railroads have thousands of employés in their service whose wages are liable to be garnished, and the law ought not to compel them to pay for the services of an employé twice,—once to the creditor, and afterwards to the employé. Again, many of the employés of these railroads go from State to State in search of work, and often change their employer as well as their residence. These wage workers ought to be protected in the payment of their personal earnings to themselves, which generally are exempt under the statutes of most of the States, so far as the law will permit. "The laborer is worthy of his hire." If the Railway Company is compelled to satisfy the judgment rendered against it in Missouri, then the employé ought not to recover, and the action commenced in this State should be delayed until the final disposition of the attachment or garnishee proceedings in Missouri. Ferguson v. Bank of Kansas City, 25 Kan. 333.

"Of course, no debtor should be required to pay his debt twice, but, at the same time, if he goes into a State outside the State of his residence, and transacts business therein, he must expect, as to all matters of procedure and remedy, to abide by the laws of that State. . . . It cannot be doubted that the courts of the State where he resides will respect a judgment rendered against him in this State, provided he has made a perfect and full disclosure, and a reasonable defense, against the claim presented." Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 190.

Kent says: "A lis pendens, before the tribunals of another jurisdiction, has, in cases of proceedings in rem, been held to be a good plea in abatement of a suit. Thus, where a creditor of A, a bankrupt, had, bona fide and by regular process, attached in another State a debt due to A, and in the hands of B, it has been held that the assignees of the bankrupt could not, by subsequent suit, recover the debt of B. The pendency of the foreign attachment is a good plea in abatement of the suit. In such a case, the equity of the maxim, qui prior est tempore, potior est jure, forcibly applies. Unless the plea in abatement was allowed in such a case, the defendant would be left without protection, and would be obliged to pay the debt twice." 3 Kent, Com. 122, 123, 125. See Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 52; Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, §§ 21-23; Connor v. Hanover Ins. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 549; Freeman, Executions, 2d ed. § 209.

Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 36 Wis. 268, is in conflict with some of the foregoing decisions, but that case has been severely criticized. 3 Cent. L. J. 378.

But, upon examination, that case does not, I think, militate against the conclusion I have reached. It is said in that case: "The garnishee must bring the fact of the exemption to the notice of the court where the attachment is pending, or notify the employé of the pendency of the proceedings. In the State of Missouri the supreme court holds that the exemption of property from judicial process is a personal privilege of its owner, and that the debtor of such owner cannot assert it for him by way of defense to a garnishment proceeding." Osborne v. Schull, 67 Mo. 712. Therefore the Railway Company could not, under the decisions of Missouri, have protected itself or its employé by alleging the exemption of the wages attached. As the attachment proceedings are still pending in Missouri, and the employé has notice now of these proceedings even within the Wisconsin rule, the garnishee has done all that it could do. If the law is decided otherwise, it is manifest that the Railroad Company will be subjected to a double liability, which does not comport with justice.

It is argued in the concurring opinion that, as Sharitt is not a resident of Missouri, and has not been personally served with any summons in the garnishment proceeding, the action in Missouri by Stewart, a resident of Missouri, and the creditor of Sharitt, against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, a Missouri corporation is void as being without jurisdiction, and therefore that the garnishment proceeding is no defense to the action of Sharitt in this State. This view of the law is not, I think, sustained by the weight of the authorities.

Drake, in his work on Attachment, § 697, says: "Where the garnishee is indebted, it will not vary his liability that his contract with the defendant is to pay the money in another State or country than that in which the attachment is pending. Thus, where it was urged as a ground for discharging a garnishee, that his debt to the defendant was contracted in England, and was payable there only, so that the defendant could not, and therefore the plaintiff could not, make it payable elsewhere, the court said: 'We do not perceive any legal principle upon which the objection rests. This was a debt from the garnishee everywhere, in whatever country his person or property might be found. A suit might have been maintained by the defendant here, and therefore the debt may be attached here.'"

In Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 286, it was held that "where W., a banker in England, having advanced money to pay a bill of exchange drawn upon him by M., a citizen of this State, became a bankrupt, and, after an assignment of his effects by commissioners of bankruptcy, but before notice of it had reached this country, the debt due from M. (he not having remitted funds to replace the money advanced) was attached in his hands, by virtue of our trustee process, by B., a citizen of the State, and a creditor of the bankrupt, the attachment was held valid as against the assignment." In the opinion in that case it is said: "By our law the service of a trustee process upon one who is indebted to the defendant in the suit creates a lien upon the debt in favor of the plaintiff in the action, so that, if he recovers judgment against the principal, he shall have execution against the trustee to the amount of the effects in his hands or the debt which he owes; and no distinction is made, in the application of this law, between citizens who may be trustees of other citizens, and those citizens who may be indebted to a person residing in a foreign country, who is indebted to citizens of the United States."

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 35 Ohio St. 347, it was decided that, "in an action to recover money due on contract, it is a sufficient defense to show that the money sought to be recovered has been attached by process of garnishment duly issued by a court of a sister State, in an action there prosecuted against the plaintiff by his creditors, although it appears that the plaintiff and such creditors are all residents of this State."

So, where the debt was contracted where the garnishment took place, but the garnishee agreed to pay the money in another State, he was nevertheless charged. Sturtevant v. Robinson, 13 Pick. 175. See also Leider v. Union Pac. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 688; Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 346.

The concurring opinion, it seems to me, attempts to establish a rule which ignores the fact that the proceedings in garnishment in Missouri are entitled to full faith and credit as a judgment of a sister State, and that, being proceedings in rem, and the debt being condemned by a court having jurisdiction, the judgment cannot be contested in this State. Stewart, the creditor in the garnishment proceedings, is a resident of Missouri. The Missouri Pacific Railway Company is a corporation of Missouri. At the time of the garnishment proceedings that corporation owed money to J. W. Sharitt. Sharitt was duly served by publication. The court of Missouri had jurisdiction both of Stewart and the Railway Company, and had full authority to condemn any money owing by that Company to any of its employes, whether residents or nonresidents, if payable in Missouri. "Every country [State] may regulate as it pleases the disposition of personal property found within it, and may prefer its attaching creditor to any foreign assignee; and no authority has a right to question the determination." Blake v. Williams, supra.

This point was expressly decided in Connor v. Hanover Ins. Co., supra. The syllabus in that case is as follows: "The defendant, an insurance company under the laws of New York, but doing business also in Illinois and Michigan, became indebted to the nominal plaintiff, a resident of Michigan, for a loss under one of its policies, which loss was, after adjustment, assigned by her to the actual plaintiff, also a resident of that State. Creditors of the nominal plaintiff, citizens of Illinois, commenced suit in that State by attachment against her, and garnished the defendant there. Subsequently to the service of garnishment in Illinois, the assignee of the plaintiff began suit against the defendant in Michigan, and obtained judgment before the case in Illinois was tried. Judgment was soon afterwards had in Illinois. Held, (1) that, as a general rule, the situs of a debt is either at the domicile of the creditor, or at the place where it is payable, (2) that, under the laws of Illinois, suit having been first commenced there, and the courts of that State having obtained by garnishment control of the subject matter, there was no jurisdiction in the courts of Michigan."

Of course, between courts of concurrent jurisdiction, the court first acquiring jurisdiction will retain, and the other will not interfere with, it. The courts of Missouri first acquired jurisdiction of the debt or money due to Sharitt, and the courts of this State ought not to interfere in that case until the cause is finally disposed of.

If the rule is established as stated in the opinion, then the Railway Company is twice liable for the same debt,—once to Stewart, the creditor in Missouri, and then again to Sharitt, in this State. The Company has done and is doing all it can to defeat and escape any liability in the garnishment proceeding. It has appealed from the judgment of the justice of the peace of St. Louis to the Circuit Court of St. Louis County, and has notified Sharitt of the pendency of the garnishment proceedings. The Company is helpless. In Missouri, exemption is a personal privilege. The Company cannot assert the exemption for Sharitt. Osborne v. Sharitt, supra.

Sharitt can alone exercise this personal privilege. If he will assert his rights in the Missouri court, the debt or money will be declared exempt. It all lies with Sharitt. Under the circumstances, ought the Company to pay twice, when the action of Sharitt will prevent any judgment against him or the Railway Company in Missouri? Ought the Railway Company to suffer a double liability because Sharitt refuses to answer in a case in which he has been served by publication, and in which he has been personally notified by the Railway Company? I think not. It is stated in one of the foregoing opinions that "the debt is really and in fact a mere chose in action, resting wholly in parol, and is of such an intangible character that it could not be actually seized by any kind of process; and it can hardly be said to have any actual situs anywhere." Ante, p. 357.

It is further stated in one of the opinions: "I think that the Missouri court has jurisdiction of Stewart, the plaintiff in the Missouri action, and of the Railway Company, the garnishee, and that any judgment or order which might be rendered or made by the Missouri court as against Stewart or the Railway Company would be valid and binding as against them." Ante, p. 357.

It was said by Mr. Justice Brewer in Durlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan 180, that "a mere debt is transitory, and may be enforced wherever the debtor or his property can be found, and if the creditor can enforce the collection of his debt in the courts of this State, a creditor of such creditor should have equal facilities."

I think that Sharitt, as a creditor of the Railway Company, could have enforced the collection of his debt in the courts of Missouri; and if he could have an action in that State, his creditor is entitled to equal facilities. It is not shown anywhere in the record that the debt was payable in the place or county where Sharitt performed his labor; and, if the decision is carried to its logical results, Sharitt should have brought his suit at Council Grove, or in the county where he worked, and not in Franklin County. If his debt was created in Morris County according to the decision, it was payable in Morris County; and therefore, according to the decision, he had no right to bring his action at Ottawa. This, however, is not the law. "A mere debt is transitory, and may be enforced wherever the debtor or his property can be found."

If it be decided by this court, under the facts of this case, that the Missouri court has no jurisdiction either of Sharitt, or of anything belonging to him, or of any money due to him, and that therefore the garnishment proceeding in Missouri is void as to him, then there can be no garnishment of a person in this State owing a debt to a person residing in another State. The practice among the profession is contrary to this decision. Very often persons in this State owing debts to nonresidents are garnished by the creditors of the nonresidents in this State, and the only service had on the nonresidents is by publication; being the same service had in the Missouri court upon Sharitt. §§ 28-54, pp. 703-706, Comp. Laws 1885.

Section 72 of the Civil Code of this State expressly provides, the same as the Missouri Code, that "service may be made by publication in . . . actions brought against a nonresident of this State, or a foreign corporation, having in this State property or debts owing to them, sought to be taken by any of the provisional remedies, or to be appropriated in any way." I think, however, that this court is foreclosed by its previous decisions, and that the rule stated in the concurring opinion cannot be adopted unless the prior cases are overruled.

In Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 81 Kan. 180, the railroad corporation was organized, and had its principal place of business in Nebraska, but its line extended into this State. It was garnished in the courts of this State for a debt due to one of its employes for wages, at the suit of the creditor of the employe. The employe resided in Nebraska, had earned his wages there, and those wages were exempt to him and his family by the laws of that State. No service of process was had on the principal defendant. It did not appear where the plaintiff resided. The able district judge at Atchison County (Judge Martin) held in that case "that under our Statute, when a railroad company incorporated under the laws of a sister State leases a line of railroad in this State, and keeps local agents, and operates its lines, within this county, it is liable to the process of a garnishment here for all indebtedness which may be owing to a defendant, although, by the usual course of its business, such indebtedness is payable at the principal office of the corporation in the sister State, the corporation, in such case, being an inhabitant of this State for the purpose of business, and the service of process upon it, and the indebtedness not being of a local character, but enforceable in any jurisdiction in which service may be had." The railroad company prosecuted its writ of error to this court, and expressly made the point "that a foreign corporation cannot be garnished in this State, as the debtor of a non-resident, for a debt contracted and payable in a foreign State, by service on a servant or on the officers of the corporation." The judgment of the trial court was affirmed. Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said: "He [the plaintiff] is a citizen of Kansas, appealing only to the laws and the courts of this State for the collection of his debt, and simply denying that the laws of another State shall prevent the collection of his debt according to the laws and procedure of his own State." The syllabus states the following proposition of law: "A foreign corporation coming into this State, and leasing property and doing business here, may be garnished for a debt due to one of its employes, although such employe is not a resident of this State, and although the debt was contracted outside of the State." At the time of the rendition of this decision, the members of this court were Mr. Justice Valentine, Mr. Justice Brewer and the writer. Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion in this case. All of the justices concurred in affirming the judgment of the trial judge.

In Zimmerman v. Franke, 34 Kan. 650, Franke was perpetually enjoined from prosecuting garnishment proceedings in Nebraska against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company by Zimmerman, who was indebted to Franke, and who had personal earnings coming to him from the railway company. Both Franke and Zimmerman resided at Atchison, in this State; but Zimmerman was an employe of the railway company, running between Kansas City and Omaha. He was the head of a family. Zimmerman was not personally served with any process in or from Nebraska, and Franke was proceeding, before the injunction, to collect his claim against Zimmerman, by garnishment in Nebraska, from the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. If the garnishment proceeding in Nebraska was without jurisdiction and void as to any debt or money coming or belonging to Zimmerman, why was this court asked to interfere with its strong arm to forbid Franke from carrying on a void and useless proceeding in Nebraska? That decision, as I understand it, was rendered upon the theory that, if Franke was permitted to prosecute his proceedings by garnishment in Nebraska, he would thereby deprive Zimmerman of his personal earnings, which were exempt under the laws of this State.

In Stark v. Bare, 89 Kan. 100, the latter was a married man, living in this State, and engaged in the service of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company. He was indebted to Stark, and Stark, to evade the Exemption Laws of this State, sold his claim to John W. Leatherbury, of Kansas City, Mo., for the purpose of permitting Leatherbury to bring an action in Missouri, by garnishment against the railroad company, to appropriate the personal earnings due from the railroad company to Bare. This court sustained a judgment in favor of Bare against Stark upon the ground that the garnishment proceedings instituted by Leatherbury against the railroad company in Missouri deprived Stark of his personal earnings from the railroad company. This decision was also rendered upon the theory that the garnishment proceedings of Missouri deprived Bare, the employe, of the debt due from the railroad company to him in Kansas. Both of these decisions follow Snook v. Snook, 25 Ohio St. 518.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 1d. 342, it was decided, as already stated, that, "in an action to recover money due on contract, it is a sufficient defense to show that the money sought to be recovered has been attached by process of garnishment, duly issued by a court of a sister State, in an action there prosecuted against the plaintiff by his creditors, although it appear that the plaintiff and such creditors are all residents of this State."

I do not think the decisions cited in the opinion and in the concurring opinion, adversely to the views herein expressed, have very much application to this case.

In the cases of Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mallory, 34 Kan. 181, and Kansas City, St. J. & G. R. Co. v. Gough, 35 Kan. 1, about all that was decided was that, where the debt of the garnishee to the defendant is by the laws of Kansas and Missouri exempt, the debt is exempt in this State from garnishment, and no distinction is to be made between residents and nonresidents.

In Bates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 60 Wm. 206, a carload of hogs was attempted to be attached by garnishment. It was held in that case that "property outside of the State is not the subject of garnishment under our Statute, and that a common carrier cannot be held liable as a garnishee for goods in actual transit when the process is served."

In Sutherland v. Second Nat. Bank, 78 Ky. 250, a carload of oats was attached, and the attachment was held wrongful, because the oats were beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

In Wheat v. Platte City & Ft. D. R. Co., 4 Kan. 370, an attempt was made to attach or garnish $300,000 of Leavenworth bonds, which were in the State of Missouri, and in the possession of the treasurer of the railroad company. Many of the other decisions cited in the concurring opinion are like these. Of course no one contests but that these are the law as to the points decided, but the situs of personal property, like "bogs, oats and bonds," is somewhat different to the situs of debts owing to employes and other persons.

In Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 19 Neb. 176, the case was very similar to Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Malby, supra, and disposed of the same way, that decision being fully cited and approved. Something, however, was said in that decision and in several of the other cases cited, about debts not being liable to garnishment where the corporation or person garnished is not owing the debtor money payable in the State where the proceedings are commenced. Again, some of these decisions go to the effect that debts are local, and remain at the residence of the debtor. I need not review these cases, because they do not meet the question presented as to the jurisdiction of the Missouri court, under the laws of that State, over the debt of the Railway Company due to Sharitt. They are nearly all cases where the garnishment proceedings have been commenced and disposed of in the States where the decisions have been rendered. The decisions are constructions of Garnishment Laws of the States where the decisions have been rendered. The question whether proceedings in garnishment of a sister State are entitled to full faith and credit as a judgment, where the corporation or person owing the debt has been garnished in such sister State, and service has been made by publication upon the debtor, is not discussed in but one or two, and those cases are very different from this. I think, if Sharitt had brought his action in Missouri, instead of Kansas, and the Railroad Company had not been garnished, he could have recovered his wages in that State; and, if he could have recovered his wages by an action brought there, his claim or wages could be attached or garnished there.

v.

Edwin W. COMSTOCK, Resp.

(....S. D....)

*1. The term "negotiable instrument" has a definite signification in the law-merchant.

*Head notes by BENNETT, J.

NOTE.—Negotiable instruments.

A negotiable instrument must be a complete and perfect instrument when it is issued, or there must be authority reposed in someone afterwards to supply anything needed to make it perfect. Davis & M. Co. v. Best, 7 Cent. Rep. 53, 106 N. Y. 50.

One drawing the form of a promissory note which is unsigned, and which falls into the hands of another, does not thereby authorize the holder to attach the maker's signature. Ibid.

The instrument must be certain as to payment in order to be negotiable. Chapman v. Wight, 5 New Eng. Rep. 787, 79 Me. 596. See note to Wright v. Traver (Mich.) 8 L. R. A. 80.

A note which contains other provisions than the unconditional payment of money is non-negotiable. South Bend Iron Works v. Paddock, 37 Kan. 620.

Conditions in a promissory note, other than for the payment of money only, are nugatory. Dwelling House Ins. Co. v. Hardie, 37 Kan. 674.

A bill not payable absolutely in money but which may be paid in demand bills on London, and which conditions the liability to pay on the arrival of a vessel at her destination, is not negotiable. The Lykus, 36 Fed. Rep. 919.

That an instrument may be a promissory note it must contain on its face an express promise to pay money. Hence an instrument in the following form: "I. O. U. the sum of $17.05 for value received," signed by the maker, is not a promissory note. Gay v. Rooke (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 302.

and the meaning of the term has not been changed by the Code. A negotiable instrument is one that is simple, certain and unconditional.

2. Certainty as to the payer and payee. the amount to be paid and the terms of payment, is an essential quality of a negotiable promissory note, and that certainty must continue until the obligation is discharged.

3. The following is a copy of a note held to be non-negotiable: "On or before the 1st

A written instrument, wherein the maker states that there will be due to the other party a stated sum on "final settlement" of a designated transaction between them, is an expression of the obligation of the maker in the amount stated, but qualified as respects the payment, the amount not being payable at once, but chargeable against the maker upon settlement as specified. Rhodes v. Pray, 26 Minn. 302.

An instrument as follows: "Due to [a certain person] and payable when the suit now in court between him and [another] is settled," a stated sum,—is not a promissory note. Burgess v. Fairbanks, 33 Cal. 215.

Orders for delivery of oil drawn upon one holding it as bailee are not negotiable instruments. Barre v. Morton, 43 Hun. 479.

A school order is not a negotiable instrument such as to have any greater validity in the hands of a transferee than in the hands of the first holder. Shakespeare v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638.

A note payable at a future day certain, or earlier, at the option of the holder, is not negotiable. Richards v. Barlow, 1 New Eng. Rep. 573, 140 Mass. 218.

To render a note unnegotiable it must show on its face that the promise to pay is conditional, and renders the amount to be paid uncertain. Ibid.

The lack of indorsement by the payee of a negotiable note renders it, in the hands of a third person, non-negotiable. Weber v. Orman, 10 West. Rep. 261, 91 Mo. 377.

day of December, 1884, for value received, I or we, the undersigned, living 8 miles of Howard P. O., County of Miner, Territory of Dakota, promise to pay Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company or order one hundred dollars, at the Miner County Bank, in Howard, with interest from date until paid at the rate of ten per cent per annum, eight per cent if paid when due. The indorsers, signers and guarantors severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and notice of nonpayment of this note, and diligence in bringing suit against any party to this note, and sureties agree that time of payment may be extended without notice or other consent. (May 12, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Miner County in favor of defendant in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. D. D. Holdridge, for appellant:

If the amount can be ascertained from the face of the paper, the form of expression is immaterial.

1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 57; Parsons v. Jackson, 99 U. S. 440 (25 L. ed. 460).

The spirit of the rule requiring precision in the amount of negotiable instruments applies rather to the principal amount than to the auxiliary and incidental additions of interest or exchange.

1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 44.

It may be said the clause "if paid when due" brings an element of uncertainty into the note. But a note made payable "on or before" a certain date is just as uncertain, yet it is nevertheless negotiable.

Ackley School Dist. v. Hall, 118 U. S. 123 (28 L. ed. 934); 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 43.

All the authorities sustain the negotiability of these notes unless it be the case of Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488.

That case cites no authorities and is very brief, yet it is essentially different from this case, and is not against any position here taken.

Mr. Gottlieb Engel for respondent.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the plaintiff and appellant against the defendant and respondent upon two promissory notes. The following is a copy of said notes:

"On or before the 1st day of December, 1884, for value received, I or we, the undersigned, living five miles of Howard P. O., County of Miner, Territory of Dakota, promise to pay to Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company or order one hundred dollars, at the Miner County Bank, in Howard, with interest from date until paid at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, 8 per cent if paid when due. The indorsers, signers and guarantors severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and notice of nonpayment of this note, and diligence in bringing suit against any party to this note, and sureties agree that time of payment may be extended without notice or other consent.

"Edwin W. Comstock."

Upon the trial the cause was submitted to the court, sitting as a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts: "(1) That on the 18th day of August, 1888, the defendant, Ed-

A promise in writing to pay money, upon condition that "this note is to be given up" if the sum is paid to a third person within a time specified, is not a promissory note, and is barred by the Statute of Limitations in six years. Chapman v. Wright, 5 New Eng. Rep. 787, 79 Me. 288.

A promissory note may be negotiable without expressing the time at which it will become payable. Hall v. Toby, 1 Cent. Rep. 54, 110 Pa. 318.

A note payable to bearer is negotiable as commercial paper, if it possesses the other essential requisites of such negotiable instruments. New v. Walker, 5 West. Rep. 373, 108 Ind. 385.

An instrument may be negotiable in one State which yet may be incapable of negotiability by the laws of another State; and the remedy must be in the courts of the latter, on such instrument, according to its own laws. United States Bank v. Donnelly, 88 U. S. 5 Pet. 361 (5 L. ed. 974).

Requisites to negotiability. See note to Slagel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank (Ill.) 7 L. R. A. 337.

Stipulations and agreements which destroy negotiability.

An ordinary promissory note with an added stipulation that "this note is given for part payment of rent of certain pasture fields, and is not to be paid unless I have the use of said premises, in accordance with a certain lease and agreement," is not negotiable. Jennings v. Colorado Springs First Nat. Bank, 12 Colo. 417.

A promissory note, on the face of which, across one end, is written an agreement that the note will be renewed at maturity, is not negotiable. Citizens Nat. Bank v. Piolet, 4 L. R. A. 190, 128 Pa. 194.

An additional agreement in a promissory note, that the holder may sell certain collateral securities 6 L. R. A.

and apply the proceeds in payment, and that the maker will pay any deficiency that may exist forthwith, makes the instrument non-negotiable because of the uncertainty as to the sum payable and the time of payment. Continental Nat. Bank v. Wells, 73 Wis. 232.

A clause in a note binding the maker to pay exchange between two places renders the amount payable uncertain and defeats its negotiability, where there is no fixed rate of exchange established by law or by the terms of the note. Windsor Sav. Bank v. McMahon, 3 L. R. A. 192, 38 Fed. Rep. 288.

To render a note negotiable under the law merchant, the amount to be paid at maturity must be ascertainable by the face of the note without resort to evidence dehors the instrument. Ibid.

A condition in a promissory note, that if it is not paid when due the property described therein for which it is given shall belong to the payee, destroys the character of the instrument as a promissory note, and reduces it to a mere contract. See note to Wright v. Traver (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 50.

A provision in a note for a percentage of the amount due as attorney's fees destroys its negotiability. Adams v. Seaman (Cal.) 7 L. R. A. 234.

A provision in a note for a percentage of the amount due, as attorney's fees "on suit by himself or an attorney employed," destroys its negotiability, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3088, providing that "negotiable instruments must be without any condition not certain of fulfillment." Ibid.

A statement or recital in a note that it is given for the privilege of hanging advertising signs in street cars for three months from a certain subsequent date will not destroy its negotiability. Slagel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank (Ill.) 7 L. R. A. 337.

win W. Comstock, made, executed and delivered to the Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company or order his two certain promissory notes of $100 each. A copy of said notes is set out in the complaint hereto attached. (2) That said notes were given in part payment for a machine. That said machine was warranted by said company, and that said Comstock purchased said machine on the faith of said warranty, and the consideration for said notes wholly failed. That the said defendant had a good and sufficient defense to said notes in the original parties' hands. (3) That on the 9th day of November, 1888, the Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company borrowed of the plaintiff, E. C. Hegeler, the sum of $22,500. That to secure the payment of said sum of money so borrowed the said company, on the 9th day of November, 1888, the same day the said sum was so borrowed, transferred to the plaintiff, E. C. Hegeler, a large number of notes, amounting to about $30,000, and among the notes so transferred were the above described notes. (4) That said notes were so transferred as above stated before they were due, and that the plaintiff had no notice of any defense to the same, but received them in perfect good faith. (5) That at the time of the transfer above mentioned, the Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company properly indorsed said notes to the plaintiff. (6) That at the commencement of this action several thousand dollars of the $22,500 borrowed by the Marsh Binder Manufacturing Company of the plaintiff, E. C. Hegeler, as before stated, and for which the above described notes were taken as security, was still unpaid. (7) That at the commencement of this action the said notes were the property of the plaintiff, due and unpaid. (8) That at the commencement of this action, to wit, February 11, 1889, there was due on both of the above-described notes the sum of $200.80."

The following were the stipulations entered into by the parties as to the legal questions involved in said action, to wit: "(1) Whether the plaintiff, under the above statement, was a bona fide holder. (2) Whether said notes are negotiable instruments so as to cut off in the hands of said plaintiff, procured by him as above stated, all defenses that might have been set up and proven between the original parties to the notes."

Upon the hearing the court found the following conclusions of law: "(1) That said notes are not negotiable instruments, and that said defendant is entitled to prove any defense to said notes that he could have proven in an action between the original parties to said instruments. (2) That the defendant has a good and valid defense against said notes, and to the whole thereof, and is entitled to a judgment of dismissal of plaintiff's action, and for costs,"—and rendered a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's complaint, and that the defendant recover of said plaintiff the costs and disbursements of this action.

Whereupon the plaintiff perfects his appeal, and makes the following assignment of errors: "(1) The court erred in finding that said notes were not negotiable. (2) The court erred in finding that the defendant is entitled to prove any defenses to said notes that he could have proven in an action between the original parties to said instruments. (3) The court erred in finding that the plaintiff, under the statement and stipulation of the parties, was not a bona fide holder. (4) The court erred in finding that the defendant has a good and valid defense against said notes, and that defendant is entitled to a dismissal of plaintiff's action. (5) The judgment is erroneous, and against law."

By stipulation of the parties, and the assignment of errors, the only legal questions involved in this action are these: First. Are the written instruments sued upon negotiable notes? Second. Is the plaintiff a bona fide holder of the same? It is claimed that the following clause renders these notes non-negotiable: "With interest from date until paid, at the rate of 10 per cent, 8 per cent if paid when due."

1. Are said instruments negotiable? The statutes of Dakota, independent of the common law and decisions of state courts, define negotiable instruments and settle their ingredients. We quote from Compiled Laws: "Sec. 4456. A negotiable instrument is a written promise or request for the payment of a certain sum of money to order, or bearer, in conformity to the provisions of this article. Sec. 4457. A negotiable instrument must be made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment." "Sec. 4463. A negotiable instrument must not contain any other contract than such as is specified in this article."

The term "negotiable instrument" has a definite signification in the law-merchant, and the meaning of the term has not been changed by the Code. The principal importance which is to be attached to the question of negotiability arises from the rule of law which subjects all non-negotiable bills and notes to any equities which may exist between prior parties, even when they are transferred before due to a bona fide purchaser for value. A negotiable instrument is one that is simple, certain and unconditional.

Lord Ellenborough, in Smith v. Nightingale, 2 Starkie, 375, held that an instrument wherein the promise "to pay J. B. the sum of sixty five pounds, with lawful interest for the same, and all other sums which should be due him," was not a promissory note. Byles, Bills, 147.

Lord Kenyon, in Charles v. Fancourt, 5 T. R. 485, observed: "It would perplex the commercial transactions of mankind, if paper securities of this kind were issued out into the world incumbered with conditions and contingencies, and if the persons to whom they were offered in negotiation were obliged to inquire when these uncertain events would probably be reduced to a certainty."

In Ayrey v. Fernandes, 4 Mees. & W. 169, Parke, B., held that the words "and all fines according to rule" destroy the negotiability.

In Thompson v. Sloan, 23 Wend 71, the court held that a promise to pay a certain sum in Canada money is not negotiable.

In the case of Jones v. Radatz, 37 Minn. 240, the Supreme Court of Minnesota held the following not a negotiable promissory note:

$185. P O St. Paul, County of Ramsey, State of Minnesota, September 7, 1878.

Three months after date we, or either of us, promise to pay to H. K. White & Co. or bearers $185, payable at the Second National Bank of St. Paul, Minnesota, for value received, with 12 per cent interest per annum from date, and reasonable attorney's fees, if suit be instituted for the collection of this note.

Chief Justice Gillilan, in this case, said: "The instrument before us has this certainty as to the $185 and the interest. But the whole instrument must be taken together. The promise to pay the $185, and interest, is not the whole of the promise, nor the entire obligation created. The entire promise and obligation is to pay absolutely that sum, and interest, and in a particular contingency, to wit, the bringing suit by the payee after default, to pay a further amount not fixed, and not capable of being ascertained from the instrument itself."

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, held the following instrument to be a non-negotiable promissory note:

$377. Huntington, Pa., May 5th, 1875.

Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of W. H. Woods, at the Union Bank of Huntington, three hundred and seventy-seven dollars, and five per cent collection fee, if not paid when due, without defalcation, value received.

Samuel Steffey.

Indorsed: W. H. Woods.

In this case Justice Sharswood said: "In the paper now in question there enters as to the amount, an undoubted element of uncertainty. . . . If this collateral agreement may be introduced with impunity, what may not be? It is the first step in the wrong direction which costs. These instruments may come to be lumbered up with all sorts of stipulations, and all sorts of difficulties, contentions and litigation result."

In Cayuga County Nat. Bank v. Purdy, 56 Mich. 6, the supreme court decided that the following was not a negotiable promissory note:

$366.66. Coldwater, Mich., Feb. 27, 1883.

On the 1st day of November, 1883, we the undersigned, whose postoffice address is Algonsee, County of Branch, and State of Michigan, jointly and severally, for value received, promise to pay E. M. Birdsall & Company or order three hundred and sixty six 66-100 dollars, with interest at 7 per cent per annum if paid when due; if not so paid, then the interest shall be 10 per cent per annum from date. We also agree to pay exchange and all expenses, including attorney's fee incurred in collecting, payable at the First National Bank in Coldwater, Mich. We do hereby relinquish and waive the benefit of all laws exempting real and personal property from levy and sale, and all benefit or relief from valuation and appraisal laws.

George R. Purdy, Elnathan George.

Mr. Justice Champlin in this case says: "The modern tendency to interpolate into such instruments, engagements and stipulations not recognized by the law-merchant, affecting the certainty as to the amount due and payable thereon, or the time of maturity, . . . should be discountenanced and held to destroy their negotiability and deprive them of the character of promissory notes, and they should be relegated to the domain of ordinary contracts."

In the case of Altman v. Rittershofer, 63 Mich. 287, 12 West. Rep. 581, the note before the court was as follows:

$120. Bay City, Michigan, October 17, 1886.

Six months after date I promise to pay to the order of M. Cohn one hundred and thirty dollars, at the Bay National Bank of Bay City, Michigan, for value received, without any relief whatever from valuation or appraisal laws, with eight per cent interest from date until paid, and attorney fees.

Frederick Rittershofer.

Indorsed: M. Cohn.

Mr. Justice Long, in delivering the opinion, says: "A promissory note is an unconditional written promise, signed by the maker, to pay absolutely and at all events a sum certain in money, either to the bearer, or to a person therein designated, or his order. The only question upon the negotiability of this instrument is whether the words 'and attorney's fees,' added thereto, renders the sum to be paid uncertain. . . . The better reasoning in my judgment, holds such instruments non-negotiable."

In Bank of Carroll v. Taylor, 57 Iowa, 572, the instrument sued on was as follows:

$40.00. Coon Rapids, Iowa, 5-4-1891.

On the twenty fifth day of December, 1891, for value received, I promise to pay J. W. Stoddard or bearer forty dollars with interest, at ten per cent payable annually from date until paid, and ten per cent is to be added to the amount if this note remains unpaid after maturity, and is collected by suit. For the consideration mentioned above, the undersigned hereby sells and conveys to J. W. Stoddard the following property: one Triumph Drill No. —, upon condition, however, that if this note and mortgage shall be paid on or before the maturity thereof, then this mortgage to be void, otherwise in full force; and it is further agreed that in case of failure to pay the amount due thereon at maturity, or whenever the holder hereof may deem himself insecure, then he may take said property by virtue of this mortgage, and sell the same at public auction as by law provided; the proceeds of said sale, after deducting all expenses, to be applied on this note and mortgage, the residue, if any, to be returned to the undersigned.

Justice Reed, of the Supreme Court of Iowa, in deciding the case, says: "The question presented is whether these [this] instruments are [is] negotiable. Certainty as to the payer and payee, the amount to be paid and the time of payment, is an essential quality of a negotiable promissory note. The first provision of the instruments in suit is an undertaking by the maker to pay to the person named as payee, or to bearer, a specified sum of money, with interest thereon, at a certain date. This provision, standing alone, contains all the elements of negotiability. If the instruments are not ne-negotiable, then it is because the undertaking of the maker is qualified, and some element of uncertainty in these respects is created by the subsequent provision. By this subsequent provision of the contract a mortgage of certain personal property for the security of the debt, evidenced by the preceding provision, is created. It does not by any express terms modify the undertaking of the maker in the preceding provision, either as to the amount which is to be paid, the time of payment or the person to whom it is to be made. But it is contended that as it confers upon the payee or the holder of the instrument the right to take possession of the mortgaged property and, as is claimed, sell it, even before the maturity of the debt, and apply the proceeds in satisfaction thereof, it has the effect to render the instrument uncertain as to the amount which may be recovered upon it at maturity. . . . In determining the effect of the instruments both conditions must be considered, and when they are considered together we think that while they empower the holder to take possession of the mortgaged property before the maturity of the debt, if he deemed himself insecure, they did not empower him to sell it until after its maturity. . . . The debt evidenced by the instruments was not subject to be diminished before its maturity, and there is no uncertainty as to the amount to be recovered thereon at maturity. The fact that by these terms a mortgage is created by which the debt is secured, and under which payment in whole or in part may be enforced after maturity, does not, in our opinion, affect the question whether or not the instruments are negotiable. They possess all the elements of negotiability."

In the case of Second Nat. Bank v. Wheeler, 75 Mich. 546, the instrument sued on was as follows:

§180. Richmond, Ind., July 29, 1886.

On or before the 1st day of November, 1887, the subscribers, of Alamo Postoffice, Kalamazoo County, State of Michigan, jointly and severally promise to pay to the Incorporated Company of Gaar, Scott & Co. or order, one hundred and fifty dollars, payable at Kalamazoo National Bank, with 7% interest from date, and 10% after date, and 5% attorney's fees, without relief from homestead, valuation or appraisement laws, for value received. The makers and indorsers of this note hereby severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of payment and nonpayment; and the payee or holder of this note may renew or extend the time of payment of the same from time to time, as often as required, without notice and without prejudice to the rights of such payee or holder to enforce payment against the makers, sureties and indorsers, and each of them, parties hereto, at any time when the same may be due and payable.

The instrument called a "note," and the chattel mortgage given to secure the payment of the same, were assigned to the plaintiffs before the time of payment named therein. They were shown to be innocent purchasers for value, in the regular course of business. The court held the instrument to be not a negotiable promissory note, and cited the following cases as authority: Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488; Osgood County Nat. Bank v. Purdy, 56 Mich. 8; First Nat. Bank v. Carson, 60 Mich. 439; Altman v. Bitterhofer, 68 Mich. 397, 13 West. Rep. 581; Altman v. Fowler, 70 Mich. 87, 14 West. Rep. 77,—and that the same defenses were therefore open to defendant as if suit had been brought by Gaar, Scott & Co.

In Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, the action was founded on an instrument payable on or before two years, with interest at 10 per cent, and contained a clause that if paid within one year it would not draw interest. The court says: "We are of opinion that the instrument sued upon cannot be considered a negotiable promissory note. While it is made payable on or before two years, with 10 per cent interest, and is thus far definite and certain, yet the subsequent clause, that, if paid within one year, it shall not draw interest, destroys the element of certainty which otherwise would exist."

In First Nat. Bank v. Dymum, 84 N. C. 94, the counsel fees and expenses of collection were promised, but were left uncertain, and the time of payment, which is also important, was left to the option of the payee. There the note was held non negotiable.

In First Nat. Bank v. Laven, 60 Wia. 206, it is decided squarely for the defendant that a provision for the payment of 10 per cent attorney's fees for collection destroys the negotiability of the note; and this decision is placed upon the authority of the opinion of Mr. Justice Sharwood, in Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, and of Maryland P. & Mfg. Co. v. Newman, 60 Md. 584.

A promissory note, or note of hand, as it is often called, is an open promise in writing by one person to pay another person, or to his order, or bearer, a specified sum of money, absolutely and at all events. 1 Dandel, Neg. Inst. § 28.

"In order to fulfill the definition given, the paper must carry its full history on its face, and embrace the following requisites: first it must be open, that is unsealed; second, the engagement to pay must be certain; third, the fact of payment must be certain; fourth, the amount to be paid must be certain; fifth, the medium of payment must be money; sixth, the contract must be only for the payment of money; and, seventh, it is essential to the operation of the instrument that it should be delivered." Id. § 30.

To constitute an instrument negotiable as a promissory note, the maker's liability must be absolute and unconditioned for the payment of a definite sum of money. Bank of Carroll v. Taylor, 67 Iowa, 572; Merchants Nat. Bank v. Chicago R. Equip. Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 809; Hall v. Toby, 110 Pa. 316, 1 Cent. Rep. 54; McComas v. Haas, 107 Ind. 512, 5 West. Rep. 689; First Nat. Bank v. Carson, 60 Mich. 432; Grimison v. Russell, 14 Neb. 521; Edwards v. Ramery, 30 Minn. 91; Smith v. Mariand, 59 Iowa, 645; Miller v. Puage, 56 Iowa, 96; Third Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 25 Miss. 530.

Judge Brewer, of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, in the case of Hughitt v. Johnson, 28 Fed. Rep. 865, held that a note otherwise negotiable is rendered non-negotiable by this stipulation in it, viz., a promise to pay "with interest and exchange," and says: "This stipulation renders uncertain the amount to be paid at the maturity of the paper. It is interest and exchange, and what that exchange will be no one can tell."

By a careful review of these cases it seems that the basis of the decision is that of uncertainty in the amount to be recovered. In most of them, if not all, it is not sufficient that the amount necessary to liquidate the note on the day when due is certain, and can be determined, but that certainty must continue till the obligation is discharged.

In the case of Jones v. Radatz, above cited, the court uses the following language, viz.: "We think the certainty requisite to the negotiability of the instrument must continue until the obligation is discharged, and that any provision which before that time removes such certainty prevents the instrument being negotiable at all." The same principle is enunciated by the Supreme Court of Michigan, in the case of Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488.

The Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota, in Garretson v. Purdy, 8 Dak. 178, arrived at the same conclusion, not only on account of the uncertainty of such an instrument, but also on account of the lack of the simplicity required by our statute law in relation to negotiable instruments. Applying the principles above cited, are the instruments in question sufficiently simple, certain and unconditional to constitute them negotiable under the Statutes? Are they certain as to interest? The rate of interest is not only uncertain, but depends upon the contingency of prompt or not prompt payment. The instruments must be construed either as meaning: first, that they shall bear 10 per cent interest, but if paid promptly when due, only 8 per cent; second, that they shall bear 8 per cent interest, but if not paid promptly when due, 10 per cent. There is no certainty until after due as to the amount that will discharge the instruments, the amount depending upon the fact whether paid then or not. This element of uncertainty, not conforming to one of the essential requisites of a negotiable instrument, renders them non-negotiable. Our Code has defined a negotiable instrument to be a written promise or request for the payment of a certain sum of money to order or bearer, made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment, and it must contain no other contract. The design of the Statute is to keep negotiable promissory notes clearly confined within the limits of such paper as required by the law-merchant, and allowing no outside agreement or collateral understanding to enter into the main promise. Otherwise these instruments may be lumbered up with all sorts of stipulations which do not properly belong to promissory notes, but to written contracts. Taking both facts into consideration, we must hold the instrument upon which this action was founded as non-negotiable, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Kellam, J.:

I concur in the decision of this case because the predecessor of this court, in Garretson v. Purdy, 8 Dak. 178, adopted a principle and rule which is probably controlling as to the negotiability of the instrument before us. If the question were a new one in this court, I should dissent from the doctrine that the certainty as to the amount represented by a promissory note must be a certainty, continuing until the obligation is discharged, either by payment or by the Statute of Limitations. So far as negotiability means the quality of being transferable by delivery, freed from adverse equities,—and as a rule that is now the practical difference between negotiable and non-negotiable paper,—that quality is lost in passing the line of maturity. The immunity which comes with and attends negotiability is withdrawn the moment the instrument crosses the threshold of dishonor. If certainty is required as a condition of negotiability, I can see no good reason for holding that the certainty must be one which will still exist after the instrument has lost all the incidents and advantages of negotiability. I believe that if the amount of money which the instrument represents at its maturity, and which will then be required to discharge it, is plainly apparent on its face, it is all the certainty, in that respect, contemplated by the rule of the law-merchant or by our Code, defining negotiable instruments, and that the courts ought so to hold. I concur in the decision of this case only under the rule of stare decisis.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Re Bertie ROBINSON.

"When a person is arrested in a sister State, and without being extradited is forcibly brought into the jurisdiction of this State to answer to a criminal offense, and is committed to jail to await trial on such charge,—Held, that such person is unlawfully deprived of his liberty, and is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause for the detention of petitioner in custody and to procure his discharge therefrom. Petitioner discharged.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. McClure & Anderson, W. E. Brown and Joseph R. Webster for petitioner.

Mr. A. Y. Wright for respondent.

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A petition was filed in this court on the 6th day of February, 1890, on behalf of Bertie Robinson for a writ of habeas corpus. It appears from the petition and evidence that a complaint in writing was made before the county judge of Furnas County, on September 10, 1889, charging the petitioner with stealing a horse, the property of one Ira B. Huff, and that on the 24th day of the same month one E. M. Matson filed a complaint before a justice of the peace of Sherman County, Kan., charging the petitioner with stealing, in said Furnas County, the aforesaid horse. The said justice issued a warrant for the arrest of said petitioner, who was afterwards arrested and taken before said justice of the peace. On motion of the county attorney the prosecution was dismissed. Robinson was, by order of said justice, delivered to the custody of said Matson, a constable of Red Willow County, Neb., who forcibly, and against the will and consent of Robinson, and without any warrant, requisition or other legal process, conveyed said Robinson out of the State of Kansas into the State of Nebraska, where he delivered said Robinson up to the sheriff of Furnas County for prosecution for said crime. The petitioner was taken before the county judge of said Furnas County, who held the petitioner to the district court of said county to answer said charge, and, in default of bail, said petitioner was committed to the jail of said county, where he has ever since been deprived of his liberty by the respondent, as sheriff of said county. On the 9th day of December, 1889, an information was filed in said district court, charging said Robinson with the crime of horse stealing. On the following day, on being arraigned in said court, he pleaded not guilty to said charge, and on the same day he prayed said district court to discharge him from custody, because he was arrested in the State of Kansas, and was brought forcibly, and without any requisition, into this State, and delivered to the sheriff of said county to answer said accusation. The motion was overruled, and an exception was entered. On the 11th day of December Robinson was tried for said crime in said district court, and, the jury failing to agree upon a verdict, it was discharged, and Robinson was remanded to the custody of the respondent, to await further trial.

But a single question is presented for our consideration, and that is whether or not, under the foregoing facts, the District Court of Furnas County had jurisdiction of the person of the petitioner in the criminal case pending therein against him. We think the answer should be in the negative. There can be no doubt that jurisdiction cannot be acquired in a civil case when the summons is served upon a defendant who was brought into the jurisdiction of the court by force, fraud or deceit, for the purpose of obtaining service of summons upon him. Wanser v. Bright, 53 Ill. 35; Williams v. Reed, 29 N. J. L. 385; Dunlap v. Cody, 81 Iowa, 260; Van Horn v. Great Western Mfg. Co. 87 Kan. 523; Townsend v. Smith, 47 Wis. 620; Allen v. Miller, 11 Ohio St. 374; Compton v. Wilder, 40 Ohio St. 130.

The same rule obtains in criminal prosecutions. Nearly the entire current of authority in this country is to the effect that, when a fugitive from justice has been extradited from one State to another, he cannot be prosecuted in the State to which he has been surrendered on an offense other than the one for which he was extradited, before he has had an opportunity to return to the State from whence he was brought. Re Cannon, 47 Mich. 481; State v. Vanderpool, 89 Ohio St. 278; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407 (90 L. ed. 425); State v. Hall, 40 Kan. 838; German v. State, 116 Ind. 51, 15 West. Rep. 545.

In principle there is no difference between the case at bar and where a person is held for an offense other than the one he was extradited for. In either case it is an abuse of judicial process, which the law does not allow. Ample provisions are made for the arrest and return of a person accused of crime, who has fled to a sister State, by extradition warrants issued by the executives of the States. There is no excuse for a citizen or officer arresting, without authority of law, a fugitive, and taking him forcibly, and against his will, into the jurisdiction of the State for the purpose of prosecution.

We cannot sanction the method adopted to bring the petitioner into the jurisdiction of this State. He did not come into the State voluntarily, but because he could not avoid it. The district court, therefore, did not acquire jurisdiction of the person of the petitioner, and his detention is unlawful. State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 263; State v. Hall, 40 Kan. 838; Re Cannon, 47 Mich. 481.

While many authorities hold to the contrary doctrine, we prefer to adopt the rule that seems to be based upon reason, and which recognizes honesty and fair dealing.

The prisoner will be discharged. Judgment accordingly.

The other Judges concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MURDOCK PARLOR GRATE CO. v. COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

(.....Mass.....)

An action to recover damages for injuries resulting from the negligence of a servant of the Commonwealth in the performance of his duties is not a claim within the meaning of Acts 1887, chap. 245, which authorizes the maintenance of a suit against the Commonwealth to recover "all claims" against it whether at law or in equity.

REPORT from the Superior Court for Suffolk County of a suit to recover damages

NOTE.—State not liable for negligence of its servants or agents.

No action or claim on behalf of a citizen can be maintained against the State for injuries occasioned by the negligence or misfeasance of its agents except where it has by voluntary legislative enactment assumed such liability. Lewis v. State, 35 N. Y. 71; State v. Hill, 54 Ala. 67; Ray v. Bentley, 49 for injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servant. Petition dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. Frederick D. Ely, for plaintiff:

The Commonwealth can by its own consent, clearly manifested by Act of the Legislature, be impleaded in its own courts.

Such an Act is Stat. 1887, chap. 246, and it extends to the cause of action alleged in plaintiff's petition.

In legislative Acts, the natural import of words according to their common use, when applied to the subject matter of the Act, is to be considered as expressing the intention of the Legislature.

Hittinger v. Westford, 135 Mass. 258.

The natural import of the words, "all claims against the Commonwealth whether at law or in equity," is to embrace actions of tort as well as contract.

Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 10 Pet. 615 (10 L. ed. 1069); Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio, 1, 15.

The title of Stat. 1887, chap. 246, cannot be held to qualify the words "all claims whether at law or in equity."

The title of an Act does not constitute a part of the Act.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by the report in the case at bar is whether, on a petition brought by the plaintiff in the superior court, the Commonwealth is responsible, under Pub. Stat., chap. 195, as enlarged by Acts of 1887, chap. 240, for a tort committed by its servants by negligent management and overloading the floor of an apartment which had been hired by the Commonwealth, by which injury was done to another tenant who was in occupation at another apartment in the same building. The Commonwealth can be sued in its own courts undoubtedly where clear statutory authority for that purpose has been given by the Legislature, but in view of its sovereignty the intent to confer such authority should be clearly manifested. Troy & O. R. Co. v. Com. 127 Mass. 43.

It may be assumed that the facts reported would constitute ground for an action of tort against a natural person, had a similar injury been done by his servants. The contention of the defendant is that the Statutes cited have not in such a case made the Commonwealth liable in this proceeding.

It was held in Wason v. Com., 144 Mass. 60, 3 New Eng. Rep. 778, that the jurisdiction given to the supreme court by Pub. Stat., chap. 195, § 1, of "all claims against the Commonwealth which are founded on contracts for the payment of money did not extend to a claim for damages for a breach of a contract."

It was further held in Milford v. Com., 144 Mass. 64, 3 New Eng. Rep. 781, that such jurisdiction did not extend to the obligation imposed by Pub. Stat., chap. 86, § 26, upon the Commonwealth to reimburse the expenses incurred by a town in support of a state paper. By these decisions the interpretation of the statute remedy was confined to actual contracts for the payment of money. Subsequently to these decisions the Statute of 1887, chap. 240, was passed which gave to the superior court "jurisdiction of all claims against the Commonwealth, whether at law or equity," with an exception not necessary to be considered. In effect, although not in terms, Pub. Stat., chap. 195, § 1, was amended by striking out the words "which are founded on contracts for the payment of money," and in lieu thereof, inserting the words, "whether at law or in equity." The title of the amendatory Act is "An Act for the Collection of Claims against the Commonwealth," and it provides that "all claims shall be subject to the same set-off and recoupment as they would be if the Commonwealth was a private person." While the words "all claims" may, in their colloquial use, include a demand for damages occasioned by a tort to person or property, in its more proper judicial sense it is a demand of some matter as of right, made by one person upon another for some particular thing or compensation therefor or to do or to forbear to do something as a matter of duty. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 10 Pet. 615 [10 L. ed. 1039].

In view of the fact that the Statute was passed shortly after the decisions in Wason v. Com. and Milford v. Com., supra, it is reasonable to infer that its object was to extend the jurisdiction of the courts to claims which had not been included in the previous Statute, such as those which had been considered in the cases referred to, but not necessarily to claims of a different and distinct character. There are many obligations of the State not coming within the definitions of a contract, all of which definitions require a consent or agreement of the parties. Where a statute imposes an obligation which is enforced as if it arose ex contractu, there is not a contract but the obligation arises ex lege.

In Milford v. Com., above cited, the claim was of this class. The amended Statute was intended to cover claims of this class not arising under contract, those of a breach of contract such as the subject of the suit in Wason v. Com., contracts other than those for the payment of money and perhaps other claims not convenient now to enumerate. This gives to the Statute a full and sufficient meaning without holding, as the plaintiff urges, that a remedy in the nature of an action of tort against the Commonwealth is afforded thereby for neglect or misfeasance of its officers or servants while engaged in the performance of their duties. The object of the Statute cannot have been to create a new class of claims for which a sovereignty has never been held responsible, and to impose a liability therefor, but to provide a convenient tribunal for the determination of claims of the character which civilized governments have always recognized, although the satisfaction of them has been usually sought by direct appeal to the sovereign, or in our system of government, through the Legislature. It is therefore to be considered whether a demand or claim for an injury done or tort committed by a public servant in the performance of his duty is one for which a liability has been held to have been incurred by governments, even if there existed no tribunal competent judicially to pass upon it.

States have always found it necessary to take and use the property of their citizens for the purposes of their government; they have assumed various responsibilities on behalf of their citizens or others, they have also always been parties to contracts for the borrowing of money, the purchase of property, the employment of labor; and the duties arising from such acts have always been fully recognized even if judicial tribunals have not always been provided to make proper compensation for, or adjustment or payment of, the demands arising from such acts. But we do not find that demands founded on the neglect or torts of ministerial officers engaged as servants in the performance of duties which the State as a sovereign has undertaken to perform, have ever been held to render it liable. Nor does this rest upon the narrow ground that there are no means by which such obligations can be enforced, but on the larger ground that no obligations arise therefrom. Municipalities, such as cities and towns, are created by the Commonwealth in order that it may exercise, through them, a part of its power of sovereignty. Where they are engaged in the performance of public duties imposed upon them by statute, they are not liable to private actions of tort for the negligence of their agents employed for this purpose, unless such action is provided by the Statute. Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344. Curran v. Boston (Mass.) May 23, 1890.

Had the Legislature intended to create such an obligation and voluntarily to assume in the administration of the State all the responsibility which an individual must incur in his private business, it certainly would have done so in express terms. An intent so to do, as it is in violation of the ordinary principles by which the administration of less important bodies is ordinarily regulated, would not have been left to inference but would have been explicitly stated.

"No government," says Mr. Justice Miller, "has ever held itself liable to individuals for the misfeasance, laches or unauthorized exercise of power by its officers or agents." Gibbons v. United States, 75 U. S. 8 Wall 200 (19 L. ed. 453).

"The government," says Mr. Justice Story, "does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of the officers and agents whom it employs, since that would involve it in all its operations in endless embarrassment and difficulties and losses, which would be subversive of the public interests." Story, Ag. § 319.

The cases of United States v. Kirkpatrick, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 720 (6 L. ed. 199), and Doe v. Postmaster General, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 318 (7 L. ed. 160), cited in Gibbons v. United States, supra, establish the principle that even in regard to matters connected with the cause of action, the government is not responsible for the laches, however gross, of its officers. In the cases thus cited it would seem that no question of jurisdiction could have intervened to disturb the inquiry, as the government was the plaintiff and the defendant was entitled to set off certain claims.

The plaintiff urges that this legislation as construed by him is not novel and that this is not the first Statute by which a State has allowed itself to be impleaded in actions of tort. But the Statute of New York of 1870, chap. 321, and cases cited by him, fortify the position that the assumption of a liability so unusual could not have been left to inference.

It was held (Lewis v. State, 96 N. Y. 71), that no principle of law nor any adjudged case would make the State liable "for the negligence or misfeasance of its agents in like manner as a natural person is responsible for the acts of his servants," unless the State by its Legislature had voluntarily assumed it.

The cases of Bowen v. State, 108 N. Y. 106, 10 Cent. Rep. 517, and Spittorf v. State, 108 N. Y. 206, 10 Cent. Rep. 699, are to the same point.

In Sipple v. State, 99 N. Y. 284, where the board of canal claims had by the terms of the Statute of New York jurisdiction of claims for damages for injuries in the management of the canals, such as the plaintiff had sustained, Chief Judge Ruger remarks: "It must be conceded that the State can be made liable for injuries arising from the negligence of its agents or servants, only by force of some positive statute imposing such liability." In the case there considered, the Legislature, which, in certain events, made the State liable for injuries to an individual, was connected with its administration of the canals of the State, which was an enterprise managed by it as a State, controlled by its own servants, from which a revenue was intended to be derived, as well as a public benefit received, and it was deemed proper, therefore, to incur the same responsibilities as those of private individuals. We have been referred to no legislation by which a State, in the performance of its purely public duties, in administering its government has undertaken to incur responsibility for the negligence or misfeasance of its servants engaged in such administration. Such legislation would be in contravention of what has usually been deemed the rule of public policy.

The Act we are discussing discloses no intention to create against the State a new, and heretofore unrecognized, class of liabilities, but only an intention to provide a judicial tribunal whose well-recognized existing liabilities can be adjudicated.

Where wrongs are done to individuals by those who are the servants of the government, those injured are not remediless, as such persons may be sued as may be other citizens for the torts which they commit. There may be cases also where it would be entirely just that a remedy should be extended by the public to an individual for the injury he had sustained by the negligence of a public servant, but cases of this character the Legislature yet reserves for its own determination.

Petition dismissed.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Montana, ex rel, Louis ROTWITT,

v.

Richard O. HICKMAN, State Treasurer.

(....Mont....)

An appropriation is "made by law" for the salary of an officer by a state constitution which plainly declares what amount of compensation he shall receive, and no legislative appropriation is necessary in that case to authorize payment.

(February 15, 1890.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the payment of money alleged to be due and payable to relator as compensation for the performance of his duties as secretary of state. Granted.

The case fully appears in the opinion.

Messrs. McCutcheon & McIntire, for relator:

Section 4 of article 7 of the Constitution is itself an appropriation, and of course is "one made by law." The appropriation having therefore been made in the Constitution, it is not essential that the Legislature should act to give it validity.

Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 199; State v. Weston, 4 Neb. 216; State v. Bordelon, 6 La. Ann. 68.

The constitutional provision relating to salaries is self executing.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 340; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 100.

Where the salary of a public officer is fixed and the times of payment prescribed by law, no special annual appropriation is necessary to authorize its payment out of the treasury.

Reynolds v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 420.

Upon the presentation of the warrant to the Treasurer, it became his duty to pay it out of the funds in his possession "not otherwise appropriated."

Comp. Stat. p. 960, § 1123.

When a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus therefor.

Piak v. Cuthbert, 2 Mont. 604.

Mr. Henri J. Haskell, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Blake, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application to the court for a writ of mandate to be issued to Richard O. Hickman, as the State Treasurer of the State of Montana, commanding him to pay forthwith, out of such moneys as may be in the treasury of the State, and not otherwise appropriated, a certain warrant hereinafter described. It appears from the affidavit on the application of Louis Rotwitt, the party beneficially interested, and is admitted by the respondent, that Rotwitt is the duly elected, qualified and acting secretary of state of Montana. That he entered upon the discharge of his duties upon the 11th day of November, 1889, and has ever since that date continued to perform the same. That upon the 10th day of February, 1890, he presented his account in the sum of $416.67 against the State for his compensation or salary as such secretary of state for the quarter ending on the 31st of December, 1889, to Edwin A. Kenney, who was then and is now the duly elected, qualified and acting auditor of the State of Montana, for settlement, audit and allowance. That thereupon the said Kenney, as such state auditor, settled, audited and allowed said account for the said sum, and then drew his warrant therefor on the said State Treasurer as follows:

No. 9,204. State of Montana, County of Lewis and Clarke, Helena, M. T., Feb. 10th, 1890.

Territorial warrant. Original.

The treasurer will pay to L. Rotwitt or order four hundred and sixteen and 67-100 dollars, for salary as secretary of state for quarter ending Dec. 31st, 1889, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

$416.67-100. E. A. Kenney, State Auditor.

Indorsement: Feby. 10th, 1890. Presented, but not paid for want of an appropriation. R. O. Hickman, State Treasurer.

That he presented the said warrant to the said Hickman, as such State Treasurer, and demanded payment thereof, and that payment thereof was refused, and the same is wholly unpaid; and that there is now in the treasury of the State, and in the possession of the said Hickman, as such State Treasurer, the sum of $40,000. The alternative writ was issued, and on the return thereof said Hickman made the following answer, to wit: "That no provision has been made by law for the payment of this or any other warrant issued to the state officers of Montana for their services, rendered as such officers." The relator then demurred to this answer upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

There is no statute which makes an appropriation or otherwise provides for the payment of this warrant, and the sole question for decision depends upon the interpretation of the following clauses of the Constitution: "Until otherwise provided by law, the governor, secretary of state, state auditor, treasurer, attorney-general and superintendent of public instruction, shall quarterly, as due, during their continuance in office, receive for their services compensation, which is fixed as follows: . . . secretary of state, $3,000 per annum. . . . The compensation enumerated shall be in full for all services by said officers respectively rendered in any official capacity or employment whatever during their respective terms of office, and the salary of no official shall be increased during his term of office. No officer named in this section shall receive for the performance of any official duty any fee for his own use. . . . Article 7, § 4.

"Except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, no law shall extend the term of any public officer, or increase or diminish his salary or emolument after his election," etc. Article 5, § 31.

"No money shall be paid out of the treasury except upon appropriations made by law, and on warrant drawn by the proper officer in pursuance thereof, except interest on the public debt." Id. § 34.

"The state auditor and state treasurer shall perform such duties as are prescribed in this Constitution and by the laws of the State." Article 7, § 1.

This court, in the cases of State v. Ah Jim (Mont.), Jan. 4, 1890, and Thompson v. Kanney (Mont.), Jan. 28, 1890, inquired into the effect of the provisions of the Constitution upon the statutes of the Territory and State and a repetition of the citations and conclusions therein will be avoided. We content ourselves with the observation that the foregoing language of the Constitution and the laws concerning the territorial treasurer are applicable to this proceeding. What, then, are "appropriations made by law?" A majority of the States of the American Union have not adopted Constitutions which specify the salaries that should be paid to their officers. Numerous cases can be found in their courts which determine the necessity of an appropriation by the law making department before the payment of money can be authorized by the custodian of the public funds. But the fundamental law of this State constitutes an exception in this important feature, and the decisions of such courts do not enlighten us. All the adjudications which construe constitutional phrases similar to those of Montana concur in their declaration of principles.

The leading case is that of Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 189, which was decided in 1853 by the court of appeals, and the opinion was delivered by the profound jurist, Chief Justice Le Grand, after a thorough examination. Thomas was the comptroller of the State, and applied for a writ of mandamus to be directed to Owens, the state treasurer, commanding him to pay the amount of a draft drawn in payment of his salary. Owens refused payment on several grounds, including the following: "That no sufficient appropriation has been made by law specifying a sum applicable to the payment of the amount claimed by the petitioner." The gravity of the investigation, and the lucid reasoning of the court, induce us to be liberal in the use of excerpts. "The inquiry, then, is, Is there an appropriation for the period intervening between the 10th of December, 1851,—the time from which we think he is entitled to pay,—and the 1st day of January, 1852? We are of opinion the Constitution, proprio vigore, makes such appropriation. Under our system of government, its powers are wisely distributed to different departments. Each and all are subordinate to the Constitution, which creates and defines their limits. Whatever it commands is the supreme and uncontrollable law of the land. This is not denied directly, although it is inferentially, substantially and practically. It is said that, inasmuch as the 30th section of the 3d article of the Constitution declares, 'No money shall be drawn from the treasury of the State except in accordance with an appropriation made by law,' that an Act of Assembly must precede the withdrawal; 6 L. R. A.

and inasmuch as none such has been passed covering the period antecedent to the 1st of January, 1852, there is therefore no appropriation by law for that time. To this reasoning we cannot yield our consent. In the construction of any instrument, the whole paper ought to be considered, that the will of its framers may be truly and accurately ascertained. The objects contemplated, and the purposes to be subserved, should be constantly kept in view, and the language used interpreted in reference to the manifest intent. Now, what could have been the purpose of the clause in the Constitution to which we have referred? It was obviously inserted to prevent the expenditure of the people's treasure without their consent, either as expressed by themselves in the Organic Law, or by their representatives in constitutional Acts of legislation."

After citing Story, Const., Ed. ed. § 1848, and 1 Tuck. Bl. Com., 363, the opinion continues: "These being the purposes and objects of the clause, the question is, Have the people given their consent to the payment of the salary of the comptroller? That they have done so is palpably manifest. They have said he 'shall receive an annual salary of $3,500.' They have not merely said he may claim such a sum, but, emphatically, that he 'shall receive' it. It is impossible for human language to be less ambiguous or more positive. The people, in their Organic Law, which is paramount to all other law, have not only given their consent, but they have imperatively issued their commands, that the particular officer 'shall receive' it. How is their will obeyed if it be within the power of the treasurer, or anyone else, to withhold it from caprice, unfaithfulness to duty or from mistaken judgment? To allow of such a power in that officer would be to put him above the Constitution, whose creature he is. It would be to invest him with authority to annul the sovereign will, in fact, to stop the wheels of government, and reduce things into the wildest confusion. The Constitution has said the officer 'shall receive' his salary; and this fiat of the supreme will is not to be nullified by the mere ipse dixit of a mere ministerial officer; for such, and none other, is the treasurer. In assigning the powers of government to three different departments, the Constitution intended to secure to each its independency of action; and, the more certainly and effectually to insure this, it has ascertained and appropriated the salary they are severally to receive, and it has inhibited the Legislature from diminishing it. Were it not for such a provision, the whole government would exist only by permission of the Legislature. It can only be carried on through the instrumentality of individuals, and their services can only be obtained by being paid for. The framers of the Constitution, and the people who adopted it, aware of this, determined not to submit the durability of their work to the caprice, passion or prejudice which possibly might, at times of great excitement, triumphantly rule the action of the Legislature, and therefore wisely did the work themselves, by ingrafting in the Organic Law a provision for the protection of those who should be charged with its execution. In other words, they made the appropriation. An opposite interpretation would counselling this paradox: that a co-ordinate branch of the government could stop its whole machinery, by refusing to pay the salaries of those upon whom is devolved the discharge of the duties of the other branches, and this, too, when the Constitution expressly declares that those officers "shall receive" their salaries, and that they "shall not be diminished?" It would be giving to the Legislature a practical and real omnipotence with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 175 [2 L. ed. 73]. Now, it is presumed it would not be contended by anyone, however hazardous, that if the Legislature were to pass an Act diminishing the salary of the governor, or of any other officer whose salary is fixed by the Constitution, that such an exercise of power would be rightful and constitutional. If it be not competent to the Legislature to take away a part, by what process of reasoning can it be maintained that they can take away the whole? And yet this is the extent to which the argument addressed to us goes. It seems to us to be but necessary to state the proposition to cause its instantaneous rejection. We hold, for the reasons we have assigned, the people have given their consent to the payment of the salaries fixed in the Constitution, by declaring the amount "shall" be "received" by the particular officer; and that this is an appropriation by law,—by the supreme law of the State.

The case of Thomas v. Owens, supra, is commented on in Gross v. Parnell, 13 Md. 389, and the court said: "There, the petition asked for a mandamus requiring the treasurer of the State to pay the comptroller, upon his warrant, the amount of his salary, which is regulated by the Constitution, and, of course, duly appropriated by law."

In State v. Weston, 4 Neb. 316, the "case raises the question of the authority of the state auditor to draw warrants upon the state treasurer for the payment of the salaries of the state officers when no appropriation therefor has been made by the Legislature." The Constitution of that State provides that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law." If this clause, says Chief Justice Lake, "had limited the appropriation which it requires to an Act of the Legislature, there might be some force in the objection urged. But it only requires a specific appropriation 'made by law;' and we are clearly of the opinion that this may be accomplished just as effectually by the Constitution as by legislative enactment." The court further says: "In the case of Reynolds v. Taylor, 48 Ala. 420, it was held that if the salary of a public officer is fixed, and the times of payment prescribed, by law, no special annual appropriation is necessary to authorize the auditor to draw his warrant for its payment. But the case of Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 180, seems to be more directly in point. It was there held that when the Constitution declared the amount to be paid an officer, that it was an appropriation made by law, and no legislative Act was necessary."

In State v. Weston, 6 Neb. 16, the court explains the decision in State v. Weston, supra, 9 L. R. A.

and asserts that "it reaches only those officers who hold by virtue of the Constitution itself, and not to those who hold their offices at the will of the Legislature;" and the "appropriation made by law . . . may be done either by direction of the Constitution itself—that being the supreme law in the State—or by the Legislature."

We do not know of any rule to the contrary where the same constitutional provisions exist which are embodied in the supreme law of this State. An illustration of the principles which are applied where salaries of the officers are not prescribed by the Constitution, and the case of Thomas v. Owens, supra, is not followed, may be found in Myers v. English, 9 Cal. 348. This was an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the state treasurer to pay certain warrants drawn by the comptroller on account of the salary of a district judge. The Constitution provided that the judges of the district court shall severally, at stated times during their continuation in office, receive for their services a compensation, to be paid out of the treasury, which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which they shall have been elected. Article 6, § 15.

Another clause is the following: "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Article 4, § 22.

It was correctly held by the court that it was necessary for the Legislature to define the amount of the salary, and make an appropriation for the payment thereof, before this remedy could be enforced. This view of the Constitution of a State has been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the clause of the Federal Constitution which declares that no State shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts."

Mr. Justice Swayne, in Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. McCrory, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 615 [10 L. ed. 908], asserts that "the Constitution of a State is undoubtedly a law, within the meaning of this prohibition."

In White v. Hart, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 659 [10 L. ed. 687], the court holds "that a State can no more impair the obligation of a contract by adopting a Constitution than by passing a law. In the eye of the constitutional inhibition, they are substantially the same thing." Quinn v. Barry, 32 U. S. 15 Wall. 623 [31 L. ed. 316]; Concord v. Portsmouth Ass. Bank, 69 U. S. 680 [23 L. ed. 630]; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co. 115 U. S. 673 [20 L. ed. 834].

We cannot add anything to the discussion of this vital proposition. The doctrines which were announced in Thomas v. Owens, supra, have been accepted for years without a question, and have remained inflexible under every test. The framers of the Constitution of this State numbered upon their roll most eminent jurists and lawyers. They studied with wisdom and ability the charters which the people had granted to the States of the Union, in their efforts to obtain the best articles from all. They knew the precedents which have been enumerated, and the canons of interpretation which had been formulated by the courts, and deliberately created the sections of the Constitution which fix the salaries of many state officers. In their action upon this subject they did not incorporate the provisions which are frequently in force in the instruments of this solemn character, and did not permit the Legislature to have this great power. In order that there should be no erroneous construction of the clauses under examination, the following section was adopted: "The provisions of this Constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise." Article 8, § 29.

When, therefore, it is plainly declared that the secretary of state, or any other officer, shall receive a certain sum as compensation for his services, an appropriation is "made by law," and the proper officer is empowered to draw his warrant on the State Treasurer in pursuance thereof; and the respondent is required to pay the above-described warrant to the relator.

The demurrer (the respondent abiding by his answer and return) is sustained, and it is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued forthwith according to the prayer of the application herein.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

William A. MILLER, Exr., etc., Appt.,

v.

Isabelle SHIELDS.

(....Ind....)

The defense arising under § 5119, Rev. Stat. 1881, which makes contracts of suretyship exceptions to the general power conferred by § 5115 upon married women to enter into contracts, must be affirmatively proved when interposed to a suit upon a promissory note which bears on its face no evidence of coverture or suretyship and no attempt is made to negative the existence of those facts in the complaint.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Applewhite & Applewhite for appellant.

Mr. B. H. Burrell for appellee.

NOTE.—Married woman incapable to contract as surety.

Where no question of fraud or estoppel has intervened, any contract of suretyship, whatever its form, entered into by a married woman since the Act of 1881, is, under the provisions of this section, wholly void. Allen v. Davis, 101 Ind. 187; Warey v. Foret, 108 Ind. 205; Brown v. Will, 1 West. Rep. 130, 108 Ind. 71; Engler v. Acker, 8 West. Rep. 673, 106 Ind. 223; McLeod v. Ains L. Ins. Co. 5 West. Rep. 633, 107 Ind. 394; Bennett v. Mattingly, 7 West. Rep. 912, 110 Ind. 197; Crooks v. Kennett, 10 West. Rep. 256, 111 Ind. 347; Bartholomew v. Pierson, 11 West. Rep. 343, 112 Ind. 430; State v. Kennett, 13 West. Rep. 313, 114 Ind. 160; Ellis v. Baker, 118 Ind. 411.

So where a married woman guarantees the payment of a promissory note by written indorsement, it is a contract of suretyship, and is void under this section. Nixon v. Whitely, 120 Ind. 381.

A married woman is incapable to bind herself by recognizance of replevin bail, and may be discharged from such contract on motion in the court where judgment was rendered. Eberwine v. State, 79 Ind. 268.

Mortgage by wife of her separate estate to secure her husband's debt is void.

A mortgage executed by a married woman upon her separate real estate to secure her husband's debt is void. Brown v. Will, 1 West. Rep. 130, 108 Ind. 71; Allen v. Davis, 99 Ind. 215, 101 Ind. 187; Cupp v. Campbell, 1 West. Rep. 255, 106 Ind. 213; Engler v. Acker, 8 West. Rep. 673, 106 Ind. 223.

Since the Statute of 1881 went into effect a married woman cannot execute a mortgage binding her real estate to secure her husband's debt. Allen v. Davis, 101 Ind. 189, 99 Ind. 217; Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 109; Levering v. Shockey, 100 Ind. 500.

Such a mortgage given to secure a debt on which the husband was liable as surety only is invalid although executed at a time when married women could have incumbered their property for the debt of a third person. Bridges v. Blake, 4 West. Rep. 106, 105 Ind. 363.

Where the married woman's husband joined her in such a mortgage before the Statute of 1881 and while the prior Statute was in force, it was valid and binding. Fraser v. Clifford, 94 Ind. 487; Mathes v. Shank, 94 Ind. 505; Post v. Looney, 9 West. Rep. 616, 111 Ind. 74; Gardner v. Case, 10 West. Rep. 600, 111 Ind. 494.

But under the Statute of 1881 a married woman is incapable of entering into a contract of suretyship for her husband or for any other person. Crooks v. Kennett, 10 West. Rep. 256, 111 Ind. 347.

Suit to foreclose wife's mortgage.

In a suit to enforce such a mortgage it should be alleged that the debt was contracted by her and that it inured to her benefit or that of her estate. Jouchert v. Johnson, 6 West. Rep. 890, 108 Ind. 433.

The loan must be made by her for her benefit or that of her property; a mere temporary receiving the money, or a recital in the mortgage that she is principal and her husband surety, is not sufficient. Orr v. White, 4 West. Rep. 482, 106 Ind. 341.

A contract executed by a married woman is one of suretyship to the extent that the consideration was received by any other person than herself. Vogel v. Lechner, 102 Ind. 55.

The test of whether she was a principal or a surety is determined by the inquiry whether or not she was to receive the consideration for her own benefit or for that of her estate. It does not depend on the form of the contract. Ibid.

One who takes such a mortgage with knowledge that her title is fraudulent as to her husband's creditors is estopped in a suit by her to cancel the mortgage, to prove the fraud for any purpose. Warey v. Foret, 108 Ind. 205.

One who knows that a debt is that of the husband, and that the property belongs to the wife, is chargeable with knowledge of the capacity in which she contracts. Keller v. Orr, 4 West. Rep. 707, 106 Ind. 411.

Coverture a personal defense.

Coverture, like infancy, is a personal defense which third parties cannot make for their own benefit. Ains L. Ins. Co. v. Baker, 71 Ind. 103; 1 West. Rep. 153.

Barthshire, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is bottomed on a promissory note executed by the appellee to the appellant's testator. The appellee answered in three paragraphs: first, the general denial; second, want of consideration; third, coverture and suretyship.

The appellant replied in general denial.

The cause was submitted to the court for trial, and after the evidence had been concluded a finding was returned in favor of the appellee. The appellant filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled by the court and an exception saved and judgment rendered for the appellee. The record presents but one question for our consideration: Is the finding of the court sustained by sufficient evidence? Notwithstanding the well established rule of this court that it will not disturb the judgment of a trial court because the evidence which supports it is weak and unsatisfactory, we are compelled to reverse the judgment here involved for the reason that there was a failure of proof as to one vital fact.

In Indiana, since the year 1881, the disabilities which the common law imposed upon married women as to the making of contracts with certain limitations have been removed. Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 5, 115 et seq.

Although a wife may plead her coverture as a defense under the Statute of 1881, yet her coverture is not a legal disability, except in certain special cases (Bennett v. Mattingly, 7 West. Rep. 313, 110 Ind. 197); it is a personal defense and cannot be pleaded by a third party for his own benefit. Ibid., Ross v. Prather, 1 West. Rep. 397, 108 Ind. 191.

If a married woman dies intestate leaving children, they may defeat a mortgage executed by her upon her separate estate to secure her husband's debt, by pleading coverture of their mother, being privies both in blood and in estate; but her husband cannot avail himself of the plea although he joined with her in the mortgage. Ellis v. Baker, 118 Ind. 408.

Code § 5119, construed.

Section 5119 of the Code was enacted for a married woman's protection alone, and cannot be invoked by a purchaser to defeat a mortgage executed to him by a husband and wife as tenants by entireties to secure the husband's debts. Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102, distinguished in Bennett v. Mattingly, 7 West. Rep. 313, 110 Ind. 197.

To bring a mortgage executed by husband and wife, upon land held by entireties, to secure a loan made upon their joint application, within the prohibition of this section, it must affirmatively appear that the money received did not inure to the benefit of the wife, or to the benefit of the joint estate. Security Co. v. Arbuckle, 119 Ind. 68. See Vogel v. Leichner, 108 Ind. 55; Cupp v. Campbell, 1 West. Rep. 393, 108 Ind. 213; Ward v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 6 West. Rep. 393, 108 Ind. 301.

Where a husband's note was accepted for the purchase money of land conveyed to husband and wife by entireties, the debt is his, not hers, and a mortgage by both, made to secure the debt, is void as against the wife. Jackson v. Smith, 120 Ind. 380.

Where a wife joins with her husband in a mortgage of his real estate, it is not, as to her inchoate interest, a contract of suretyship within the meaning of this section of the Code. Cupp v. Campbell, 1 West. Rep. 393, 108 Ind. 213; Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102; Gravo v. Bunch, 68 Ind. 4; Leary v. Shaffer, 79 Ind. 397.

As this court has frequently announced, ability, and not disability, is the rule as to the capacity of married women to enter into contracts. Vogel v. Leichner, 108 Ind. 55.

In this case it is said: "By the more comprehensive enactment of 1881, above referred to, the Legislature abrogated all legal disabilities of married women, except such as are expressly saved in the Act."

In Ross v. Prather, 108 Ind. 191, 1 West. Rep. 397, it is said: "The three most notable respects in which the disability of coverture was felt at common law were in the inability of the wife to sue, in her inability to enter into a contract and in her inability to control her own property. These separate disabilities have all been in general terms removed. . . . The disabilities upon these and other subjects which still remain are special and exceptional, and no longer constitute a part of a category of general disabilities."

In Arnold v. Engleman, 108 Ind. 513, 1 West. Rep. 483, it is said: "The question here is as to the sufficiency of the facts pleaded to avoid the disability of coverture. We have decided that in cases of married women ability is now the rule and disability the exception."

This is the only reasonable interpretation of our Statute, for its language is broad and comprehensive. Section 5115 provides that all the Estoppel of wife.

A married woman may be estopped by her affirmative representations, yet she cannot by her own act or representations remove her legal incapacity to make a contract which coverture alone disqualifies her from making except in a prescribed way. Carpenter v. Carpenter, 45 Ind. 143; Levering v. Shockey, 108 Ind. 553; Bank of America v. Banks, 101 U. S. 240 (23 L. ed. 250); Sims v. Everhardt, 108 U. S. 300 (23 L. ed. 37); Kean v. Coleman, 33 Pa. 333; Klein v. Caldwell, 91 Pa. 143; Morrison v. Wilson, 12 Cal. 494; Todd v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. etc. R. Co. 19 Ohio St. 514; Behler v. Weyburn, 89 Ind. 143; Cupp v. Campbell, 1 West. Rep. 393, 108 Ind. 213.

But where a wife transfers her separate real estate to her husband by conveyance importing a money consideration, to enable him to mortgage it as his property to secure a loan for his benefit, she is estopped as against the mortgagee, who is not shown to have had knowledge that the conveyance was a mere contrivance to evade the statute, from asserting that the transfer was not bona fide. Long v. Crosson, 119 Ind. 3.

So she is estopped, where she makes a representation by affidavit that the loan is for her own use and benefit, to deny the truth of such representation. Ward v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 6 West. Rep. 393, 108 Ind. 301.

Where such a mortgage is foreclosed in a proceeding to which she is a party, and the land is ordered sold, she cannot afterwards in a collateral proceeding question the consideration upon which the mortgage rested. Watson v. Camper, 118 Ind. 60. See Carrico v. Tarwater, 1 West. Rep. 144, 103 Ind. 38; Elwood v. Hoymer, 100 Ind. 404; Sanders v. Douglas, 45 Ind. 322; McCahey v. Carrigan, 49 Ind. 173; Bates v. Spooner, 45 Ind. 439; State v. Manly, 16 Ind. 3; Portine v. Bragg, 29 Ind. 307; McMahon v. Newcomer, 22 Ind. 105; Spencer v. McGonagle, 3 West. Rep. 393, 107 Ind. 410.

As to estoppel of married woman, see note to Spater v. Opfer (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 343; Yorkus v. Hadley (Dak.) 3 L. R. A. 343.

legal disabilities of married women to make contracts are hereby abolished, except as herein otherwise provided. This confers a general power to make executory contracts except such as are prohibited by the Statute. There is no provision prohibiting married women from purchasing wearing apparel and executing notes for its value. It is true that in section 5117 it is provided that she may make contracts concerning her separate personal property, but this is merely permissive and cumulative, and is not a limitation upon the general power conferred by the section quoted. It would be a great stretch to affirm that in buying personal property she was not contracting concerning it, and if the provision found in section 5117 stood alone it would be quite doubtful whether a married woman's contract for the purchase of wearing apparel for herself were not valid, but the provisions of section 5115 make it very clear that such contracts are valid and enforceable. Our conclusion is that a married woman may purchase wearing apparel for herself, and that notes executed by her for the price which she agreed to pay for it are valid and may be enforced." See Barnett v. Hershberger, 106 Ind. 410, 3 West. Rep. 750.

In McLoud v. Anna L. Ins. Co., 107 Ind. 304, 6 West. Rep. 633, the court said: "The notes and mortgages were jointly executed by the appellant on the 18th day of November, 1899, at which time the Act of April 16, 1891, concerning husband and wife, which took effect on September 19, 1891, was a part of the law of this State."

Section 5115 of said Statute is then set out, and the court goes on to say: "In Arnold v. Engleman, 106 Ind. 512, 1 West. Rep. 463, after quoting section 5115 as above, the court said: 'This confers a general power to make executory contracts, except such as are prohibited by the Statute.' . . . In § 5117, Rev. Stat. 1891, it is provided that a married woman 'shall not enter into any executory contract to sell or convey or mortgage her real estate, nor shall she convey or mortgage the same unless her husband join in such contract, conveyance or mortgage.' Section 5119, Rev. Stat. 1891, reads as follows: 'A married woman shall not enter into any contract of suretyship, whether as indorser, guarantor or in any other manner, and such contract as to her shall be void.'" See Lane v. Schlemmer, 114 Ind. 306 (bottom of page 301), 13 West. Rep. 622.

In Phelps v. Smith, 116 Ind. 387 (at bottom of page 403), 15 West. Rep. 334, it is said: "The decision in Phelps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 8 [24 L. ed. 391], if conceded to be otherwise relevant, is not in point because the court placed its judgment upon the disability created by coverture, saying that 'such a proposition would be a very unjust one to the wife still under the dominion, control and personal influence of her husband.' Manifestly this rule cannot apply in jurisdictions where a married woman possesses nearly all the rights of a feme sole, and where ability is the rule and disability the exception."

In the quotation which we have made from Arnold v. Engleman, supra, said section 5115 is set out, and we need not copy it again. The exception involved in the case now under consideration is found in section 5119, which reads:

"It appears in the quotation from McLoud v. Anna L. Ins. Co., supra, and need not be again quoted.

It is a general rule of pleading applicable alike to civil actions and criminal prosecutions that when an exception or proviso is embodied in the enacting clause of a statute or contract, it must be negatived in the complaint or indictment, but if it is found in a subsequent distinct clause or section of the statute or covenant, as is the case with the Statute before us, then there need be no negation. Gould, Pl. pp. 514, 515; Stephen, Pl. (Heard) pp. 442, 444.

In Com. v. Jennings, 131 Mass. 47, Gray, Ch. J., speaking for the court, said: "On the other hand, it appears to us to be established by a great preponderance of authority that when an exception is not stated in the enacting clause otherwise than by merely referring to other provisions of the Statute, it need not be negatived unless necessary to a complete definition of the offense."

In Hart v. Clois, 3 Johns. 43, the court said: "The action below was brought for a penalty incurred under the 6th section of the Act concerning slaves and servants. The special causes of demurrer stated upon the record are not material; but the defendant relies upon what he alleges to be defects in substance in the declaration, viz.: that the plaintiff does not negative the excepted cases in the section, and that he does not aver that the defendant was master of the slave or acted with his privity. It is a sufficient answer to the first objection that the exception forms no part of the plaintiff's title or right of action, but is merely matter of excuse for the defendant. The excepted cases are not incorporated into the body and substance of the enacting clause, but are given as exceptions, and the instances are not specified in that, but in the subsequent sections." See Com. v. Tuttle, 13 Cush. 303; Com. v. Hill, 5 Gratt. 632; State v. Miller, 24 Conn. 523; United States v. Cook, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 168 [21 L. ed. 338]; State v. Adney, 20 Vt. 60; Fleming v. People, 37 N. Y. 320; Harris v. White, 81 N. Y. 524.

Our own cases are to the same effect. Russell v. State, 50 Ind. 174; State v. Maddux, 74 Ind. 105; Mergenthaler v. State, 107 Ind. 567, 6 West. Rep. 551.

The action in this case was upon a promissory note executed by the appellee alone. The complaint did not allege that the appellee was under coverture, but had this fact appeared therein we think it would have been good in the absence of an allegation in negation of section 5119, supra. We think so in view of the rule as supported by the authorities cited above. The precise question has never been before this court.

It was held in the case of Vogel v. Lehnner, supra, that where the husband and wife jointly executed a promissory note and a mortgage upon the separate real estate of the wife the burden of proof was on the plaintiff seeking to foreclose the mortgage to show that she was liable.

The foregoing case was followed in the case of Oapp v. Campbell, 106 Ind. 313, 1 West. Rep. 255.

In that class of cases the presumption which naturally arises because of the peculiar relation that exists between husband and wife is that he is the principal debtor and she but his surety, and hence it was well ruled in those cases that the obligation could not be enforced against her nor against her property specifically pledged for its payment, it not appearing affirmatively that she was a principal debtor.

But when a married woman, as she has full power to do under the Married Woman's Act, executes her individual note whereby she promises to pay a given sum of money, the question is very different. No presumption such as that announced in the cases above can prevail. To hold that when a married woman has executed her individual promissory note she is presumed to stand as surety for her husband or some other person until the contrary is made to appear would be to carry the doctrine of presumptions beyond the border line.

It is quite difficult to imagine the relation of principal and surety without a principal, and equally so to find a substantial reason on which to rest the presumption that whenever a married woman executes her individual promissory note she occupies the position of a surety for her husband or some other person. It is true that it may be shown that the individual note of a married woman was given solely for the benefit of the husband or someone else, but when this is claimed by her it must be made to appear affirmatively. The following cases we think support our conclusion:

Arnold v. Engleman, supra, was an action on a promissory note executed by a married woman alone and included no account for merchandise sold and delivered to her. And at this point we feel that it is not improper to quote for the second time a small portion of what was said by the court in that case: "It would be a great stretch to affirm that in buying personal property she was not contracting concerning it." But it would not be more so than to presume when a married woman executes her separate promissory note, reciting that for value received she promises to pay so many dollars, that the consideration has moved to someone else, and that she has received no benefit therefrom.

In McLeod v. Atlas L. Ins. Co., 107 Ind. 300, 8 West. Rep. 630, the court said: "Except as prohibited in these two sections 5117 and 5119, . . . a married woman had and has the same power to make executory contracts, and was and is as much bound thereby, as if she had been or was unmarried at the time of their execution. If the appellee's complaint in the case in hand had shown that the appellant Molinda was the surety of her co-appellant in the notes in suit, or that the mortgaged real estate was her separate estate, it would have been necessary, perhaps, to have alleged the further fact, in order to state a cause of action against her, that she had received either in person or in benefit to her estate the consideration of such notes and mortgage, or some part thereof. . . . But as no such showing was made in the complaint, it was sufficient to withstand appellant's assignments of errors, and would have been good, we think, even upon demurrers for the alleged want of facts."

In Bennett v. Mottley, 110 Ind. 190, 7 West. Rep. 912, Niblack, J., for the court, said: "An argument is submitted against the sufficiency of the complaint upon demurrer upon the ground that it showed Mrs. Dingman to have been a married woman at the time she executed the notes and mortgage, and did not aver a state of facts creating a liability on her part notwithstanding the disabilities imposed by her coverture. This would at one time have been a valid objection to the complaint, but the law in that respect has been materially changed by the Revised Statutes of 1881. Coverture is no longer a disability in this State, except in some special cases, and hence upon the facts averred no disability on the part Mrs. Dingman could have been fairly presumed. The complaint was consequently sufficient upon demurrer."

In view of these authorities no such presumption can arise as that contended for by the appellant. But Elliot v. Gregory, 115 Ind. 98, 14 West. Rep. 830, is still a much stronger case against the said contention. There a married woman was sued for medical services rendered to her at her special instance and request and upon her express promise to pay for the same. She answered coverture, averring in addition that the debt was her husband's for the reason that she could not enter into a binding contract for such services. The answer was demurred to, the cause of demurrer being want of facts, which was overruled. This court reversed the ruling of the trial court and said: "It was an answer in confession and in avoidance. It impliedly admitted the rendition of the services sued for and Mrs. Gregory's promise to pay for the same and then set up her coverture as a protection against her liability to pay for such services. These made the pleading a formal as well as a substantial answer of coverture to the action. This, under existing statutes and our decisions upon them, was not a good defense to the complaint." Section 5115, supra, is then quoted, and the court goes on to say: "In the construction of this section we have held that a married woman's ability to contract is now the rule and that her disability to do so constitutes the exception. . . . The answer under consideration did not base Mrs. Gregory's defense upon any of the exceptional disabilities still imposed on married women; on the contrary, the allegations of the complaint, which were impliedly admitted by the answer, made a case affirmatively in which coverture was no disability."

That case seems to cover the case at bar. Here the gravamen of the action, as we have already said, is a promissory note, and at this point we desire to set the note out.

Brownstown, January 25, 1886.

One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Henry G. Smith five hundred dollars for value received, without any relief whatever from valuation or appraisement laws, with eight per cent interest from date until paid and attorney's fees.

Isabelle Shields.

In the case at bar, as in the case last cited, the promise is the express and individual promise of a married woman and differs only in the fact that in the former case the promise rested in parol while in the present case it is in writing.

In the former case the character of the consideration upon which the promise rested is stated, as was necessary because of the fact that the promise rested in parol, but in the case at bar the action is bottomed upon a written obligation which implies a consideration.

Who is presumed to have received the consideration? Necessarily the party or parties who executed the instrument. The question of consideration can only be of consequence to the parties to the obligation. Whether others were or were not benefited because of the giving of the obligation is wholly unimportant because in no event can it be enforced against them. But the obligation here sued upon upon its face expressly states that the note was given for value received. Value received by whom? The note itself states: "I promise to pay," etc., "for value received,"—value received by the promisor. But suppose in the last cited case the answer had been good and at the point where it failed the proof had failed, the result must necessarily have been the same. Why the same? Because in an action upon the separate and express promise of a married woman where a valuable consideration appears, the burden is upon her to show that she is not liable. And we think it can make no difference whether the consideration is affirmatively shown or arises by implication. But the principle here involved has been further settled by this court against the contention of the appellee.

In Security Co. v. Arbuckle, 119 Ind. 60, Matthew and May E. Arbuckle, husband and wife, owned by entireties certain real estate; they executed their joint notes and a mortgage upon the said real estate to secure the same. The application for the loan for which the notes and mortgage were executed was executed by them jointly. The mortgagee drew his check for the money loaned to them jointly, but delivered it to Matthew Arbuckle, the husband, and he drew the money. The special finding of the court failed to show for what purpose the money was borrowed, or how used. The court said: "The mortgaged estate being the joint property of both, and the loan having been made on the joint application of both mortgagors, the burden is upon them to make it appear that the consideration of the notes was not obtained and used for the benefit of the joint estate. This is not the case of a married woman mortgaging her separate estate to secure a debt which appears to be the obligation of herself and another. This is the case of the owners of a joint estate who joined in a mortgage thereon to secure the apparent obligation of both and it must affirmatively appear that the debt was not for their joint benefit."

The reasoning in that case meets the question before us. This is not the case of a married woman mortgaging her separate estate to secure the apparent debt of herself and another, but it is her separate obligation that she is sued upon and apparently her own debt, and hence the burden is on her to show that her husband and not herself received the consideration for the note. See Jenns v. Burt, 121 Ind. 275.

And we may add further that we have found no case where a married woman has been sued on her individual promise in which she has been discharged on the ground of coverture and suretyship, except where it has appeared upon the face of the obligation that she occupied the relation of a surety or guarantor, or where the fact has been established by affirmative evidence.

The appellee's husband testified as a witness in her behalf to a conversation which he had with the executor and to the payment of interest due on the note, but there is nothing in his evidence to show to whom the consideration for the note moved. In fact the transaction with the executor after the testator's death, or what may have been said by him, could not have been considered by the court as tending to throw light upon the original transaction. The executor was called as a witness by the appellee, but he made no statement material to the question in issue. The appellee was called as a witness in her own behalf, but testified to nothing material to the issue. The note sued on was secured by a mortgage on the separate real estate of the wife. It is true it was executed jointly by the appellee and her husband, but this could not be otherwise, for she could not mortgage her estate to secure any debt which she might contract except her husband joined in the mortgage.

For the error in overruling the motion for a new trial the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with costs.

Mitchell, J., concurs in the conclusion reached, but not with all of the reasoning found in the opinion.

*A written contract creating a commercial agency for one year, and fixing the agent's compensation for services, wharfage, storage and paying for the goods sold at a gross sum per month, having been renewed expressly for the next year, and the agency having in fact continued for several successive years afterwards, both parties in all their dealings conforming to the terms of the original contract, there was a tacit renewal of the same from year to year, and the principal could not, by notice given pending the last year's services, terminate the contract before the expiration of that year, so as to deprive the agent of his stipulated monthly compensation for the unexpired portion of the year. Though the mere power of revocation existed, the right to revoke did not exist, neither party having retired from or ceased to do business, and the alleged reason for the revocation being only that the price of goods dealt in had become and might possibly remain low.

ERROR to the City Court of Savannah to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover compensation alleged to be due plaintiffs for personal services performed by them under a contract. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Moore Denmark, Adams & Adams for plaintiff in error.

Moore, Garrard & Maldrin for defendants in error.

Blochley, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was no dispute or controversy as to the facts. Their legal significance—nothing else—was for determination, the parties having agreed that the only question should be whether the contract could be terminated before October 1 by the notice of December 15, 1886. The presiding judge decided this question in the negative, and directed a verdict accordingly. The notice referred to, dated December 15, 1886, was in these terms: "Owing to the present low prices of oil, and the possibility of a continuance of the same, we cannot, after December 31, 1886, continue to allow you $75 per month rebate, as heretofore. We solicit a continuance of your orders, and will be glad to allow you jobbers' rebate, the same we are now paying the other merchants."

The contract between the parties, as originally made, was in writing. It bore the date October 1, 1880. The obligations which it imposed on the agents (Gilbert & Co.) were these: (1) To sell coal oil for their principals at such prices as the latter might fix from time to time, (2) to handle no other oil for the period of one year from the date of the contract, (3) to receive the oil at their wharf, and store it in their warehouse, without charge for wharfage or storage, (4) to pay on the 10th of each month for all oil sold during the previous month. The obligations imposed upon the principals were, (1) to pay to the agents $75 per month for one year from the date of the contract, (2) to keep them supplied with merchantable oil at all seasons of the year; (3) to deliver the oil at their wharf or warehouse; (4) to pay them one dollar per barrel on the excess, if any, over 900 barrels sold by them during the year for which the agreement was made. Within a month or two after the year expired the contract was renewed, as the result of written correspondence, for a second year, terminating October 1, 1883. No subsequent negotiations took place, but the parties continued to deal in harmony with the terms of the written contract through all subsequent years, up to December 15, 1886, when the notice above recited was given. Afterwards, and until October of the following year, their dealings went on, but the oil sent during that period was furnished and received without prejudice to the claim of either party. The credit of $75 per month in the oil account, as kept by the principals, ceased with December, 1886, and from that time forward the credits entered as rebates amounted in the aggregate to only $18.84. In other words, compensation for nine months, which, according to the written contract, would be $675, was reduced to $18.84. To which of these sums were the agents entitled?

According to its letter, the notice did not seek to terminate the contract in any respect except as to the amount of compensation. It merely warned the agents that the principals would not pay as they had done theretofore, but would substitute the ordinary rebates allowed the trade. It did not propose to discharge the agents from any of their obligations, which, as we have seen, were not to handle any other oil, to receive and store without charge, and to pay unconditionally on the 10th of each month for all oil sold during the previous month. It admits of no doubt that the notice thus construed would not be effective for any purpose. But construing it, as both parties probably did, to be an effort to terminate the agency altogether, and release both parties from any and all obligation as to future dealings after January 1, 1887, the question is, Was there a legal right so to do? We think not. It is clear that during the first or second year both parties were bound, not from month to month only, but throughout the year, as there was an express undertaking on the part of the Oil Company to keep the agents supplied with oil at all seasons of the year, and to pay them $75 per month for one year. The case does not fall within the principle of such cases as Burton v. Great Northern R. Co., 9 Exch. 807; Rhodes v. Fortwood, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 256, and Orr v. Ward, 73 Ill. 319,—in which it was ruled that it was not obligatory on the employer to furnish business to the agent or employé throughout the whole period embraced in the contract, the reason of such ruling being that the employer had not stipulated so to do. Here, on the contrary, the stipulation was no less express on behalf of one party than of the other. If such a notice as we are considering would not have dissolved the engagement pending the first or second year of the service, it could not have that effect pending the seventh year, unless, by reason of not having been expressly renewed or continued after the second year, it ceased to be a contract for a whole year, and became indefinite as to time, or a contract at will only. Tested by the law of ordinary hiring, or of master and servant, there can be no doubt that services rendered without a new agreement, after the contract term has expired, are to be compensated at the same rate, and to that extent the prior contract is renewed or continued in force. N. H. Iron Factory Co. v. Richardson, 5 N. H. 204; Wallace v. Floyd, 20 Pa. 184; Hatch v. Albright, 26 Pa. 207; Nicholson v. Patchen, 5 Cal. 474; Vail v. Jersey Little Falls Mfg. Co., 23 Barb. 564; Weiss v. Milwaukee County Supra. 51 Wis. 504.

And, where the term of employment does not exceed one year, the authorities seem to us decisive that the prior contract is renewed or continued for an equivalent time, as well as at an equal rate. "Where the hiring is under a special agreement, the terms of that agreement must, of course, be observed. If there be no special agreement, but the hiring is a general one, without mention of time, it is considered to be for a year certain. If the servant continue in employment beyond that year, a contract for a second year is implied, and so on." Smith, Merc. Law, 266; Pomeroy's Smith, Merc. Law, § 508.

"Where a person has been employed by an other for a certain definite term at fixed wages. If the services are continued after the expiration of the term in the same business, it is presumed that the continued services are rendered upon the same terms; but this is a mere presumption, which may be overcome by proof of a new contract, or of facts and circumstances that show that the parties in fact understood that the terms of the old contract were not to apply to the continued services." Wood, Mast. and Serv. § 98.

"A person who has been previously employed by the month, year or other fixed interval, and who is permitted to continue in the employment after the period limited by the original employment has expired, will, in the absence of anything to show a contrary intention, be presumed to be employed until the close of the current interval, and upon the same terms." Mechem, Ag. § 212.

"Tacit relocation is a doctrine borrowed from the Roman law. It is a presumed renovation of the contract from the period at which the former expired, and is held to arise from implied consent of parties, in consequence of their not having signified their intention that the agreement should terminate at the period stipulated. . . . Though the original contract may have been for a longer period than one year, the renewed agreement can never be for more than one year, because no verbal contract of location can extend longer." Fraser, Mast. and Serv. 58.

This last is a Scotch authority, but on this question the law of Scotland seems to coincide with our own, and with the law of Louisiana. See Alba v. Moriarty, 36 La. Ann. 680; Lolande v. Aldrich (La.) 6 South. Rep. 28; Tollon v. Grand Portage Copper Min. Co. 55 Mich. 147; Shice v. Wayne County Poor Superintendents, 58 Mich. 508; McCullough Iron Co. v. Carpenter, 67 Md. 554, 10 Cent. Rep. 118; Tuterson v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 106 Mass. 56; Capron v. Strout, 11 Nev. 304; Benton v. Collier, 4 Bing. 304.

In the argument notice was taken of the difference between the English and the American rule as to presuming that an indefinite hiring is for a whole year. It was said that in the former country this presumption holds, but in the latter it does not. Wood, Mast. and Serv. § 180.

We think, however, this presumption has nothing to do with the matter; for whether the first hiring has its duration fixed by express or implied contract, if it be fixed in either way, the term (if not longer than one year) admits of duplication by tacit as well as express agreement. When we have a definite term of service, no matter how we get it, subsequent service of the same kind, where no new contract is made and nothing appears to indicate a change of intention, may be referred to the previous understanding, and to a tacit renewal of the engagement.

Thus far we have dealt with the question without any special reference to the law of agency, as distinguished from that of master and servant generally. This was a commercial agency, comprehending not only personal services, but the use of a wharf for landing the oil, and of a warehouse for storing it, and attended with a guaranty of the proceeds of all sales, the agents being obliged to pay within ten days for the oil sold in each month. The agents, if not del credere agents technically, were upon the same footing as such; they had to pay for all the goods they sold. No doubt the power of revoking the agency pending a current year's business existed, but the right to revoke it without sufficient cause did not exist, and a wrongful revocation leaves the principal liable to make reparation to the agent. Mechem, Ag. §§ 209, 614, 620, 621. Code, § 2183.

Here no cause was assigned but the low price of oil, and the prospect of its continuance. Neither of the parties had retired, or so far as appears wished to withdraw from business; and, according to the evidence, fifteen days' notice would be too short a time within which to make arrangements with other dealers for oil. To do that would require several months. We can see nothing whatever in the record to justify a revocation of the agency by such a notice as was given, and we agree with the presiding judge in the opinion that the Oil Company had no legal right to terminate the contract before October 1, 1887, without mutual consent. The engagement was one from year to year, and not merely at the will of either party. There was no contention that the amount claimed by the defendants in excess of the plaintiff's demand was more than they ought to recover upon their plea of set-off, if they were entitled to recover at all; and, the verdict being for that amount, it was correct, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 48 Iowa, 385; Walters v. Washington Ins. Co., 1 Iowa, 411.

The Company was not bound to plead in the Alabama court that such wages were exempt. The law is otherwise.

Walters v. Washington Ins. Co., supra; Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 23.

Exemption Laws have no extraterritorial effect.

Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 81 Kan. 180, 16 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 480; Helfenstein v. Case, 8 Iowa, 287; Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 48 Iowa, 385; *Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. The garnishee is not compelled to claim the exemption, as it is a personal privilege to be claimed by the employé or not, as he chooses, and the garnishee cannot, in most cases, know whether he desires to claim it or not.

Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 20.

A garnishee cannot insist on matter by plea which would be good only in abatement of the attachment. That must come from the defendant.

Chestnut v. Potter, Peck (Tenn.) 198.

Caldwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of debt, tried below and here on an agreed state of facts. The plaintiff, Sam Carson, was in the service of the defendant, the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, as brakeman on one of its trains running from Memphis to Chattanooga, and back again through Mississippi and Alabama. He was a citizen of Tennessee, made his contract of employment here, and usually received his wages at Memphis, though no place of payment was named in the contract. While so employed the plaintiff, in the month of May, 1888, earned $20.45, which, by the custom of the Company, became due and payable on the 10th of June following. On the 28th of May, Prout, a citizen of Alabama, sued out an original attachment in that State against Carson, on the ground of nonresidence, to collect a debt of $31 contracted there, and on the same day a writ of garnishment issued on the attachment against the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company to reach a sufficiency of Carson's wages to pay his debt to Prout. Proper publication was made for Carson, and by that means, or some other, he had actual notice of the pendency of the attachment and garnishment proceedings, but he failed to make defense. The garnishment process was served on the Company's agent at Tusculum, and on the 11th of June, one day after Carson's wages became due and payable, the Company answered that it owed him $20.45 for wages due him as brakeman. Trial was duly had, and judgment rendered against the garnishee for the $20.45. This judgment the Company paid. Thereafter, on the 28th of June, 1888, Carson brought the present suit before a justice of the peace, at Memphis, to recover the same wages from the Railroad Company. The fact of the proceedings in Alabama, and the payment of the judgment there, were interposed as a defense to the action. The justice of the peace, and after him the judge of the circuit court, adjudged the defense a good one, and rendered judgment for the defendant. Carson has appealed in error.

It is agreed that the attachment and garnishment proceedings were in strict conformity to the laws of Alabama. From this concession, it follows that the garnishee was completely discharged from all liability by payment of the garnishment judgment, unless there be something in the question of exemption to take the case out of the usual rule, and prevent that result. It is earnestly urged by Carson's counsel that this is an exceptional case, made so by the fact that, under the law of this State (Mill. & V. Code, § 2931), his wages to the extent of $30 were exempt from seizure by garnishment or otherwise. The position, briefly stated, is that it was the duty of the garnishee to claim the exemption for Carson, and thereby prevent judgment against it on the garnishment process, and that, having failed to do this, the Company's indebtedness to him remains unchanged and unsatisfied. To our mind, this position seems altogether untenable, for more reasons than one.

1. There was no peculiarity about this indebtedness to Carson,—no inherent quality or

In Wisconsin it has been held that it is the duty of the garnishee to notify the debtor of the proceedings, and to set up the defense that the wages were exempt from execution by the law of the State of the debtor's residence (Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 28 Wis. 220); but this doctrine has been denied by the Supreme Courts of Iowa and Ohio, 3 L. R. A.

Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 48 Iowa, 385; Conley v. Chilcote, 25 Ohio St. 200. See Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Ragland, 84 Ill. 375, 5 Cent. L. J. 100; Winterfield v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co., 30 Wis. 600; Snook v. Snitzer, 25 Ohio St. 514; Missouri & P. R. Co. v. Whipple, post.—

superadded responsibility to distinguish it from any other debt, so far as the Company was concerned. It owed this debt as it owed any other debt. It had assumed no other obligation than that of payment of a particular sum at a specified time. The contention of Carson would make the obligation greatly more burdensome, by throwing upon the Company the additional responsibility and expense of knowing, at its peril, that there was an exemption law in his favor, and of claiming the benefit of it for him. Such a requirement would be unjust and unreasonable.

In Davenport v. Swan, 9 Humph. 186, the garnishee stated in his answer that a horse of a debtor in his possession was exempt from execution, whereupon he was discharged, because his answer, which was conclusive, did not contain a sufficient admission to charge him. That case does not stand in the way of the views just expressed. There the garnishee volunteered to set up the fact of exemption. He was not required to do it; nor was it decided or intimated that it was his duty to do so, or that, in case of failure to do so, he would have been liable to the garnishment debtor for the value of the horse. No such question was before the court.

The question of the right or duty of a garnishee in this State to plead the Exemption Law of another State in favor of its creditor, the garnishment debtor, who resided in the other State, was expressly reserved by this court in the case of Holland v. Mobile & O. R. Co., 16 Lea, 418, 419.

2. Had the Railroad Company made the claim of exemption ever so formally for Carson, it would have availed him nothing. Exemption Laws have no extraterritorial effect. Their operation is restricted to the States in which they are enacted. Freeman, Executions, § 209; Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 20.

Carson was a citizen of Tennessee, and in the courts of this State would have been entitled to the exemption, had he claimed it; but the suit was in Alabama, where even he could not have made the claim successfully. Then, of course, the garnishee could not have done so for him, and ought not to suffer for failing to make the effort. Nonresidents of this State cannot avail themselves of the benefit of our Exemption

Laws, either as to personality (Hawkins v. Pearce, 11 Humph. 45; Lisenbee v. Holt, 1 Speed, 50), or as to homestead. Prater v. Prater, 87 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 83; Emmett v. Emmett, 14 Lea, 870.

Learned counsel for Carson relies on certain authorities which are yet to be noticed.

Mr. Smyth, in his work on Homesteads and Exemptions (§ 562), says: "A garnishee who pays over money which constitutes a part of the personality exemption of the debtor does so at his own risk. He will be liable to the debtor (his creditor) for the full amount of the money he has paid. A person who has been brought into court as garnishee may answer that the property of the debtor in his hands, or his indebtedness to such debtor, is exempt by law from seizure on attachment or execution, and he is bound to bring the fact to the notice of the court; otherwise the judgment against such garnishee, and the satisfaction thereof, will not bar an action against him by the attaching debtor." For these propositions the author cites Watkins v. Cason, 46 Ga. 444, and Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 283. We have not had access to the former of these cases, but the latter we find to be an authority for the text, and very similar to the one at bar, the difference being that the creditor of the garnishee in that case had no notice of the suit pleaded in bar. That case has attracted wide attention, and received very unfavorable comments from courts of last resort and text-writers. It cites no precedent to support it, and, so far as we know, has not itself been followed by any subsequent case. In note 2 to section 209 of his work on Executions, Mr. Freeman says it is "utterly indefensible."

Mr. Thompson likewise assails it as unsound, and assigns his reasons at some length in section 868 of his work on Homesteads and Exemptions.

The cases of Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 180; Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co., 60 Iowa, 846, and Eichelburger v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ohio), 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 158, decided, respectively, by the court of last resort in Kansas, Iowa and Ohio, are in conflict with the Wisconsin case (the last one expressly denying its soundness), and in harmony with our holding herein.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jo Daviess County in favor of defendants in an action to compel specific performance of an alleged parol contract by which plaintiff was to receive certain property at the death of Bradner Smith. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mrs. Hopkins, Aldrich & Thatcher and E. L. Bedford for appellant.

Mr. John J. Jones, for appellees:

The contract alleged is obnoxious to the Statute of Frauds. In order to take a parol contract respecting lands out of the Statute of Frauds there must be exclusive possession, taken under the contract, by the party seeking its enforcement.

Negotiations between a father and daughter, by which the father was to deed to his daughter certain property in consideration of his maintenance and support during his life, and which were never consummated, the deeds prepared not being executed, will not give the daughter the right to retain possession of the land against the father. Zenor v. Johnson, 9 West. Rep. 323, 111 Ind. 61.

Performance and possession take it out of the Statute.

A valid oral agreement may be made to leave a sum of money by will to a particular person in consideration of services thereafter to be rendered by the promisee to the promisor, provided such services are in fact thereafter rendered and accepted in pursuance of such contract. *Wellington v. An agreement resting in parol, to devise real estate in consideration of services in caring for the testator, is binding and enforceable when the promisee has performed the consideration. Pflugar v. Pultz, 9 Cent. Rep. 463, 49 N. J. Eq. 440.

In an action to enforce the agreement made on the adoption of a child, where it appears plaintiff has fully performed the contract on her part, and the same has also been performed in part by the other parties thereto, and to the extent of providing for and maintaining plaintiff during many years, the Statute of Frauds has no application. Sharkey v. McDermott, 6 West. Rep. 737, 91 Mo. 647.

A parol agreement by a father, that if his two sons would pay the interest and balance of the purchase money of land, and take care of their parents during life, they should have the land after his death, executed by the sons for fifteen or twenty years, is binding, and is not within the Statute of Frauds. *Carney v. The alleged contract, being entire as to realty and personality, cannot be enforced as to the personality alone where the Statute of Frauds applies to that portion of the contract which relates to realty.

Parker v. Garrison, 61 Ill. 250; Pierce v. Plumb, 74 Ill. 231; Cole v. Mitchell, 3 West. Rep. 69, 115 Ill. 181.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in equity, brought by Hattie Pond, to set aside the last will of Bradner Smith, deceased, and to enforce the specific performance of a parol agreement alleged to have been made on or about the 1st day of December, 1857, between Marshall B. Pierce, father of complainant, and Bradner Smith, under which the complainant claims all the property, both real and personal, which the said Bradner Smith owned at the time of his death. The bill sets out the contract, substantially, as follows:

"Bradner Smith, after consultation with his wife, Mary Smith, and with her full consent and approval, in order to induce oratrix's father to consent to the separation, and permit her to become a member of the family of said Bradner Smith, made a proposition to your oratrix's father that if he would permit them, the said Bradner and wife, to take your oratrix to their home, and would permit her to assume the name of 'Smith,' instead of 'Pierce,' and allow her to live with them as their child, the said Bradner Smith, in consideration thereof, would give your oratrix at his death [amended to read 'at their,' viz., Bradner and Mary Smith's 'death'] all his property—real, personal and mixed—that he might have in his name, or under his control, at the time of decease, that, in consideration of these promises, her father consented and agreed to said proposition, and then and there entered into a contract with said B. Smith, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, Mary Smith, that oratrix should go and live with them, as their child, assume the name of 'Smith' instead of 'Pierce,' take the place of their child, live with them as such, and, in consideration thereof, at the death of said B. Smith [amended to read 'at their death,' namely, Mary and Bradner Smith, instead of 'at his death'] all of his estate—real, personal and mixed—was to become and be the property of your oratrix; that, in compliance with said contract, oratrix then and there, to wit, December 1, 1856, did leave her father's home, and go to the home of B. Smith and wife, and became a member of their family, and assumed the name of 'Smith' instead of 'Pierce,' and was known as 'Smith,' from thence until oratrix's marriage, and oratrix faithfully carried out her part of said contract, and was a true and faithful child of said Mary

It is also alleged that complainant lived with the Smiths, under said agreement, until she was twenty nine years of age, when she was married to Dr. Frederick L. Pond. It is also alleged that Mary Smith died May 21, 1863, and that Bradner Smith died March 21, 1867. It is also alleged that "in violation of said contract," etc., "and in fraud of your oratrix's rights in the premises, B. Smith was induced, December 16, 1865, to execute a purported will, and on January 7, 1867, shortly before his death, executed a purported codicil thereto, as appears by copies attached to Exhibits A and B, by which will and codicil he deprived oratrix of any part of his property whatever; that Bradner Smith, at the time of executing said purported will and codicil, was weak in mind, and in his dotage, and by reason of said condition was induced, in fraud of oratrix's rights, to execute the same."

The complainant sets out in the bill a list of property—real, personal and mixed—owned by the deceased at the time of his death, valued at $20,000. The bill then prays that the will and codicil may be declared null and void; that complainant be declared to be the owner and entitled to the possession of the personal property and notes; and that deeds may be executed conveying the lands to her. The executor and devisees under the will put in answers to the bill in which they deny the making of the alleged contract, and plead the Statute of Frauds thereto. They also denied all the substantial allegations of the bill. A cross-bill was also filed by one of the legatees, Clara A. Smith; but, as that has no bearing on the decision of the case, it is not necessary to set out its contents here. Replication having been filed, the cause proceeded to a hearing on the pleadings and evidence, and the court entered a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity; and the complainant appealed.

The complainant's mother was a sister of Mary A. Smith, the wife of Bradner Smith. She died May 10, 1834, when complainant was about two years old. Bradner and Mary Smith had no children of their own, and soon after the death of complainant's mother they took complainant to their home; and she there remained until the second marriage of her father, July 28, 1836, when she returned home to her father. It seems that during the two years' residence of complainant with the Smiths they became very much attached to her, and made an effort to arrange with complainant's father for her return to their home. Pierce, the father of complainant, resided at Savanna, and the Smiths at Galena. The contract under which complainant was taken into the Smith's family was claimed to be proven by one witness,—who was present when the contract was made,—Mrs. Pierce, now the widow of complainant's father. She stated that she was married, July 28, 1836, to Marshall B. Pierce, who at the time of their marriage had six children, Hattie, the youngest, being four years old at the time. "She continued to reside in our family six or eight months after our marriage. At the end of that period of eight months, arrangements were made by my husband, Marshall B. Pierce, with Bradner Smith and Mary A. Smith, his wife, through Mary A. Smith, with respect to the future care, custody, nurture and services of the complainant, Hattie Pond, then Pierce, by which they were to keep her, and raise her as their own child, giving her the advantage of a good education, and were to leave her their property, whatever it was, when they were done with it, in consideration of the future care, nurture and services of the complainant. This agreement was entered into at our house in Savanna. I was present when the arrangement was made. I think it was in 1857. I don't know that anyone was present except Mr. Pierce, myself and family. Mrs. Smith made the contract on the part of Bradner Smith and herself. They resided at Galena at that time. Mrs. Smith at that time said, concerning when Hattie, the complainant, was to have the property of the Smiths, that she was to receive the property when they were done with it,—she was to have all they had. She had always expected to take Hattie, but never had claimed her until Mr. Pierce was married, when she thought she ought to have her. Mary A. Smith meant by that expression, "when they were done with it," referring to their property, at their death. Marshall Pierce, my husband, and I supposed them to refer to the death of Mr. and Mrs. Smith. After the arrangement was entered into as above, Mrs. Smith took the complainant home with her to Galena."

The declarations of the Smiths, on different occasions during the time that Hattie resided with them, were proven by several witnesses, to the effect that what they had would be hers when they were through with it; that she would be an heir, etc.,—but no person now living heard the contract except Mrs. Pierce, whose evidence is given above. At the time the arrangement relied upon was made, Smith owned real and personal property; and, as heretofore shown, he owned real and personal property at the time of his death. Mary Smith, the wife of Bradner, died May 21, 1855; and the latter died March 21, 1857. There is no controversy in regard to the fact that complainant, from the time she was four years of age until she married, at the age of twenty-nine, on October 10, 1880, resided with the Smiths as a member of their family. She was boarded, clothed and educated by them, and at the same time she performed such services as are usual in a family occupying the position in society that the Smiths occupied. So far as appears, she was treated as a child, and no doubt performed the same services, and received the same advantages, in education, clothing and other respects, that she would have received if she had been a child of the Smiths. Whether Bradner Smith, in raising complainant from infancy to womanhood, in clothing and educating her, in aiding her to consummate an advantageous marriage, in giving her property, did all that, in morals, he should have done, is not a question which we are called upon to determine. The complainant seeks by her bill the specific performance of a parol contract. Under the contract she claims personal property, choses in action and real estate; but, as she never was in possession of any of the property under the contract, the Statute of Frauds being pleaded, is she entitled to a decree? While other questions are involved, this is the most important one.

The law may be regarded as well settled that a parol contract for the sale of lands will be enforced where the purchase money has been paid, possession taken under the contract and lasting and valuable improvements made on the lands. Stevens v. Wheeler, 25 Ill. 300; McNamara v. Garrity, 106 Ill. 387; Pittsammone v. Allen, 39 Ill. 440; Leird v. Allen, 81 Ill. 43.

So, also, where the owner of real estate makes a parol promise to his child to convey lands to him, and, relying on such promise, the child goes into possession of the lands, and makes valuable and lasting improvements, such a promise rests upon a valuable consideration, and may be enforced in equity. Kurtz v. Hübner, 55 Ill. 514.

In the case last cited, it was held that no important distinction exists between such a promise and a sale. But we are aware of no well-considered case holding that a court of equity will decree the specific performance of a parol agreement to convey lands where the purchaser has not entered into possession under the contract; but, on the other hand, this court has held in a number of cases that possession under the contract must be established in order to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. Wood v. Thornely, 56 Ill. 465.

In the case cited it is said: "To constitute such performance as will avoid the Statute, it must clearly and distinctly appear that the party entered into possession under the agreement itself. . . . The mere possession of land under a parol agreement of sale, even with the superadded fact of valuable improvements, will not be deemed part performance, if the possession was obtained otherwise than under the contract."

In Temple v. Johnson, 71 Ill. 14, the question arose whether full payment of the purchase money, without taking possession of the premises, was sufficient to take a case out of the Statute of Frauds; and in disposing of the question it is said: "In the case of Pittsammone v. Allen, 39 Ill. 440, it was held that the payment in full of the purchase money, and the possession of the property purchased, took the case out of the Statute of Frauds. This is the greatest relaxation of the requirements of the Statute that has been made by this court, nor do we incline to go any further in that direction."

While the decisions of the various courts are not entirely uniform, the general rule seems to be, as stated by Story in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, § 761, that the general ground upon which courts proceed to execute parol contracts for part performance, as the governing rule, is "that nothing is to be considered as a part performance which does not put the party into a situation which is a fraud upon him, unless the agreement is fully performed;" and he says that, although formerly a payment of the purchase money was considered a sufficient part performance to take the case out of the Statute, the rule is now otherwise settled; and in this he is fully sustained by the adjudged cases both in the British and American courts.

In Ferbrache v. Ferbrache, 110 Ill. 210, this court again held that by the Statute of Frauds all contracts for the transfer of title to land must be in writing, and, to take a case out of the Statute, it is indispensable that the contract shall be established by competent proof, to be clear, definite and unequivocal in all its terms, and that possession shall have been taken of the land under the contract, and payment of the purchase money made. See also Kryfman v. Cook, 114 Ill. 13, Clark v. Clark, 123 Ill. 388, 11 West. Rep. 398, Orham v. Dodge, 123 Ill. 328, 11 West. Rep. 302.

A case of much point is Wellner v. Long, 105 Ind. 322, 8 West. Rep. 870. In that case a child seven years old was taken under an agreement that, if she would live with decedent and her husband until their death, they would make her their heir, and at their death they would will her their entire estate. Property, real and personal, was left, of the value of $8,000, but no will was made as per the contract. In deciding the case, it is said: "If the Statute of Frauds presents no obstacle to the enforcement of the contract, then, so far as the record discloses, none exists. It cannot, of course, be denied that if the contract had been in writing, or if, in pursuance of an oral contract, the plaintiff had been put in complete possession, and she had otherwise fully performed on her part, specific performance could have been enforced. It would then have presented a case analogous in principle to Mauck v. Melton, 64 Ind. 414. This much has been said to show that the only impediment in the way of a specific enforcement of the contract involved in this case is the Statute of Frauds. When the title to property . . . is to be acquired by purchase, the Statute of Frauds will operate upon and affect the contract, in precisely the same manner, whether the consideration for the purchase is to be paid in services, money or any thing else. In either case, such a contract, being in parol, and entirely executory, cannot be enforced by either party. That the evidence in this case tends to support the view that it was the purpose of the intestate to make provision for the plaintiff's ward by a will, may be conceded, but, as the agreement to do so was never manifested in writing, signed by her, and as it involved an agreement for a sale of real estate, and for the transfer of personal property, . . . such agreement was subject to the operation of the Statute of Frauds equally with all other agreements for like sales. Because the agreement was not withdrawn from the operation of the Statute by part performance, it cannot be specifically enforced; neither can it be the foundation of an action for damages."

It will be observed that in the case cited, while the agreement was one of the same character as the agreement involved here, the same rule was held to apply as if it was a mere verbal sale of real estate, where no possession had been taken under the contract.

In view of the authorities, we are able to arrive at but one conclusion; and that is that the contract relied upon, resting in parol, is within the Statute of Frauds, and void. Conceding that complainant was taken into the family of the Smiths under an arrangement as testified to by Mrs. Pierce, and that they were to leave her their property when they were done with it, "in consideration of the future care, nurture and services" of complainant, and treating the surrender of complainant by her father, and such services as she may have rendered, as a payment for the property agreed to be given her, still, as she never obtained possession of any of the property under the contract, under the authorities the agreement, resting in parol, was void by the Statute of Frauds, and cannot be enforced in a court of equity. It is imposing no hardship upon parties, where the title to real property is involved, to require their contracts to be reduced to writing; and it is the safer rule. Where the terms and conditions of a contract depend upon the recollection of witnesses after the lapse of many years, as in the case here, there is always much uncertainty in regard to what the contract really was; and, where the title to real property is involved, no rule ought to be adopted which will encourage the making of such contracts. There are cases cited in appellant's brief which seem to lay down a different rule, and which seem to support appellant's position; but we have not the time to review them here, nor do we think it would serve any useful purpose to do so. It is sufficient to say that the cases referred to are not in harmony with the principle announced by the decisions of this court, and we are not inclined to follow them.

But it is contended in the argument that the services rendered by complainant, and the facts, as they appear from the record, that the whole course of her subsequent life was changed in consequence of the agreement, prevent the Smiths from relying on the Statute of Frauds. In other words, by the acts of performance, complainant would suffer an injury amounting to a fraud unless relief is granted under the contract. The rule on this subject is laid down in Wallace v. Rappleye, 108 Ill. 241, and the cases there cited. But we do not regard the acts of performance proven in this case such as would authorize a court in holding that complainant has suffered an injury amounting to a fraud unless she is granted relief. When the father of complainant consented that she might enter the Smith family, he was a man in very moderate circumstances. He had a wife and six or seven children to support, and for several years relied upon a salary, as clerk of a steamer on the Mississippi River, for the support of himself and family, while, on the other hand, Bradner Smith was in good circumstances—alleged to be worth $40,000. He had no family but himself and wife. He was therefore in a condition to afford complainant many advantages in her raising and education that she would not receive if she resided with her parents. So far, therefore, as being placed in a worse condition on account of the agreement, it is without foundation. Indeed, the manner in which complainant was raised and educated, and the marriage she subsequently contracted through the influence of the Smiths, seem to show that her condition in life was improved, rather than injured, by the arrangement.

It will, however, be observed that complainant seeks by her bill to recover personal property as well as real estate, and it may be claimed that as to the personal property the agreement is not within the Statute. The contract, however, must be regarded as an entirety; and, if void as to real estate, it must also be held void as to personal property. This is a rule of law well established. Meyers v. Schamp, 67 Ill. 400.

(....Minn....)

*1. Railroad Employer's Liability Act. Held, following Lavelle v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co., 40 Minn. 249, that chapter 18, Laws 1887, applies only to employes of railway corporations exposed to the peculiar hazards connected with the use and operation of the road.

2. A crew of men, of which plaintiff was one, was engaged in repairing a bridge on defendant's road, and in performing the work it was necessary to leave the draw partly open. Through the negligence of one of the crew, the draw was left unfastened, and was blown shut by the wind, and injured the plaintiff while at work between the stationary part of the bridge and draw. Held, that defendant was not liable.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying his motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants, in which the complaint had been dismissed. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was a carpenter in the employ of defendant, engaged in the occupation of repairing bridges that were out of order. While working upon a drawbridge over the St. Louis River near Duluth, he was injured by reason of the draw, which had been negligently left unfastened, swinging shut, owing to the force of the wind, and catching him between the stationary part of the bridge and the draw.

This action was brought to recover damages for such injuries under chapter 18 of the Session Laws of 1887, which reads as follows:

"Every railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this State shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof, by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof, without contributory negligence on his part, when sustained within this State; and no contract, rule or regulation between such corporation and any agent or servant shall impair or diminish such liability; Provided, that nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to render any railroad company liable for damages sustained by any employe, agent or servant while engaged in the construction of a new road or any part thereof, not open to public travel or use."

Messrs. Draper & Davis for appellant.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The injury to plaintiff having been caused by the negligence of his fellow servant, he cannot recover unless under chapter 18, Laws 1887.

In Lavelle v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co., 40 Minn. 249, in which this Statute was very fully considered, we held that it applied only to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads; that it must be construed as designed exclusively for the benefit of those who are in the course of their employment exposed to such hazards, and whose injuries are caused by them. And the more we consider the question the more are we confirmed in the opinion that it is only when construed as subject to some such limitation that the Statute can be sustained as a valid law. As was said in the case referred to, to avoid the imputation of "class" legislation, the classification, in cases of special legislation, must be made upon some apparent, natural reason,—some reason suggested by necessity, by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in different classes as suggests the necessity or propriety of different legislation with respect to them. If a distinction is to be made as to the liability of employers to their employes, it must be based upon a difference in the nature of the employment, and not of the employers. One rule of liability cannot be established for railway companies, merely as such, and another rule for other employers, under like circumstances and conditions, unless upon the theory suggested in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackay, 137 U. S. 205 [83 L. ed. 107], that the State may "prescribe the liabilities under which corporations created by its laws shall conduct their business in the future, where no limitation is placed upon its power in this respect by their charters,"—a proposition which, as thus broadly stated, that court, in view of its later utterances, could hardly have intended to announce. Indeed, the particular question now under consideration was not before the court, and, presumably, was not in mind. Neither would it relieve the Act from the imputation of class legislation that it applies alike to all railroads. It has been sometimes loosely stated that special legislation is not class, "if all persons brought under its influence are treated alike under the same conditions." But this is only half the truth. Not only must it treat alike, under the same conditions, all who are brought "within its influence," but in its classification it must bring within its influence all who are under the same conditions. Therefore, if a distinction is to be made between railway corporations and other employers as respects their liability to their employes, it must be based upon some difference in the nature of the employment, and can only extend to cases where such difference exists. Hence most courts, as notably in Iowa and Kansas, have held that similar statutes, although general in their terms, embrace only "the peculiar hazards of railroading." But, when we come to examine the adjudicated cases, we confess we are unable to discover any definite, consistent or logical rule which the courts have applied in determining whether, upon the facts of a particular case, it fell within or without the Statute. In some cases it has been held that the Statute applied because the duty of the employes required them to ride upon the cars to the place of work, although the injury was not sustained while thus riding, and was not caused by, or in any manner connected with, the operation of the road. Such a position seems to us wholly illogical. Other cases have been held within the Statute because the work being performed was necessary to the use and operation of the road, although the injury sustained was not caused by, or connected with, such use and operation. This, we think, is equally illogical. In fact, the proposition is so broad and indefinite as to bring within the Act all employes, regardless of the nature of their employment; for the work of all, even clerks in offices, is, in a sense, necessary to the use and operation of the road. Therefore, after mature consideration, our conclusion is that, if any limitation is to be placed by the courts upon the application of this Statute (and on constitutional grounds there must be), the only one which will furnish any definite or logical rule is to hold that it only applies to those employes who are exposed to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads, and whose injuries are the result of such dangers. We do not mean to say that there may not be reasons suggested by some differences in the nature of the employment which would warrant the Legislature in placing some other hazards within the provisions of such a law; but, if the courts should attempt to impose upon the general language of this Statute any other limitation than the one suggested, they would be all at sea, without either rudder or compass. Applying the test suggested, it is clear that plaintiff's case is not within the provisions of the Act.

A crew of men, of which plaintiff was one, was engaged in repairing a drawbridge on defendant's railroad. In doing this work it was necessary to leave the draw partly open. Plaintiff was at work between the stationary part of the bridge and the draw, when the wind blew the draw shut, and injured him. The draw might and should have been fastened open, which was omitted to be done through the negligence of the foreman of the crew. Plaintiff was not engaged in operating the road, nor was his injury caused by any of the hazards incident to its operation, any more than in the case of the helper in the repair-shops in the Lavalles Case. As suggested by counsel for defendant, suppose there had been a wagon bridge over the St. Louis River, alongside of this railroad bridge, and one of a crew engaged in repairing it had been injured under like circumstances. He could not have recovered from his employer. Yet the actual situation, both as to the nature of the employment and the cause of the injury, would have been the same in either case.

Order denying a new trial affirmed.

(....Wis....)

Enticing a husband away from his wife and depriving her of his society and support give her no right of action.

(Cassaday, J., dissents.)

LAVIN E. JONES

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged enticing away of plaintiff's husband and depriving plaintiff of his society and support. Reversed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Van Dyke & Van Dyke, for appellant;

At common law a wife could not maintain an action against one who wrongfully and maliciously enticed her husband from her.

2 Bl. Com. p. 142; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 110; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 41; Van Arnam v. Ayers, 67 Barb. 544; Action of a Wife for the Alienation of her Husband's Affections, 9 Wash. L. Rep. 518, 580.

No statute of this State has changed this common-law rule.

Laws of 1881, chap. 99, which enables a married woman to maintain an action, as if unmarried, "for an injury to her person or character," does not confer a right to maintain this action.

Logan v. Logan, 77 Ind. 589; Van Arnam v. Ayers, supra.

There is a wide distinction between an "injury to the person" and "an injury to personal rights."

tection and society. Bennett v. Bennett, 6 L. R. A. 568, 118 N. Y. 584.

She may maintain an action against another woman for alienating her husband's affections. Foot v. Card, 6 L. R. A. 529, 85 Conn. 1; Seaver v. Adams (N. H.) March 14, 1890.

for the loss of the consortium of the wife through the malicious interference of a third person is not questioned. And the gist of the action is the loss of the comfort and society of the wife, and not the loss of her services. At any rate, loss of services is not an indispensable element.

This action, like every other tort action, rests upon the broad principle that where a legal right is impaired or lost by the wrongful act of another, the wrong-doer must answer for the injury in damages.

Whatever disability the married woman was under at common law with respect to actions was due to the fiction that the husband and wife were one person—i. e. the husband.

Ball v. Bullard, 52 Barb. 143.

Prior to the marriage the parties were equal in the law. The promise of the woman to marry the man was as good as his promise to marry her.

Harrison v. Cope, 5 Mod. 411.

Our Constitution precludes any discrimination which will afford help to the strong and leave the weak without redress.

Art. 1, § 9.

The married woman had a legal right to the consortium of her husband—at the common law—as much as to her separate estate which she held under the protection of a court of chancery. She might not have her remedy in the common law courts because of the fiction of the law, therefore she sought redress in the ecclesiastical court where she might have a remedy.

Westlake v. Westlake, 84 Ohio St. 631.

If there is any doubt that the right of consortium was a legal right of the wife by the common law, there is no such doubt as to our law. It springs from the marriage contract. When the Statute made desertion a cause for divorce, it likewise made the consortium a legal right in the wife.

She also has a remedy for a malicious injury to that right.

Ashby v. White, 3 Ld. Raym. 938; Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes, 581; Const. art. 1, § 9; Flanders v. Merrimack, 48 Wis. 567-575.

The right of each party in the marriage contract is res and subject to ownership, the term "property" in its broad sense includes this right.

Jaynes v. Jaynes, 89 Hun, 40.

By looking at the general scope of the legislation it is clear that the intention was to give the married woman the same remedy for every injury or wrong which any other person would have for a similar injury or wrong. No other conclusion is possible without resorting to a strict and technical construction of these provisions of the statutes which this court has held are to be liberally construed.

This right of action has been upheld by the following decisions of New York, whose statutes are substantially like our own:

Jaynes v. Jaynes, 89 Hun, 40; Breiman v. Pasch, 7 Abb. N. C. 249; Baker v. Baker, 16 Abb. N. C. 298; Warner v. Miller, 17 Abb. N. C. 221; Churchill v. Lewis, Id. 226; Bennett v. Bennett, 6 L. R. A. 558, 116 N. Y. 584. See also Clark v. Harlan, 1 Cin. Super. Ct. Rep. 418; Westlake v. Westlake, supra; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the plaintiff, as the wife of one Frank W. Duffin, against the defendant, the mother of said Frank, to recover damages by reason of the defendant having wrongfully induced, persuaded and caused the said Frank W. Duffin to refuse further to live and cohabit with the plaintiff, and to support and maintain her, and to support and maintain their child, and maliciously enticed him away from her, intending thereby to deprive her of his society, and support, maintenance, aid and assistance. The action was tried, and the plaintiff recovered, by the verdict of the jury, $2,000, of which the plaintiff remitted $1,000, and judgment was rendered for the residue thereof. Errors are assigned for admitting irrelevant testimony, refusing to submit certain questions to the jury, to give certain instructions and for denying motions for nonsuit and for a new trial, but they will not be considered any further than some of them may involve the question whether the action itself will lie. The learned counsel for the appellant, before the trial was commenced, objected to the introduction of any evidence under the complaint, on the ground that it stated no cause of action, which objection was overruled. On this demurrer, pro tunc, the learned counsel contended that this action would not lie at common law, and that there is no statute allowing it. From the examination of the authorities we have been able to make, and considering the reason thereof, we have concluded that such contention is correct, and that the action cannot be maintained.

The learned counsel of the respondent contends that the action lies (1) at the common law; and (2) by the terms and liberal interpretation of our statutes; and (3) by analogy to similar cases. The learned counsel does not contend that any such action was maintained at the common law, but that by the principles of the common law, and in analogy to similar actions at the common law, the right of action existed, and was not maintainable only on account of the wife's disability to bring the action. But the wife was not only unable to bring the action to recover damages for the loss of her husband's society, but the damages themselves were the property of the husband, the same as in case of personal injury, or for defamation, even before marriage. Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23; Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 241.

How can she be said to have had a right of action to recover damages which she could neither own nor enjoy? More properly the right of action was in the husband, in the interest or on account of his wife. The common law could not recognize a right of action in the wife to sue for the loss of her husband's society, without involving the absurdity that the husband might also sue for such a cause. The wife having no right of property, at common law, in any damages recovered on her account for any cause, neither could she have any right of action to recover them. This may have been grossly wrong, but such was the theory of the common law, and, to make it consistent, the wife had no such right of action. The wife was not only inferior to the husband, but she had no personal identity separate from her husband. It is not proper to say that the common law was inconsistent in denying to the wife the right to bring such an action, and at the same time allowing the husband to sue for the loss of the society of his wife. Her disability in this respect was consistent with all of her disabilities.

When the learned counsel cites the case of Winmore v. Greenbank, Willen, 881, decided in the nineteenth year of George the Third, in which the husband sued for enticing away his wife, per quod emittit the comfort and society of his wife, as furnishing the same reason for the wife bringing such an action, he ignores all these common-law disabilities of the wife, which are consistent with each other. Chief Justice Willen admitted that there was no precedent for such an action, but, as the action on the case had been invented for similar cases, he claimed that this was only another case with new facts, and as there were "injury and damage," and the violation of a right, and the action ought to lie, it would lie within the reason of other cases. And so the learned counsel argues from Philip v. Squire, Peake, N. P. Cas. 89, in the 81st year of George the Third, in which Lord Kenyon held that the action by the husband was not for the loss of the services of the wife, but of her society.

In Fulley v. Freeman, 8 T. R. 51, the action was for making a false affirmation with intent to defraud. Lord Kenyon held that the action would lie, although a new case, because there was damnum cum injuria.

In Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 906, decided in 1701, the action was against an officer for refusing to receive the plaintiff's vote. It was a case of prima impressio, but Chief Justice Holt, against the other judges, held that the action would lie at common law, on the ground that where there is a wrong there should be a remedy.

In Chapman v. Pickersill, 3 Wilson, 145, the action was for falsely and maliciously suing out a bankrupt commission and it was held that the action would lie at common law on the same ground.

In Lumley v. Gye, 3 El. & Bl. 216, the action was for enticing away a singer employed to sing in a theater, and in Rowen v. Holt, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 808, for enticing away a common laborer employed by the plaintiff. These are all new cases predicated upon the same general principles of the common law. The argument is, if these actions can be sustained, and the action of the husband for the loss of his wife's consortium, why may not an action by or on behalf of the wife, for the loss of her husband's society, support and protection, be maintained on the same principles? The reason is obvious, and suggested above. The wife had no property in the consortium of her husband that is lost, nor any right to it that has been violated at common law. If the same able judges who were free to invent actions, and to sustain new cases in an old action, and were quick to see the justice and humanity of all cases, could have found a right of action of the wife in such a case, we may believe that old forms and fictions would not have stood in the way. Her relative position and conditions as a wife at common law precluded the recognition of any such right of action. Under the civil law the husband and wife were distinct persons. The wife had a separate estate, the right to contract debts and to bring actions for injuries. Her position was so nearly equal to that of her husband that her right to his society was recognized, and she had a remedy for its loss. But that remedy was confined to the ecclesiastical courts, and consisted only in having her husband returned to her. 1 Bl. Com. 442.

The wife had a right of action for defamation, by the civil law, but it was denied her in the common-law courts, because she would then have two actions or a double remedy. Palmer v. Thorpe, 4 Coke, 20; Byron v. Kinn, 12 Mod. 106, 3 Salk 604.

Another reason was that an action for defamation would not lie without special damages, and the wife could have no special damages. In looking into the books of the common law, we can find no such action or right of action of the wife, and they are both denied on principle as well as want of precedent. In the genial light of modern times, the true situation and position of the wife in the marriage relation are seen more clearly than formerly, and the place assigned her by the law and by common consent is much higher and more suitable to her intrinsic character, ability and worth. She is placed on a nearer equality with her husband in her rights of person, property and character. Under the just and genial laws of married women, she has resumed her position of a feme sole, as nearly as is compatible with natural law. It is not therefore surprising that so great and gallant, learned and humane, a judge and chancellor as Lord Campbell should hold in Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, that the wife had the same right to the consortium of her husband that he had to hers, and might allege special damage for its loss, caused by defamation of her character. The Lord Chancellor said that it was a case of first impressions, and rested his opinion upon the great changes that had taken place in the position and relations of the wife under modern legislation. The opinion is by no means positive, and placed the right on the condition that it might be shown that the wife's "loss and injury" concurred. But the opinion is obiter in that case, and off hand, and can hardly be accepted as authority. But the remedy of the wife was of no use or benefit to her, for she had to join her husband in the suit, and the damages recovered belonged exclusively to him. The plaintiff obtained judgment in Queen's Bench in Ireland. It was affirmed in Exchequer by a divided court, and reversed in the House of Lords, but on another question. It is, however, a decision that no such case had ever been sustained at common law.

In Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 631, it was held that the action would not lie at common law, and it was only allowed in Ohio by the Statute that gave the wife a right of action for all violations of or injury to the wife's "personal rights." Judge Cooley said he could see "no reason why such an action might not exist, when the Statute allowed her to sue for personal wrongs." Cooley, Torta, 238.

"Personal rights" are not rights of person. The latter are physical, and the former are relative and general, and embrace all the rights any person may have and all the wrongs he may suffer. The court held correctly that the right to the society of her husband was a personal right, under the Statute. It was so held also in Clark v. Harlan, 1 Cin. Super. Ct. Rep. 418. It is said in the opinion that the wife had no such right at common law as a personal right, and therefore she could not sue, but she may by force of the Statute.

But it was held in Mulford v. Clewell, 21 Ohio St. 191, that, under the Statute that allowed the wife to sue for "injury to her property or person," she could not bring this action for the consortium of her husband, nor at common law.

In many cases, as in Ashby v. White, supra, it has been held that the action might be brought, because there should be "no wrong without a remedy," as Chief Justice Holt said in that case. But we must not forget that to entice away her husband was no wrong to the wife, and she had no right to his society, and the damages, if any, belonged to him at common law.

In Van Arman v. Ayers, 67 Barb. 544, it was held that the action would not lie at common law, nor under the Statute, "for injury to her person and character," or her separate property.

In Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun. 40, it was held that the action would lie under the Statute of "Civil Procedure," but not at common law.

In Breiman v. Pasack, 7 Abb. N. C. 249, it was held that the action would lie, if not under the Statute, under the authority of Lynch v. Knight, supra, since the wife's disability to sue alone had been removed.

In Baker v. Baker, 16 Abb. N. C. 203, the right is predicated upon the wife's separate property, and the right to sue for injury to her person and character.

In Logan v. Logan, 77 Ind. 559, the action by the wife was for defamation, and she counted per quod for loss of the society of her husband. It was held that she might bring the action under the Statute, of "injury to her person or character," but it could not be extended for loss of the society of her husband.

In Calloway v. Laydon, 47 Iowa, 456, an action under the Liquor Law like ours in chapter 137, Laws 1879, in which the wife might recover "for injury to her person, property or means of support, and for all damages sustained, and for exemplary damages," it was held that she could not recover for the loss of her husband's society. And so in Frans v. Tripp, 70 Ill. 508, and in Casfroy v. Stark, 73 Ill. 187, and in Mulford v. Clewell, supra.

The recent case of Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L. R. A. 829, is sustained by the authority of Lynch v. Knight, supra, and on the ground that the wife is in a condition of perfect equality with her husband, and "her right is the same as his in kind, degree and value." It is said that even if the damages go to the husband, he would hold them as trustee for the wife. This case would be of greater authority if the expressions of the wife's absolute equality with her husband were less general, sweeping and unlimited.

The still more recent case of Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 553, holds that the action will lie at common law, and cites Lynch v. Knight, supra, and under the statutes which allow her to recover for "injury to her person or character," and give her separate property. It is held, in the leading opinion, that the wife can sue alone for all injuries to her person, and the damages recovered will belong to her.

It will be seen that there is very little conclusive authority on this question by the decisions of the courts in this country or in England. The doctrine may be said to be unsettled. Those courts which hold that the action will lie at common law do so because the Statute has placed the wife on an equality with the husband or removed her disabilities. This would seem to imply that the action would not lie at common law, but by Statute. Other courts hold that the right of action existed at common law, and would therefore lie as soon as the Statute removed the wife's disability to sue alone. The question may be said to be a new one in this court, although the effect of some of our decisions may have a direct bearing upon it.

The case of Peterson v. Knoble, 35 Wis. 60, was an action under the Liquor Law, commonly called the "Graham Law," to recover for injury to the "person, property or means of support" of the wife. The husband was made drunk, and turned his wife out of doors. The question was raised whether injury to her feelings and for the indignity could be recovered in the action. The court cites Mulford v. Clewell, supra, as holding that nothing could be recovered, except for actual violence, or physical injury to the person or health, not even for her disgrace or loss of society of her husband, and, while approving that case, holds that for injury to the feelings, and for the indignity, she may recover, because it is a part of the actual damages in the action, and connected with the injury to her person, and because "exemplary damages" may also be recovered under the Statute. This limitation to the actual damages for the physical injury would seem to imply that the loss of her husband's society could not be recovered for under the Statute. The cases in Ohio and Illinois, under the same law, hold that damages for the loss of her husband's society cannot be recovered, as we have seen.

The case of Dillon v. Linder, 30 Wis. 344, was brought under the same Statute (chap. 127, Laws 1873). While it was pending, and before trial, chap. 179, Laws 1874, repealing the above chapter, was passed, and the question was whether, by such repeal, the action was defeated or abated, or saved by § 23, chap. 119, Rev. Stat. 1858, now § 4974, Rev. Stat. It was held, Chief Justice Ryan writing the opinion, that the section referred to related only to "new forms of remedy for old rights," and that the Statute created the cause of action itself, and that the repeal took away the right of action, and that was not saved by the Statute, and was therefore gone. The important and pertinent effect of this decision is that the Statute created the cause of action or right of action to recover damages by reason of any person causing, through drunkenness of the husband, any injury to the wife's "person, property or means of support, and any damages sustained, and exemplary damages."

Then it follows that such a cause of action or right of action did not exist at common law, but is purely statutory. If, then, such damages could not be recovered at common law, much less could a more remote and speculative class of damages, for the loss of the husband's society by such means, be recovered at common law, or without a statute creating such a cause of action or right of action. It follows also, as before said, that the right of action of the wife, in such a case, did not exist at common law. It was not a mere common-law disability to bring the action. The only two statutes now in force in this State allowing the wife to bring an action alone, and to have the damages recovered her own separate property, are said chapter 179, Laws 1874 (Rev. Stat. § 1560), which gives her an action against any person who causes, through the drunkenness of the husband, "injury to her person, property or means of support;" and chapter 90, Laws 1881, which gives her an action for any "injury to her person or character." According to common reason and the decided weight of authority, neither of these Statutes gives the wife any right of action for the consortium of her husband. The loss of her husband's society is not an injury to her person, property, means of support or character, and such an action cannot be forced, within the terms or spirit of the statutes, by the most strained and liberal construction. Such a right of action does not exist by law, nor can it be inferred from the ameliorated and changed conditions of the wife, and her equality with her husband, produced by modern legislation in her behalf. Whatever equality of rights with her husband she may have it is not proper to say that "her right to the society of her husband is the same in kind, degree and value as his right to her society." There are natural and unchangeable conditions of husband and wife that make that right radically unequal and different. The wife is more domestic, and is supposed to have the personal care of the household, and her duties in the domestic economy require her to be more constantly at home, where the husband may nearly always expect to find her, and enjoy her society. She is purer and better by nature than her husband, and more governed by principle and a sense of duty and right, and she seldom violates her marriage obligations or abandons her home, or denies to her husband the comforts and advantages of her society by any inducement or influence of others, without just cause. Actions against others for enticing her away from her home and her husband's society are not frequent. She is protected from such wrong, not only by her integrity of character, but by greater love for her family and the comforts and genial influences of home life. With the husband the case is different. He may not be his wife's superior in the sense of the common law, or in anything, and may be her inferior in many things, but he is charged with the duty of providing for, maintaining and protecting his wife and family. He is engaged, for this purpose, in the business and various employments of the outside world, that must necessarily more or less deprive his wife of his society. The exigencies of even his legitimate business may keep him away from her and his home for months or years. He is exposed to the temptations, enticements and allurements of the world, which easily withdraw him from her society, or cause him to desert or abandon her. Others may entice or induce him to do many things, for business or pleasure, which may deprive his wife of his society. The wife had reason to expect all these things when she entered the marriage relation, and her right to his society has all these conditions, and is not the same in "degree and value" as his right to hers. For these reasons and many others, if actions by the husband for the loss of the society of his wife are not frequent, actions by the wife for the loss of his society would be numberless. This right of action in the wife would be the most fruitful source of litigation of any that can be thought of. The loss of his society need not be permanent for a cause of action. For a longer or shorter time, if caused by improper inducements or enticements, the right would accrue. There would seem to be very good reason why this right of action should be denied. The justice and advantages of such an action are at least doubtful. For these reasons, this action cannot be sustained on the ground of the wife's equality in right, or of "a remedy for every wrong," or of the coincidence of "injury and damage," or of the constitutional right of a remedy for "injury to person, property or character." The right is at least so doubtful that the courts may well await a direct Act of the Legislature conferring it. There are questions of public policy and expediency involved that may well be considered by the Legislature. The court should have sustained the objection of the defendant to any evidence under the complaint on the ground that it did not state a cause of action.

The judgment of the Superior Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the complaint.

Casseday, J., dissenting:

I am not prepared to give my assent to the opinion of the court filed in this case. There seems to be high authority for saying that at common law an action for damages could be maintained for the alienation and loss of the affection and society of the husband from his wife. Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577; Barnett v. Bassett, 20 Ill. App. 548; Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L. R. A. 829; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 534, 6 L. R. A. 553, affirming 41 Hun, 640, and Mehrhoff v. Mehrhoff, 26 Fed. Rep. 13.

In such action, however, it was necessary for the husband to join, as it was said, for conformity's sake. Ibid.

So, in an action for damages for a tortious injury to the wife, it was held necessary in this State, prior to the recent Statute on the subject, for both husband and wife to join in the action. Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23; Mease v. Fond du Lac, 48 Wis. 323; Shanahan v. Madison, 57 Wis. 276.

But, in addition to the rights of property and business previously possessed, "chapter 99, Laws 1881, gave to a married woman, as though she were sole, the right to maintain an action for any injury to her person or character, and took from the husband all right to or control over such action, and all right to or interest in any judgment recovered therein." Shanahan v. Madison, supra.

Prior to that enactment, such action, for personal injury to the wife, if brought in her own name alone, could only be defeated on such ground, by showing the fact of such marriage in abatement, and then proving the same. McLimans v. Lancaster, 63 Wis. 596.

That action was commenced in the name of the wife alone, some time prior to that Statute, but no objection on that ground was taken by plea in abatement or otherwise, until after two trials at the circuit court and the case had been brought to this court on a second appeal; and it was held in effect that the irregularity in commencing the suit in the name of the wife alone was cured by that Statute. In so holding, this court followed Weldon v. Winslow, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 786, where Brett, M. R., speaking for the court, said: "For such a cause of action no action could ever have been brought by the husband alone without joining his wife as a plaintiff. . . . The injury to the wife was the meritorious cause of action, and, if she had died before the commencement of the action, the husband would not have been entitled to sue. If damages should be given, they would belong, in the first place, to the wife alone; and if they should not be reduced to possession by the husband, and he should die, the damages would be hers, and would not go to his executors." McLimans v. Lancaster, 63 Wis. 600.

In that case the right of action had been created and given by Statute.

In this State it has frequently been held that compensatory damages include mental suffering, and that no distinction is to be made between other forms of mental suffering and that which consists in a sense of wrong or insult arising from an act really or apparently dictated by a spirit of willful injustice, or by a deliberate intention to vex, degrade or insult. Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 658; Grace v. Dempsey, 75 Wis. 323, and cases there cited.

Within the rulings of this court in the cases cited, no good reason is perceived why this action is not maintainable; especially is this so if such right of action existed in favor of the husband and wife jointly at common law, as indicated in the authorities cited. I have not had the time to verify, by careful examination, whether that is so or not.

James HAMMELL, App'l.

(63 Cal. 547.)

1. A surety who merely gives his note for his share of the original debt to a co-surety, who has paid the debt, does not thereby acquire any right of action against his principal; at least where any cause of action against the latter in favor of the co-surety was barred by time.
2. After a cause of action against the principal debtor is barred a surety, as to whom the Statute has not run because he has been absent from the State, cannot acquire any right of action against the principal by payment of the demand.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Santa Barbara

*An opinion was handed down in this case on September 2, 1889, affirming the judgment of the lower court. After re-argument the judgment was reversed and the opinion filed which is given herewith, and the former opinion thereby rendered useless, in consequence of which it is omitted. (Rep.)

3 L. R. A.

County in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought by a surety upon a promissory note to recover from his principal the amount of certain promissory notes which he had given a co-surety in satisfaction of a claim for contribution towards the payment of the original note. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. W. S. Bouton and Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellant:

The Statute having commenced to run against the remedy of Newell for contribution from Stone, before his departure from the State, Newell's remedy for contribution against Stone was barred July 1, 1880.

An action upon a contract obligation or liability, not founded upon an instrument in writing, is barred in two years.

When the Statute begins to run, a subsequent disability does not stop it.

Quincy v. Hall, 19 Cal. 98; Crosby v. Doud, 61 Cal. 597.

A cause of action against the principal debtor does not accrue to the surety till the surety has paid the debt.

Mr. B. P. Thomas for respondent.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After further consideration, upon argument on rehearing, we are satisfied that the judgment in this case should be reversed.

The plaintiff, with three other persons,—Newell, Hamilton and Hayman,—were sureties on a promissory note made by defendant, Hammell, to one Byron Stevens for $3,000, dated July 1, 1877, and payable one year after date. Plaintiff claims that one of said sureties, Newell, paid on said note something over $2,000, and that plaintiff paid to Newell, as his pro rata contributive share, $1,000, and this action was brought to recover said $1,000 of defendant, the principal on the note. There are a number of interesting questions in the case, which, under the views which we take of it, need not be determined. For instance, defendant contends that he gave a mortgage to the sureties to secure them, and that the mortgage should have been foreclosed, and that the mortgaged property was sufficient in value to satisfy the note; that defendant was discharged from the liability sued on by a decree in insolvency; and that the $1,000 was more than plaintiff's contributive share. We will assume, however, that the property was not held by way of mortgage, and was faithfully applied by Newell, as far as it would go, to the payment of the note; that the decree in insolvency did not include the liability sued on; and that $1,000 was the correct amount of plaintiff's contributive share.

It is not averred in the complaint, or found by the court, that the plaintiff, Stone, ever paid to his co-surety Newell any money, or gave him any property, in satisfaction of Newell's claim for contribution. The only averment on the subject is as follows: "That on the 1st of March, 1884, this plaintiff, in full satisfaction of the amount of money which he should contribute to said P. N. Newell for his aforesaid payments on the aforesaid note, made, executed and delivered to said P. N. Newell his promissory notes in the sum of $1,000, whereupon the said P. N. Newell gave to plaintiff his receipt in full for plaintiff's liability to contribute to him for the aforesaid payments on said promissory note."

This is not a very clear averment that Newell took the notes in absolute payment of his former claim, but we will assume it to be sufficient for that purpose. There is no averment that plaintiff ever paid the notes, or any part of either of them. It appears from the findings that they were payable two years after date, and would not mature until more than a year after this action was commenced. The court below held that the giving of these notes, and their acceptance as payment by Newell, constituted a cause of action in favor of plaintiff against defendant. In this holding, under the facts in the case at bar, at least, the court, in our opinion, erred. The general rule is, undoubtedly, that a surety can recover of the principal only the amount or value which the surety has actually paid. If he has paid in depreciated bank notes taken at par, he can recover only the actual value of the bank notes so paid and received. If he has paid in property, he can recover only the value of the property. If he has compromised, he can recover only what the compromise cost him. The rule is that he shall not be allowed to "speculate out of his principal." Brandt, Sur. § 183, and cases there cited; Estate of Hill, 67 Cal. 243.

There is authority, however, and perhaps a preponderance of authority, to the point that if a surety, by giving his negotiable promissory note, satisfies the claim of the creditor, and extinguishes the debt of the principal to the creditor, he may recover from the principal the amount of the debt without showing that he has paid his promissory note. Brandt, Sur. § 181, and cases cited.

But the authorities are not uniform upon the subject. In Indiana and North Carolina, and some other States, it is held that the surety cannot recover of the principal until he has paid the money, and that the giving of a note is not sufficient. Brianinas v. Martin, 1 Ired. L. 296; Newland v. Martin, Id. 307; Romine v. Romine, 59 Ind. 851, and cases there cited.

Many of the cases hold that, if the surety discharges the debt by a negotiable note, he can maintain an action against the principal, while, if he does so by means of a bond, or any non-negotiable instrument, he cannot, upon the theory that a negotiable note is analogous to money,—a distinction which is founded upon no apparent good reason. Houlis v. Robinson, 8 Tex. 327, 58 Am. Dec. 117; Peters v. Barakill, 1 Hill, L. 287.

The rule is founded on the reason that if the surety, by giving his own obligation, discharges the original debt of the principal, the latter is as much benefited as if he had discharged it by actually paying the money. Its weakness lies in the possibility of the surety recovering the whole amount of the principal, and never paying his own note, thus violating the cardinal rule that the surety shall not speculate out of the principal. But, if we assume the rule to be as first above stated, it is not so clearly commendable as to deserve pushing further than adjudicated cases have already carried it, and in all cases to which our attention has been called the rule has been enforced against the principal in favor only of the surety who has extinguished the debt to the original creditor. We have seen no case in which the rule has been applied to a surety who had not satisfied the original debt, but had only given his note to another surety, who had satisfied it. Moreover, the reason of the rule, if it be held to be the rule, is that the principal is benefited to the extent of the original debt or liability which has been extinguished by the new obligation of the surety, and the reason ceases when there is no such benefit. Now, in the case at bar, defendant was in no manner benefited by the notes given by plaintiff to Newell, nor was any debt or liability of defendant thereby extinguished, because, at the time the notes were given, there was no legal liability from the defendant to Newell, for the reason that any cause of action which the latter might have had against the defendant for moneys which he had paid to Byron Stevens had long been barred by the Statute of Limitations. The last payment made by Newell on the note to Stevens, as averred and found, was on January 10, 1881; and, as his cause of action for the payments which he had made was not "founded on a written instrument," it was barred in two years,—that is, on January 10, 1883. Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 186.

But plaintiff did not give his notes to Newell until March 1, 1884. At that time defendant was under no legal obligation to anyone which plaintiff could discharge by giving said notes. The original note given to Stevens had itself been long since outlawed. Therefore, by giving said notes, plaintiff acquired no cause of action against the defendant herein.

We think, also, that the cause of action averred in the complaint would have been barred by the Statute of Limitations, which was pleaded by defendant, even though plaintiff, on March 1, 1884, had actually paid Newell the $1,000 in money. Plaintiff seeks to avoid the running of the Statute through the fact that, within a month after the original note to Stevens matured, he left the State, and resided out of the State for several years. His contention is that, as Newell's cause of action against him for contribution would not be barred while he remained out of the State, therefore his cause of action which he had against defendant, or which he proposed at some future time to have, by paying his contributive share to Newell, would not be barred during his absence from the State, though such absence should be for 50 years. He contends that by returning at any time, and subjecting himself to Newell's claim, and paying it, he could recover his part of it against defendant, although in the hands of Newell it had been outlawed for a quarter of a century. We do not think that the law of limitation of actions contemplates any such an anomaly. When a man leaves the State, the Statute of Limitations does not run during his absence as to any cause of action against him, but his absence does not prevent the Statute from running as to any cause of action in his favor. At any time within two years after Newell had paid the original note, plaintiff could have paid his contributive share to Newell, and maintained an action for it against defendant. But he could not wait until the whole of Newell's cause of action against defendant was barred, and then revive one half of the claim by coming back years afterwards, and making a real or pretended payment of it to Newell. The whole claim was, as to defendant, dead, and the breath of life could not be blown into one half of it by any such legal hocus-pocus.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as respondent may be advised to take.

We concur: Fox, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

Beatty, Ch. J.:

I concur. A surety who pays the debt of his principal has an undoubted right to recover the amount paid. But such is not the case here. The liability of the principal had been extinguished by the Statute of Limitations before any payment by the surety. The absence of the plaintiff from the State had kept the claim alive as to him, though it was extinguished as to the defendant. The plaintiff therefore did not pay the defendant's debt. He merely paid his own debt. By so doing, he could not possibly acquire a right of action against the defendant.

MAINE CENTRAL R. CO.

(.....Me.....)

Riding in a carriage on Sunday for exercise and for no other purpose is not a violation of the Statute in relation to the observance of the Lord's Day, which contains a prohibition against unnecessary walking or riding.

(December 28, 1888.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Overruled.

Plaintiff was riding with her brother in a carriage on one Sunday afternoon when the horse caught his foot between the planking and the rail while attempting to cross defendant's tracks and was thrown down, thus overturning the carriage and throwing both the plaintiff and her brother to the ground. She brought this action to recover damages for the injuries resulting from that fall. Defendant contended that she could not maintain the action for the reason that she was traveling on Sunday in violation of law.

Messrs. Wilson & Woodard for defendant.

Messrs. Heath & Tuell for plaintiff.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant's contention in support of the single question raised by the exceptions is founded upon the erroneous assumption that riding upon Sunday for exercise, and for no other purpose, is a violation of the Statute in relation to the observance of the Lord's Day. The Statute is not to be so construed. Such an interpretation would be contrary to the spirit as well as the letter of a statute which expressly excepts from its prohibition works of necessity or charity. Rev. Stat. chap. 124, § 20.

And this exception may properly be said to cover everything which is morally fit and proper, under the particular circumstances of the case, to be done upon the Sabbath.

Tested by this rule, our own court, in O'Connell v. Lewiston, 65 Me. 84, and Davidson v. Portland, 69 Me. 116, has held that walking out in the open air upon the Sabbath for exercise is not a violation of the Statute.

In other jurisdictions, also, it has been held not to be unlawful to ride to a funeral (Horne v. Meakin, 115 Mass. 826); walking to prepare medicine for a sick child (Gorman v. Lowell, 117 Mass. 65); riding to visit a sick sister (Cronan v. Boston, 186 Mass. 884); traveling to visit a sick friend (Doyle v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 118 Mass. 195); a servant riding to prepare needful food for her employer (King v. Savage, 121 Mass. 808); a father riding to visit his two boys (McClary v. Lowell, 44 Vt. 116); walking for exercise (Hamilton v. Boston, 14 Allen, 475), and walking partly for exercise and partly to make a social call. Barker v. Worcester, 139 Mass. 74.

The Statute was never intended as an arbitrary interference with the comfort and conduct of individuals, when necessary to the promotion of health, in walking or riding in the open air for exercise. The prohibition is against unnecessary walking or riding. As a general rule, the jury, under proper instructions from the court, must determine this question from the circumstances presented to them.

In this case we can perceive no error in the instructions, and the exceptions must be overruled.

Nor do we think the verdict should be disturbed under the motion for a new trial. A very careful examination of the evidence satisfies us that upon the questions of fact submitted to the jury no interference by this court is necessary. The plaintiff was clearly entitled to some damages. The amount awarded does not appear to be excessive.

Motions and exceptions overruled.

Peters, Ch. J., and Walton, Virgin, Emery and Haskell, JJ., concurred.

v.

James OTTAWAY et al., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

Knowledge of a warranty on a sale in which a promissory note was given for the purchase price will not affect the rights of a bona fide purchaser of such note for value before maturity, if he had no knowledge of the breach of the warranty.

(June 6, 1890.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Genesee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard & Gold, for defendants, appellants:

The burden of proof was upon plaintiff to show not only that he bought the note before maturity, but also that he was a bona fide holder without notice of defendants' equities.

Conley v. Winsor, 41 Mich. 256; Carrier v. Cameron, 81 Mich. 878; New York Iron Mine v. Citizens Bank, 44 Mich. 844.

Messrs. Durand & Carton and Ira T. Sayre for plaintiff, appellee.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to recover the amount of a promissory note dated November 15, 1887, due in one year, payable to Archibald Carmichael or bearer, for $407. The consideration for which the note was given was one span of mares and two colts, purchased by James Ottaway at an auction sale. Ottaway bid off the span of mares for $285, and the colts for $123, and gave his note for the amount. Defendants claim that at the time of sale the mares were warranted to be with foal, and, if they proved to be so, then he was to pay the further sum of $16 for the service of the horse. Plaintiff purchased the note of the payee on December 8, 1887, and paid full value for it. It turned out that the mares were not with foal. The plaintiff was present at the auction sale, and acted as clerk for Mr. Carmichael, who was confined to his house by sickness, and had general control of the auction. If the warranty was made as claimed by the defendants, plaintiff was fully aware of it at the time. No question is made that the mares were not served with the horse in the proper season. Defendants claim to have become satisfied that the mares were not with foal in the spring or summer following. The plaintiff denied that the sale was with the warranty claimed by defendants.

The first question to be decided is whether, conceding there was a warranty, it can be set up in recoupment of damages against the notes in plaintiff's hand. Restating the facts for the purposes of this question, it presents a case where no fact exists which impugns the title of the holder, nor the honesty, good faith or validity of the original transaction of which the note was a part. There was simply a warranty on the sale that the mares were with foal, and, if they proved to be so, the purchaser was to pay $16 more for the service of the horse. The purchase of the note was for full value, with a knowledge of the warranty, but without knowledge of its breach before the note matured, and before it was known that there would be a breach. The promise of the defendants was not conditioned; neither was there fraud nor imposition connected with the inception of the note. The plaintiff, having paid value before maturity, held the note by an independent title.

It was said by this court in Nichols v. Sober, 88 Mich. 681, that "the law has always been solicitous to exclude any rules calculated to hinder the free circulation of mercantile paper having legitimate inception, as in this case; and it is settled in this State that a transferee cannot be deprived of his right as a bona fide holder in this class of cases, except upon evidence sufficient to show his participation in the fraud, or equivalent misconduct of the party who transfers to him."

It is laid down by Parsons on Bills and Notes (vol. 1, p. 261) that "knowledge on the part of the holder, at the time he took the note, that it was not to be paid on a specified contingency, is not sufficient to defeat his right to recover, although the contingency had then happened, if he was ignorant of this fact,"—citing Adams v. Smith, 35 Me. 824; Ferdon v. Jones, 2 E. D. Smith, 106; Davis v. McCready, 4 E. D. Smith, 565. See also Kraus v. Frye, 4 Bibb, 408; Dow v. Tuttle, 4 Mass. 414; State Nat. Bank v. Cason, 89 La. Ann. 885; Patten v. Gleason, 106 Mass. 489; Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 280; Craig v. Silbitt, 15 Pa. 238; Bond v. Wiltse, 12 Wis. 612.

From the foregoing authorities, and upon reason, the correct doctrine appears to be that it is not a good ground of defense against a bona fide holder for value that he was informed that the note was made in consideration of an executory contract, unless he was also informed of its breach. If he had knowledge of the breach, the defense may be interposed. Wagner v. Diedrich, 50 Mo. 484; Coffman v. Wilson, 2 Met. (Ky.) 542; Bowman v. Van Kuren, 29 Wis. 218; Butten v. Beckwith, 68 Mich. 303, 12 West. Rep. 647.

The note in question being valid in its inception, and not subject to any condition, a collateral agreement to warrant the mare to be with foal cannot be set up as a defense to the action in this case, where the plaintiff purchased in good faith for value, and without notice or knowledge of any breach of the warranty. A mere collateral agreement or warranty made at the time the note was given does not affect the validity or negotiability of the note, although the purchaser before maturity may know of such agreement. It is common knowledge that in many executory contracts, involving large sums of money, such as drafts drawn against bills of lading, and also such as the purchase of real estate, lumbering contracts, construction of buildings and roads, and other business dealings, notes are given, and often negotiated to those familiar with the terms of the contracts; and it would unnecessarily hamper the transfer of such paper, and affect its value injuriously, to hold that the purchaser, before breach of such contract, although he had notice of the contract under which it was given, takes such paper subject to any damages that may arise to the maker from failure of the payee to perform such contract. There is neither reason nor necessity for so holding. Indeed, the defendants in this case set up in their notice of defense the warranty and its breach, and that plaintiff purchased the note with knowledge of such warranty and its breach before he so purchased. The jury found, in answer to a special question, that the plaintiff, George Miller, bought the note in question of Archibald Carmichael before his death; and it was in proof that he died January 6, 1888. This is an end of the case. The defense is not made out, and it is immaterial if testimony tending to show a warranty by Carmichael was erroneously ruled out. Under the special finding, which has the force of a special verdict, no other general verdict could have been rendered by the jury than the one they did.

The judgment must be affirmed.

The other Justices concurred.

1. The creation of a public road through land of a private owner does not divest him of the fee, but gives the public merely a right of way.

2. The Act of February 10, 1880, authorizing a telegraph company to construct a line along county roads, provided the ordinary use of the road was not obstructed, does not give any right to build such line without compensation to the owner of the fee. ERROR to the Circuit Court for New Kent County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the erection by defendant of telegraph poles, etc., upon a highway in which plaintiff claimed to own the fee. Affirmed.

Lacy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of New Kent County rendered on the 30th day of October, 1888. The plaintiff in error constructed its telegraph line upon the county road in New Kent County, where the said road ran over the lands of the defendant in error, without his consent, and without condemnation proceedings, and without tendering compensation, and refusing to pay compensation, therefor. As is alleged in the declaration, the defendant, "against the will of the plaintiff, and violently, against the protest of the plaintiff, entered upon the said land, and cut down and destroyed the trees and underwood,—fifty pine trees, twenty oak trees, and other trees, of the value of $1,050,—and broke down and prostrated a great part of the fences of the said plaintiff, and dug holes in the land of the plaintiff, and put posts there and kept the same there, etc., and incumbered the land, and hindered the plaintiff in the free use and enjoyment thereof." The defendant pleaded "Not guilty," and moved the court to remove the case to the federal court, which motion to remove the case the court overruled, and the case proceeded to a trial, and upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $550, upon which judgment was rendered accordingly, whereupon the defendant, the plaintiff in error here, applied for and obtained a writ of error to this court.

There were sundry exceptions taken at the trial which were assigned as error here. The first assignment which we will consider is as to the refusal of the court to give to the jury certain instructions asked by the defendant, and the giving by the court of certain other instructions.

The plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury to the following effect: That, "if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was, at the time of the committing of the alleged trespass in the declaration mentioned, and still is, a telegraph company chartered by this or any other State, and that the road along which it has constructed and maintained, and still is maintaining, its telegraph line in the County of New Kent, was at said time, and still is, a county road, then the said defendant had at said time, and still has, the right to construct and maintain its said line along said county road, upon any part thereof, to the width or extent of thirty feet, whether the road-bed actually used by the public was and is of such width or not, provided the ordinary use of said road be not thereby obstructed, and said defendant had at said time, and still has, the right to cut down and trim out such trees or limbs, within such width or extent of thirty feet, as might interfere with the proper and effective construction, maintenance and operation of its said line. (2) For the exercise of such right as aforesaid, the defendant is not required to obtain permission from, or to make compensation to, the owner or owners of the land upon which said road is located, whether the fee-simple title to the soil upon which the road is located, or the mere easement thereon, be vested in the public. (3) The jury are further instructed that, although the road bed of said road actually used by the public may not be or have been of the width of thirty feet, and although the overseer of said road may not have complied with the law in keeping said road clear and smooth, and free from obstructions, to the legally required width of thirty feet, yet, under the laws and statutes of the Commonwealth, the defendant Company was authorized to use any part of said legal road of thirty feet to the same extent as if said overseer had strictly complied with the provisions of law requiring him to keep said road soil and freehold revert to the owner, who cannot be compelled to return the price paid for the easement. Westbrook v. North, 2 Ma. 179; Nicholson v. Stockott, Walker (Mass.) 31; Hampton v. Coffin, 4 N. H. 517; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 108; San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 48 Cal. 489; Brown v. Freeman, 1 Root (Conn.) 118; Buel v. Clark, 14 40; *Morris v. Construction of telegraph lines, an additional servitude.

The construction of a telegraph and telephone line on a railroad company's right of way imposes an additional servitude or burden on the land, for which the owners are entitled to compensation. See note to Baltimore City Am. Tel. & Teleph. Co. v. Smith (Md.): 1 L. R. A. 203, and note.

The petition for the assessment of damages caused by telegraph poles must indicate the class of the poles to be erected and the positions in which they will be placed. State v. New York & N. J. Tel. & Teleph. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 229, 40 N. J. L. 424.

clear of timber and other obstructions to the required width, and the whole thirty feet been actually used by the public as a road."

But the court refused to give these instructions of the defendant, and gave the following: "(1) The court instructs the jury that the law presumes that the ownership of lands along the side of a public road in Virginia extends to the middle of said road, and the burden of proof is on the party who claims otherwise to show that such is not the case along the road where the right is controverted, and the owner has the exclusive right to the soil, subject to its use for the purposes of the public, and to the right of passage of the public over the same, and, being owners of the soil, they have a right to all of the ordinary remedies for disturbing of, or injury to, their freehold or possession, and any Act of the Legislature which devests such owners of their rights is unconstitutional and void. (2) The fact that a road is a public road or highway does not authorize the digging of holes for the purpose of erecting telegraph posts, and the erecting of posts, and the establishing a telegraph line, over the lands of a person, without his consent, although the same may be erected or done on that part of his premises which is used as a public road."

It thus appears that the claim of the defendant is that, by reason of the Act of Assembly of February 10, 1869 (Acts 1879-80, pp 53, 54), it was authorized to construct its telegraph poles and line along the land over which the county road runs, without making compensation therefor, and that it maintains its right to exercise, as to these lands, the right of eminent domain thereon,—to take and enjoy what belongs to another, in the exercise of the sovereign power, not only without making any compensation therefor, but without any formal proceedings looking to condemnation of this property under any of the forms of law whatever.

If it is once conceded, or in any wise established, that the land in question belonged to the plaintiff, it was his private property, his freehold; as entirely his own, throughout all its parts, as the shelter which he had erected around and over his hearthstone, for his habitation and home, and as entirely under the protection of the laws against intrusion as the very hearthstone itself. That these lands are the lands of the plaintiff, unless he has lost them by the creation of a public road across them, is undeniable,—is, indeed, not denied. Does the creation of a public road through the land divest him of the fee in the same?

As to the extent of the right acquired by the public upon opening a highway in Virginia, Mr. Minor, in his Institutes (vol. 1, p. 120), says: "The public acquires merely a right of passage. The freehold and all the profits of the soil (that is, trees, mines, etc.) belong still to the proprietor from whom the right of passage was acquired. He may therefore recover the freehold in ejectment, subject to the right of way, and may maintain an action of trespass for digging the ground. If it be unknown from which of two adjacent proprietors a highway was at first taken, or if the highway be the boundary between them, they are understood to own each ad medium flum. vis."—citing Baron, Abr. Highways, 5; Belling v. Peterburg, 3 Rand. (Va.) 500; Horne v. Richards, 4 Call (Va.) 441; Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 25 [9 L. ed 533].

And this subject is again referred to by Mr. Minor in his second volume, p. 20, as to the ownership of land adjacent to highways, when he says, "The ownership usually extends to the middle of the road, as in the case of a private stream; or, if the same party owns on both sides, the whole road belongs to him, subject to the public easement of the right of passage in either case,—citing 3 Kent, Com. 453."

In the case of Horne v. Richards, supra, all the judges delivered opinions, and all held that the grant of the right of way does not convey the soil, but only the right to a way over.

In the case of Belling v. Peterburg, supra,—a case fully and ably argued in this court by the foremost lawyers of that day,—Judge Carr delivered the unanimous opinion of the court. Speaking as to the public highway, he said: "Does this disable the demandant from recovering the land? It certainly would not in England, as many cases show,"—citing Ladb v. Shepherd, 3 Strange, 1004.

In that case the defendant rented one end of a bridge upon the highway. Upon trespass brought, the court said: "It is certainly a dedication to the public so far as the public has occasion for it, which is only for a right of passage, but it never was understood to be a transfer of the absolute property in the soil."

In Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr. 140, in ejectment, a special verdict finding that the land was a public street and public highway, Lord Mansfield says: "1 Rolle, Abr. 399, is express 'that the king has nothing but the passage for himself and his people, but the freehold, and all profits, belong to the owner of the soil.' So do all the trees upon it, and mines under it. . . . The owner may get his soil discharged of this servitude or easement of a way over it by a writ of ad quod damnum. It is like the property in a market or fair. There is no reason why he should not have a right to all remedies for the freehold, subject still, indeed, to the servitude or easement. . . . An action of trespass would lie for an injury done to it. . . . I see no ground why the owner of the soil may not bring ejectment as well as trespass." Northampton v. Ward, 1 Wilson, 107; Harrison v. Parker, 3 East, 154.

But it is said that in this country we act on a more liberal scale; that the court will look to the great principles of public policy and give them effect; that, the conveniences of the community requiring highways, they must be had; and, as a mere right of way is not sufficient for the full enjoyment of them, we must consider the Commonwealth as vested with a base fee in all public highways.

Our business is with the law as it is; and, where the power to be exercised is one of so important a character as the taking away the property of a citizen, divesting him of his eminent domain in the soil, I could not consent to take the step unless I saw myself justified by some clear principle of the common law, or some plain enactment of the statute. The English cases are pretty strong evidence that the common law confers no such power. I have looked into our statutes, and I can find nothing there to countenance the idea that where a road is established the fee in the soil, either simple or base, is vested in the Commonwealth. On the contrary, I think it is obvious that a right of way is all that the public requires, leaving the whole fee in the owner of the soil. It is for the use of the land by the Commonwealth that the owner is compensated. There can be no question as to what the law is in this State. It is well settled.

In Warwick v. Mayo, 15 Gratt. 528, Judge Allen delivered the unanimous opinion of this court to the same effect. Speaking of a highway, he says "The easement comprehends no interest in the soil," and cites Judge Swift as saying, in Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 108: "The right of freehold is not touched by establishing a highway, but continues in the original owner of the land in the same manner it was before the highway was established, subject to the easement." He says, further: "Notwithstanding the easement, the owner retains many and valuable interests. . . . He may make any use of it not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the easement." Hare & Wallace's notes to Doraston v. Payne, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. *100, where the authorities are collected.

After speaking of the English rule, and the decisions of some of the States, he says: "In Virginia the rule has been established by an authoritative decision of the very point in accordance with the settled doctrine of the English courts,"—and refers to Belling v. Petersburg, supra.

If these principles are thus settled in Virginia, as they certainly are, they are equally as firmly imbedded in the jurisprudence of numerous other States of this country. These are collected and cited by Mr. Angell in his work on Highways, p. 286, § 301 et seq., and notes. At page 298, § 303, this author says: "The principles of the common law in this respect have been recognized and adopted by the American courts,"—citing Parley v. Chandler, 4 Mass. 454.

Under these principles the plaintiff was entitled to maintain trespass against the defendant when the said defendant stopped upon his land, instead of passing along, and dug up his soil, and cut down his trees, and tore down and scattered his fence, unless such taking of his property was by due process of law, for public use, upon just compensation. If the use for which the land was taken was a private use, it could not be lawfully taken without his consent. But the use may be conceded to be a public use, and yet to take without just compensation was unlawful. Such taking without authority of law was a trespass, and such taking could find no justification in any Act of the General Assembly. Art. 5, § 14, Const. Va.

It is claimed that the Act of Assembly passed February 10, 1860 (Acts 1859-60), authorized this Company to so construct its works upon the land of the plaintiff. That Act should receive a reasonable construction, and be so construed, if possible, as to avoid repugnance to the Constitution; and while, by that Act, these companies are authorized to construct their lines and fixtures along the county roads, provided the ordinary use of the road was not obstructed, it is not expressly provided that this may be done without compensation. But the provision is so as not to obstruct the ordinary use. The Commonwealth had and has in these roads nothing but the use to pass over and along, and the Act provides that this use shall not be obstructed by virtue of that Act. But at the conclusion of this paragraph, constituting the last words in it, are these words, "upon making just compensation therefor," and then follow the provisions of the law which provide for the proceedings necessary to ascertain what is just compensation by condemnation proceedings. This was certainly the provision of the Act as to lands of persons generally; and, if the land upon which the highway runs is the private property of the citizen, which it clearly is, should not this language be held to apply to such land as well as to others? Why not? The Commonwealth has no more power to grant the one than the other. To grant either is to take private property, and this can only be done upon just compensation. If this is the true construction of this Act, the same is in accordance with the Constitution of the State; and the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his suit against a corporation which neither took lawfully, nor paid just compensation. But if the Act does provide for the taking of this private property without compensation, then it is void for repugnancy to the Constitution of the State, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover and the instruction of the court was right.

However, it is claimed by the plaintiff in error that, granting that the rights of the plaintiff are what we have stated, and the Commonwealth has only the right to use by going over, still his case is good, because his works are only a use of the easement, and constitute no new taking,—no additional servitude. We will now briefly consider this argument.

The right in the Commonwealth is to use by going along over. This is the extent of the right. If the right was granted to the defendant to go over simply to carry his messages, then the right granted was in existence before the grant, and the right to go over is not only not disputed, but distinctly admitted. This is the servitude over the land fixed upon it by law, and the whole extent of it. If anything more is taken, it is an additional servitude, and is a taking of the property, within the meaning of the Constitution. To take the whole subject,—the land in fee, is a taking. This, however, is the meaning of the term only in a limited sense, and in the narrowest sense of the word. The constitutional provision which declares that property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation was intended to establish this principle beyond legislative control, and it is not necessary that property should be absolutely taken, in the sense of completely taking, to bring a case within the protection of the Constitution. As was said by a learned justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: "It would be a very curious and unsatisfactory result, if, in construing a provision of constitutional law always understood to have been adopted for protection and security to the rights of the individual as against the government, and which has received the commendation of jurists, statesmen and commentators, as placing the just principles of the common law on that subject beyond the power of ordinary legislation to change or control them, it shall be held that, if the government refrains from the absolute conversion of real property to the uses of the public, it can destroy its value entirely; can inflict irreparable and permanent injury to any extent; can, in effect, subject it to total destruction,—without making any compensation, because, in the narrowest sense of that word, it is not taken for the public use. Such a construction would pervert the constitutional provision into a restriction upon the rights of the citizen, as those rights stood at the common law, instead of the government, and make it an authority for invasion of private right under the pretext of the public good, which had no warrant in the laws and practices of our ancestors." Justice Miller in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 90 U. S. 18 Wall. 166 (30 L. ed. 557).

It is obvious, and it is so held in many cases, that the construction of a railroad upon a highway is an additional servitude upon the land, for which the owner is entitled to additional compensation. Cooley, Const. Lim. 548; Ford v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 14 Wis. 616; Pomeroy v. Milwaukee & O. R. Co. 16 Wis. 641.

And the power of a Legislature to authorize a railroad to be constructed on a common highway is denied upon the ground that the original appropriation permitted the taking for the purposes of a common highway, and no other. The principle is the same when the land is taken for any other purpose distinct from the original purpose, and the reasoning in the two cases is applicable to each.

In the case of Imlay v. Union Branch R. Co., 26 Conn. 255, it is said: "When land is condemned for a special purpose, on the score of public utility, the sequestration is limited to that particular use. Land taken for a highway is not thereby convertible into a common. As the property is not taken, but the use only, the right of the public is limited to the use—the specific use—for which the proprietor has been divested of a complete dominion over his own estate. These are propositions which are no longer open to discussion." Nicholson v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 85; South Carolina R. Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 548.

In the case of a telephone company, the chancellor, in the case of Brooms v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 141, 5 Cent. Rep. 814, held that, in order to justify a telephone company in setting up poles in the highway, it must show that it has acquired the right to do so, either by contract or condemnation, from the owner of the soil, saying: "The complainant seeks relief against an invasion of his proprietary right to his land. The defendants, a telephone company, without any leave or license from, or consent by, him, but, on the other hand, against his protest and remonstrance, and in disregard of his warning and express prohibition, and without condemnation, or any steps to that end, set up their poles upon his land. . . . What has been said is sufficient of itself to establish the right of the complainant to relief; for, in order to justify the defendants in setting up the poles, it is necessary for them to show that they have acquired the right to do so, either by consent or condemnation, from the owner of the soil." As to these rights of the owner of the soil, see 9 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, title Highways, 7, § 2; Board of Trade Tel. Co. v. Barnett, 107

Ill. 508; Southwestern R. Co. v. Southern & A. Teleph. Co. 44 Ga. 48; W. U. Teleph. Co. v. Rich, 19 Kan. 617; Willie v. Erie Teleph. & Teleph. Co. 87 Minn. 847.

That the erection of a telegraph line upon a highway is an additional servitude is clear from the authorities. That it is such is equally clear upon principle, in the light of the Virginia cases cited above. If the right acquired by the Commonwealth is the condemnation of a highway is only the right to pass along over the highway for the public, then, if the untaken parts of the land are his private property, to dig up the soil is to dig up his soil, to cut down the trees is to cut down his trees; to destroy the fences is to destroy his fences; to erect any structure, to affix any pole, or put it in and upon the land, is to take possession of his land; and all these interfere with his free and unrestricted use of his property. If the Commonwealth took this without just compensation, it would be a violation of the Constitution. The Commonwealth cannot constitutionally grant it to another.

It is true that the use of the Telegraph Company is a public use. That Company is a public corporation, as to which the public has rights which the law will enforce. But these public rights can only be obtained by paying for them. The use, while in one sense public, is not for the public generally. It is for the private profit of the corporation. It is its business enterprise, engaged in for gain. Its services can only be obtained upon their being paid for. There is no reason, either in law or in common justice, why it should not pay for what it needs in the prosecution of its business. Upon this burden being placed upon it, it can complain of no hardship. It is the common lot of all. If the said Company has use for the private property of a citizen of this Commonwealth, and it is of advantage to it to have the same, it is illogical to argue that the property is of small value to the plaintiff, and, in the aggregate, a great matter to the plaintiff in error. This argument is not worth considering. It cuts at the very root of the rights of property. It would apply with equal force to all the transactions of life. It is sufficient to say the ends of the Constitution is over this as over all other private property rights, and there is no power which can defeat it without just compensation.

We think the instructions of the circuit court were clearly right, and there is no error therein.

There is no error in the process in the case. It was made as provided by law against a non-resident corporation having no officer or agent resident in the county.

There was no error in the refusal of the court to remove the case from New Kent County. Not the slightest ground is shown for it. And it may be remarked that the plaintiff in error selected its forum when it thus unlawfully invaded the property rights of one of the citizens of that county.

As to the contention concerning the summoning of the jury by the sheriff, because he was interested in the suit, there is no error in that action of the court below: (1) because the sheriff does not appear to be in any wise interested in the suit; and (2) because the sheriff did not in fact select the jury. Upon objection made, the judge made out the list, and gave it to the deputy sheriff, to summon the required venire.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment appealed from, and the same must be affirmed.

Fauntleroy and Minton, JJ., concur.

Lewis, P., dissenting:

I take a very different view of the case from that taken in the opinion of the court just read; and, as the case is an important one, I will state the reasons for my dissent. I agree that the Act of February 10, 1890, does not provide for additional compensation to the owners of lands abutting on highways along which telegraph lines may be constructed, and, therefore, that the question in the case is whether, on that account, the Act is constitutional. But, before proceeding to discuss that question, I will remark that the case, as presented by the record, is quite an extraordinary one. The plaintiff sued to recover damages to the amount of $1,500. Although the assessed fee-simple value of his land abutting on the highway is only $175, yet the jury returned a verdict for $550 damages, and the alleged injury consists, as far as I can ascertain from the record, in planting a single pole, strung with wire, on so much of the highway as passes over the plaintiff's land, and "cutting trees and underwood" that grew upon the highway.—from all which the inference seems to have been drawn by the jury and the court below that, if the plaintiff's land is worth little or nothing for taxation, its value for telegraph purposes is enormous. Inasmuch, however, as no formal bill of exceptions was filed to the action of the court in overruling the defendant's motion to set aside the verdict, although the record recites that an exception was taken, and there is no certificate of the facts proven, or of the evidence, I will confine myself to the question of the constitutionality of the Act, and that depends upon whether the use of the highway for a telegraph line is a new servitude upon the soil, or whether it is included in the original appropriation. If the latter view be the correct one then there has been no taking of the plaintiff's property, within the meaning of the Constitution, under the Act in question, but simply the grant of a privilege to use a public easement, which has already been paid for, and which is subject to the regulation and control of the Legislature.

What, then, are the nature and extent of the public easement in land condemned for a highway? The plaintiff contends that it is merely a right of passage, and nothing more, and Bolling v. Petersburg, 8 Rand. (Va.) 563, is referred to in support of this position. That case, which adopts the language of the ancient authorities on the subject, does indeed so hold; and when it was decided the language used was sufficiently comprehensive to cover every then known mode of enjoying the public right. But since that time civilization has advanced. New modes of using the public highways have been discovered, and, as the common law adapts itself to the constantly changing wants and conditions of society, the courts have held—and rightly, I think—that the view contended for by the plaintiff is altogether too narrow and restricted. So that the principle, as now established, is that the highways of a State are not only open and free for travel and traffic, but that, with the assent of the Legislature, they may be devoted, under the original appropriation, to such other public uses as are consistent with their use as public thoroughfares. "The more ancient decisions," says Angell, "limited the rights of the public [in highways] to that of passage and re passage, and treated any interference of the soil other than was necessary to the enjoyment of this right as a trespass. But the modern decisions have very much extended the public right, and particularly in the streets of populous cities." And then he goes on to say that, "whether the corporation be the user of the fee, . . . or whether it be merely the trustee of the streets and highways as such, irrespective of any title to the soil, it has the power [with the sanction of the Legislature] to authorize their appropriation to all such uses as are conducive to the public good, and do not interfere with their complete and unrestricted use as highways; and, in doing so, it is not obliged to confine itself to such uses as have already been permitted. As civilization advances, new uses may be found expedient." Ang. & D. Highw. § 312.

Another author, in treating of the same subject, uses this language: "The use of property taken by the right of eminent domain is not confined to the precise mode or kind of use which was in view at the time of the taking, but may extend to other modes, which were then unpracticed and unknown. When property has been taken for a public use, and full compensation made for the fee or a perpetual easement, its subsequent appropriation to another public use—certainly, if one of a like kind—does not require further compensation to the owner." Pierce, Railroads, 232.

One of the numerous cases in which this principle has been decided is Chase v. Sutton Mfg. Co. 4 Cush. 152, in which case Chief Justice Shaw said that where, under the authority of the Legislature, in virtue of the sovereign power of eminent domain, private property has been taken for a public use, and a full compensation for a perpetual easement in land has been paid to the owner therefor, and afterwards the land is appropriated to a public use of a like kind, no new claim for compensation can be sustained by the owner of the land over which it passes. And to the same effect is Puldicord v. Baltimore, C. & N. M. Pass. R. Co., 34 Md. 403, in which case it was held that the use of the bed of a turnpike for the purpose of a passenger railway was not a new and distinct servitude, which entitled the abutting owners to new compensation, because, in the opinion of the court, such use did not exclude, or seriously interfere with, the original modes in which the highway was used, but simply added another in furtherance of the same general object. "It is true," said the court, "that when the right of way was originally acquired, and when it was granted to the turnpike company, it was not actually contemplated by any of the parties to the acquisition and grant that it would be used for a passenger railway, yet it may be said to have been within the legal contemplation of all that it was to be used for all the purposes by which the object of its creation as a public highway could be promoted. The parties looked to the future . . . as well as to the then present, and it cannot be supposed that the authors of its existence intended otherwise than that it should respond to whatever demands new improvements and increased facilities might make upon it, so only that such demands must be always consistent with its character and purpose as a public highway."

The same principle is laid down with great force and clearness by Chief Justice Shaw in Conn. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 60. In that case it was held that all public easements intended for common and general benefit, whatever may be their nature and character, are under the control and regulation of the Legislature, exercising the sovereign power of the State, and therefore it was competent for that body to authorize a street railway to be constructed and maintained by a private corporation in the public highway. "It is the great merit of the common law," said the eminent jurist who spoke for the court, "that it is founded upon a comparatively few broad, general principles of justice, fitness and expediency, the correctness of which is generally acknowledged, and which at first are few and simple, but which, carried out in their practical details, and adapted to extremely complicated cases of fact, give rise to many, and often perplexing, questions. Yet these original principles remain fixed, and are generally comprehensive enough to adapt themselves to new institutions and conditions of society, new modes of commerce, new usages and practices, as the progress of society, in the advancement of civilization, may require."

So, in the subsequent case of Atty-Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co., 125 Mass. 515, it was again decided that it is within the power of the Legislature to authorize the construction of a street railway without the consent of the adjoining proprietors, and without additional compensation to them; that the future alteration and use of public streets for public travel must always be subject to reasonable modification by future legislation; that the compensation of the adjoining land owners must be presumed to have been adjusted to such future changes and that their convenience may be affected thereby without impairing any constitutional right to additional compensation; in other words, that any inconvenience or annoyance resulting from such changes is a merely incidental injury, or dammum adeque injuria, just as this court has repeatedly decided with respect to incidental injuries to land owners caused by the alteration in a lawful manner of the grade of a public street. Smith v. Alexander, 33 Grant. 206; Kahner v. Richmond City, 31 Va. 745.

In Cooley, Const. Lim., 553, 555, the author after remarking that when property is appropriated for a public way, and the proprietor is paid for the public easement, the compensation is generally estimated, in practice, at the value of the land itself, says, further, that "a strong inclination is apparent to hold that, when the fee in the public way is taken, . . . it is taken for any public use whatever to which the public authorities, with the legislative assent, may see fit afterwards to devote it in furtherance of the general purpose of the original appropriation; and, if this be so, the owner must be held to be compensated at the time of the original taking for any such possible use." There is no material difference in principle, however, as the author points out in a note, with regard to the extent of the rights of the public in a highway, whether the fee is in the public or in the adjacent land owner, or in some third person. In either case the Legislature may, without providing for additional compensation, authorize such uses to be made of the highway as are conducive to the public convenience, and not repugnant to the purposes of the original appropriation. Burney v. Kaskaskia, 94 U. S. 234 [94 L. ed. 234].

In many of the States of the Union it has been held that the use of the highway even for a steam railway is not an additional burden upon the land of the adjoining proprietor which entitles him to increased compensation; and so it was held in the case last mentioned, the supreme court, in that particular, following the local law of Iowa, in which State the case arose and was decided. The weight of authority, however, is the other way, the idea being that such a use of the highway is inconsistent with its use by the general public, to which it had been legally appropriated. And Judge Dillon says that, while there is solid ground to distinguish between steam and horse railways, yet there is much to recommend as sound the view that, where property is acquired for a street, it may be used as a street under the original appropriation, in such way as the Legislature, representing the public, and best acquainted with the public needs, may authorize. 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 8d ed. § 722.

This was substantially the view taken by Chief Justice Gibson, with whom the whole court concurred, in the Case of the Philadelphia & T. R. Co., 6 Whart. 25, where it is said that, as in England a highway is the property of the king, as patrons patrie, so here it is subject to the paramount authority of the Legislature in the regulation of its use by carriages or means of locomotion "yet to be invented," and that the remedy for an abuse of this power is with the people, who by changing their rules may change the law. And it is not easy to see why, upon principle, this should not be regarded as the true solution of this whole matter.

In some of the cases a distinction is suggested between highways in the country and streets within the limits of cities or towns, according to which the latter may be used for more various uses than the former, as for laying gas and water pipes, the construction of horse railways, sewers, levees, wharves and other accommodations for the public. But, as both the highway and the street are opened for the same general purpose,—and a street is a highway,—there would seem to be no sound basis for such a distinction.

Much of the confusion in the decisions on the subject of the constitutional power of the Legislature over highways is owing, it seems to me, to a failure to discriminate between the use for which a highway is appropriated and the modes of using it. Hence, in passing upon such questions, a clear idea of what a highway is ought always to be kept in view. And what is a highway? Perhaps no better definition of it, in the light of reason and the modern desions, can be given then to say that it is a road or thoroughfare for the use of the general public, for the purpose of intercommunication, which embraces the right to use the highway not only for passage, but for the transmission of intelligence. Formerly, as before remarked, the only mode by which intelligence could be transmitted over a highway was by passing over it. But it is not so now. The discovery of the telegraph and the telephone has revolutionized the methods of intercommunication; and I am unable to perceive why, when a message is sent over a telegraph or telephone wire erected on the public highway, the same, or substantially the same, use is not made of the highway as when a message is sent over it by a messenger on foot or on horseback. In the one case, as was well said in the argument at the bar, the message goes with the messenger, in the other, it goes without the messenger,—the only difference being in the mode of sending it. And it hardly seems in keeping with the progressive spirit of the common law, in eulogy of which so much has been justly written, to say that the new method is not admissible, though with the assent of the Legislature, because it was not known to Bracton or Blackstone.

Held the court in Dickerson v. Osgood, 100 U. S. 578 (25 L. ed. 819): "The common law is reason dealing by the light of experience with human affairs." And what experience had our fathers with electricity as an element of intercommunication in 1826, when Bolling v. Petersburg was decided? None whatever. That the new method is not inconsistent with the ordinary use of the highway is to my mind obvious. Indeed, it is in aid of it; for it not only furnishes vastly increased facilities of intercommunication, but it tends to the relief of the highway, by lessening travel over it, which in populous cities, and even in the country, is no small consideration. And here it may be remarked that the Statute expressly provides that in no case shall a telegraph or telephone erected along a highway obstruct the ordinary use of the highway. Acts 1879-80, p. 53; Code, §§ 1287-1290.

As to the complaint that, in constructing its line, the defendant cut down trees of the plaintiff, it is enough to say that it appears from the record that no poles were planted, or trees cut, except on the highway; and this it was as competent for the defendant to do, under the authority conferred by the Legislature to construct its line, as it was for the public authorities, in the first instance, to cut down such trees as stood in the way when the road was being opened and constructed. The record recites that "all of the acts complained of as done by the defendant upon the lands of the plaintiff were confined to the said legal road of thirty feet, and were necessary to the proper and effective construction, maintenance and operation of the said telegraph line of the defendant."

In the argument a number of authorities were cited to show that it is not competent for the Legislature to authorize a telegraph company to construct its line over the right of way of a railroad company, without making just compensation therefor; and this, I take it, no one will deny. The road-bed and right of way of a railroad company, at least in this State, are as much its property as its rolling stock, or the money in its treasury; and the one can no more be lawfully taken without just compensation than the other. But that is a very different case from this, for here I have endeavored to show that the plaintiff's property has not been taken; that nothing has been granted but the right to use a public easement, which right, under no circumstances, can last longer than the easement itself.

Fortunately, direct authority is not wanting in support of these views. The precise question has been adjudicated in two well-considered opinions,—one by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, the other by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Telaph. Co., 88 Mo. 258, 5 West. Rep. 807, in both of which cases it was distinctly held that an additional servitude is not imposed by the erection on a public highway of a telegraph or telephone line under a statute of the State, and that such statute is not unconstitutional because it makes no provision for additional compensation to the owners of the fee in the highway. In the first-mentioned case the court, in an able and learned opinion by Mr. Justice Devens, said: "The discovery of the telegraph developed a new and valuable mode of communicating intelligence. Its use is certainly similar to, if not identical with, that public use of transmitting information for which the highway was originally taken, even if the means adopted are quite different from the post-boy or the mail-coach. It is a newly discovered method of exercising the old public easement, and all appropriate methods must have been deemed to have been paid for when the road was laid out." And he added that, "under the clause to regulate commerce among the States, conferred on Congress by the Constitution of the United States, although telegraphic communication was unknown when it was adopted, it has been held that it is the right of Congress to prevent the obstruction of telegraphic communication by hostile state legislation, as it has become an indispensable means of intercommunication,"—citing Pennacola Telap. Co. v. W. U. Telap. Co. 90 U. S. 1 [24 L. ed. 708]. See also W. U. Telap. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 400 [20 L. ed. 1007]; W. U. Telap. Co. v. Seay, 122 U. S. 473 [30 L. ed. 409], and cases cited.

In Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Telaph. Co., supra, it was said: "If a thousand messages were daily transmitted by means of telephone poles, wires and other appliances used in telephoning, the street, through these means, would serve the same purpose which would otherwise require its use either by a thousand footmen, horsemen or carriages, to effectuate the same purpose. In this view of it, the erection of telephone poles and wires for transmission of oral messages, so far from imposing a new and additional servitude, would, to the extent of each message transmitted, relieve the street of a servitude or use by a footman, horseman or carriage."

In opposition to these views the case of Board of Trade Tel. Co. v. Barnett 107 Ill. 807, has been cited. That case was disapproved of by both the Massachusetts and Missouri courts, and, I think, with good reason. The case decides that there is no difference in principle between a telegraph and a steam railway in a country highway, so far as the abstract question of servitude is concerned, and that, as the railway is an additional servitude, so also is the telegraph. This reasoning, to my mind, is fallacious. In the nature of things, the use of a highway for operating a steam railway more or less excludes the ordinary methods of travel, and is attended with other inconveniences besides. But can this be said of the telegraph? In what way does a telegraph, erected on the side of a highway, in the country, interfere with the rights of the abutting owner, or with its use as a public thoroughfare? Does it exclude or obstruct travel? On the contrary, it is obviously much less an obstruction than travelers on horseback or in vehicles over the road usually are to one another, and, as to any increased dangers or annoyance resulting from the use of streets in a city for the stringing of numerous wires, of which much has been said, that is not a direct but an incidental injury, which is a matter for the Legislature, and not for the courts, to consider, for nobody doubts that in such cases the Legislature may, if it sees fit, require additional compensation to the owners of the fee to be made.

It has never been questioned, so far as I am informed, that the Legislature may authorize telegraph wires to be laid beneath the surface of a street without additional compensation therefor, and, if this can be lawfully done, the power to authorize the wires to be put above the surface would seem to be equally clear, the difference being a mere matter of regulation, as to which, as we have seen, the power of the Legislature is unqualified.

As to the case of Warwick v. Mayo, 15 Gratt. 523, decided in 1880, and to which our attention has been called, I have only a word to say. In that case, Allen, P., announced the elementary principle that the right of freehold is not touched by establishing a highway, but continues in the original owner of the land, subject to the public easement; and he referred, as authority, to the case in 3 Rand. (Va.) 508. But no question that arises in the present case arose in that case, or was, probably, dreamed of; and, even if it had been decided that no mode of using the public easement is lawful, without additional compensation to the owner of the fee, than such as was known and practiced a half century ago, that would be no reason, if the decision were wrong, for perpetuating the error. Until a comparatively recent period, no one ever heard of an instrument under seal being negotiable; and yet, at the present day, there are sealed instruments the negotiability of which is recognized everywhere, not by virtue of statutes, but because an advanced civilization, and the consequent necessities of commerce, require it; in other words, because the common law is expansive, or rather comprehensive, enough to adapt itself to the wants and conditions of modern society.

Another illustration may be drawn from the course of decision in admiralty. Not more than fifty years after the adoption of the Constitution, the subordinate federal courts, following the English decisions defining the jurisdiction in admiralty, held that the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States was confined to tide-water; and so the supreme court itself decided in The Thomas Jefferson, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 426 [4 L. ed. 368]. But in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U. S. 12 How. 443 [15 L. ed. 1058], which was a case of collision on Lake Ontario, Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the court, in one of his most celebrated opinions, pointed out that while the definition of the jurisdiction, so far as it related to England, was a sound and reasonable one, because in that country there were no navigable streams beyond the ebb and flow of the tide, and that at the time the Constitution was adopted the definition was, for all practical purposes, a proper one for this country also, yet that it had ceased to be so; and accordingly the court declared that the jurisdiction extends to all waters that are in fact navigable, whether tide-waters or not, thus overruling its own previous decision on the subject as being erroneous because not going far enough. In the course of his opinion, the chief justice used language which with propriety may be quoted here. He said: "It is the decision in the case of The Thomas Jefferson which mainly embarrasses the court in the present inquiry. We are sensible of the great weight to which it is entitled. But, at the same time, we are convinced that, if we follow it, we follow an erroneous decision into which the court fell, when the great importance of the question, as it now presents itself, could not be foreseen, and the subject did not therefore receive that deliberate consideration which at this time would have been given to it by the eminent men who presided here when that case was decided. For the decision was made in 1825, when the commerce on the rivers of the west, and on the lakes, was in its infancy, and of little importance, and but little regarded, compared with that of the present day."

I refer to this merely to show into what errors courts sometimes fall by blindly following decisions that are not applicable to our own times and circumstances, forgetting that the world is moving onward, and that common law is common sense dealing by the light of experience with human affairs. And it is into just such an error, it seems to me, that the court has fallen in the present case.

My opinion, therefore, is that the Act in question is constitutional and valid, and that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF INDIANA, App'l.

, Sidney ROBBINS.

(....Ind....)

1. Gaming devices seized by the sheriff while executing a warrant for the arrest of their owner upon the charge of unlawfully keeping such devices for the purpose of gain are as property subject to the order of the court trying the offender as if they had been seized by authority of a search warrant.

2. Unless articles seized because used for violating law are of such a character that the law will not recognize them as property entitled as such to its protection under any circumstances, they cannot be summarily destroyed without affording the owner an opportunity to be heard upon the subject of their lawful use and to show whether or not they are intrinsically useful or valuable for some lawful purpose.

3. An order by the court, which must be passed before or at the time of the final sentence of a person convicted of unlawfully keeping gaming devices for gain, is necessary to justify a destruction of such person's gaming apparatus, which has been seized by the sheriff, under the Statute which provides that "upon conviction of the person offending the sheriff shall forthwith destroy or cause to be destroyed the apparatus used for unlawful purposes."

APPPEAL by the State from orders of the Circuit Court for Cass County overruling a motion to direct the destruction of certain gaming apparatus, and directing its return to the owner. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. T. Michener, Atty. Gen., John T. McGreevy, Proc. Atty., and D. H. Chase for appellant.

No appearance for appellee.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon information of the prosecuting attorney within and for the County of Cass, Sydney Robbins was arrested upon the charge of unlawfully keeping and exhibiting for gain, and for the purpose of winning money thereon, a roulette table and wheel and a faro table and box for dealing cards contrary to the provisions of § 2086, Rev. Stat. 1881. The sheriff took the defendant into custody upon a warrant, upon which the officer made return, among other things, that he had seized one faro table complete, and one roulette table complete, adding that he had seized the devices above named on sight, while the game was in progress. The defendant appeared in court on the 10th day of May, 1889, and pleaded guilty and a fine of $35 was assessed against him. Afterwards, on the 27th day of May, 1889, the prosecuting attorney moved the court for an order directing the sheriff to destroy the gaming apparatus or devices theretofore seized and remaining in the possession of the officer. Thereupon Robbins appeared and moved the court for an order directing the sheriff to return the property to him. The court overruled the motion of the prosecutor and ordered that the property be returned to the owner. From these several rulings this appeal is prosecuted by the State.

It is provided in section 2086, in substance, that whoever keeps or exhibits for gain, or to win or gain money, any gaming table or any apparatus, device or machine of any kind or description, for the purpose of betting or gaming, shall be fined, etc. Provision is made in the Code regulating criminal procedure whereby, upon proper affidavit, justices of the peace are authorized to issue warrants to search any house or place for, among many other things, "any gaming table, establishment, device or apparatus, kept or exhibited for the purpose of unlawful gaming," etc. It is provided, when the warrant is executed by the seizure of the property or things described therein, that the property or things shall be delivered by the justice to the sheriff to be securely held by him, "subject to the order of the court trying the offender," and upon conviction of the person offending the sheriff shall forthwith destroy or cause to be destroyed the apparatus, devices, etc., used for unlawful purposes; and as to all other property, "he shall, after such conviction, deliver the same, under the order of the court, to the proper owner thereof."

On behalf of the State, it is insisted that it was the duty of the court to order the destruction of the gaming devices for the unlawful keeping and exhibition of which the owner had been convicted and which had been taken by the sheriff, in whose custody they remained. We have no doubt of the authority of a sheriff, or other officer authorized to make arrests, to seize articles which he knows or has good reason to believe are being employed in violating the criminal law, or as instruments for the commission of crime. Things which may supply evidence of an offense of which one has been accused may be taken into the possession of the officer making the arrest, to be disposed of under the direction of the court. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 210, 211.

An officer has no authority to take money from the person of a prisoner, or to take from him any other property or thing, unless it is in some way connected with the crime with the commission of which he is charged, or unless it renders his arrest or detention hazardous, or might facilitate his escape. It is not only the right, but it is the duty, of every peace officer to seize any property or thing that is being used in the commission of crime or in the violation of law enacted for the protection of the health, morals and welfare of the community. Spaulding v. Preston, 21 Vt. 9.

The gaming devices in question having been lawfully seized and taken into the possession of the sheriff, they were as properly subject to the order of the court trying the offender as they would have been in case they had been seized by a constable armed with a search war-

NOTE.—The destruction by a public officer of nets for catching fish, set in violation of law, is proper and reasonable exercise of official power, and may be done summarily under the authority of the statute. See Lawton v. Steele (N. Y.) 11 L. R. A. 386, and note.

rant, and afterwards turned over to the sheriff. The Statute authorizing the issuance of a search warrant was designed as a means of discovering and securing possession, by the officers of the law of articles or things the use of which was immoral and unlawful. If, without resorting to the Statute, the proper officer of the court obtained possession of the articles or things used in the commission of a crime, in some other manner equally lawful and legitimate, the jurisdiction of the court over the subject would be the same as if it had been first taken by a search warrant and turned over to the sheriff. In other words, so far as the court has jurisdiction over the property or thing, its jurisdiction depends upon the fact that the apparatus shall be property in the custody of the sheriff when the offender is before the court for trial, and not that he shall have obtained the custody by means of a search warrant. The material part of the Statute in that regard is that the thing seized "shall be securely held by the sheriff, subject to the order of the court trying the offender."

No definite or precise mode of procedure is pointed out by the Statute, in order to enforce the forfeiture of the things seized. The provision is that the sheriff shall securely hold the articles seized, "subject to the order of the court trying the offender," and upon conviction of the person offending destroy or cause to be destroyed the articles used for unlawful purposes. The inquiry then is, Was it necessary, in order to warrant the destruction of the property, that an order to that effect should have been made by the court?—and, if it was, had the court jurisdiction to make it after the case was ended?

It is fundamental that no person can be deprived of any article which is recognized by the law as property, without a judicial hearing, after due notice. No degree of misconduct or wrong can justify the forfeiture of the property of a citizen, except in pursuance of some judicial procedure, of which the owner shall have notice, and in which he shall have the opportunity to contest the ground upon which the forfeiture is claimed. Leary v. Mainwester, 70 Mo. 162, 85 Am. Rep. 430; People v. Copley (Ill. C. C.) 4 Crim. Law Mag. 187; 8 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 1081.

There are, however, some articles which cannot be kept, exhibited or used for any lawful or innocent purpose, such as spurious coin or bills, obscene pictures, books or prints, and other articles or devices, the exhibition, use or possession of which in any form and under all circumstances is unlawful or corrupting and prejudicial to public morals or health. Such articles are regarded as nuisances per se. Property cannot exist in them and an officer into whose hands they come may be authorized by statute or ordinance to destroy them summarily without process. It has been held, however, that such articles cannot be destroyed by an officer in the absence of a law or ordinance authorizing their destruction. Hidgway v. West, 60 Ind. 271.

There are other articles which are not in and of themselves nuisances, which may be used for an illegal or immoral purpose, and which may yet be regarded as property. It may be a question whether implements or articles seized in a particular case are honest, lawful tools or things for innocent amusement, or whether they are devices for counterfeiting, burglar's tools or apparatus for gambling. Differences of opinion may arise as to the character of books or prints. As has been said, "Pictures and illustrations, that might be considered unobjectionable in scientific and philosophical treatises upon medicine and surgery, might be highly indecent and immoral if intended for public circulation. Some of the finest works of art in painting and sculpture, though greatly admired by artists and critics, might be considered by a portion of the community as wholly improper for public exhibition." Atty-Gen. v. Boston Municipal Court, 108 Mass. 466.

In many instances property may or may not exist in a thing according to the use to which it is or may be applied, or the purpose for which it is kept or exhibited, or the intrinsic value of the materials out of which it is constructed. Gaming apparatus may be made of valuable material, capable in some other form of being applied to useful and lawful purposes, or it may be used for innocent and harmless amusement in the form in which it exists. It cannot always be determined by inspection, or disclosed as matter of law, that articles used for the illegal and immoral purpose of gaming may not also be used for innocent and lawful purposes, or that in honest hands they may not constitute lawful merchandise. Unless, therefore, articles seized are of such a character that the law will not recognize them as property, entitled as such to its protection, under any circumstances, they cannot be summarily destroyed without affording the owner an opportunity to be heard upon the subject of their lawful use, and to show whether or not the articles are intrinsically useful or valuable for any other purpose than gambling, or whether their only recognized value and customary use is as implements for gaming.

If, upon inquiry by the court trying the offender, it should appear that the property seized is such as is of no substantial or practical use or value, except in connection with a gambling room, or if the use to which it is customarily devoted by the owner is unlawful gaming, its destruction should be ordered upon application to the court as part of the judgment in the case, provided the defendant be found guilty; and as to all other property seized, that is, such as is adapted to a lawful use, it should be ordered returned to the owner, in accordance with the provisions of § 1623, Rev. Stat. 1881. Com. v. Gaming Implements, 119 Mass. 222; Atty-Gen. v. Boston Municipal Court, supra.

This last section, so far as applicable to gaming apparatus or devices, is to be construed in connection with section 2086. When so construed it is apparent that the inquiry in respect to the character of the property seized and "the order of the court trying the offender," referred to in section 1623, must be made by the court before or at the time final judgment is pronounced against the defendant. The destruction of the implements employed in the commission of the crime must be regarded as, in some sense, a part of the penalty to be adjudged by the court against the offender, and the order of forfeiture must be part of the judgment pronounced in the case. After the penalty has been assessed and final judgment has been pronounced and the case ended, the court cannot again take jurisdiction upon a mere motion, and proceed with another hearing and make another order enforcing punishment in the nature of an additional penalty against the defendant or his property. The conclusion follows, that after having pronounced final judgment the court had no jurisdiction to enter upon an inquiry and make an order for the destruction of the articles seized. The application should have been made before or at the time judgment was pronounced. The order for the destruction of the property was therefore correctly refused, for the reason that it was made too late.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

George R. NEWELL et al., Resp'ts.,

(....Mont....)

1. A contract giving a person an exclusive agency for the sale of a brand of cigars in a certain Territory is not void as in restraint of trade.

2. Where a defendant was totally deprived of his defense by the action of the court in first sustaining a demurrer to his answer, which set up a contract for the sole agency of the goods purchased by him, and a breach thereof by plaintiff, and then on his amended answer setting up the invalidity of the contract as an absolute defense, making a ruling, after the case was submitted on the pleadings, to the effect that the contract was valid, although the latter ruling was correct, the judgment will be reversed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lewis and Clarke County in favor of plaintiffs and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, in an action to recover the contract price for certain cigars sold and delivered to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Clayberg, for appellant:

A party is not permitted to take inconsistent positions in court in the same suit.

Messrs. Sanders, Cullen & Sanders for respondents.

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this case presents the following history: The complaint is for the price of cigars sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant. Defendant answered, and admitted the sale and delivery, and set up in recoupment a contract, the terms of which were, generally, that in 1896 he was dealing in cigars; that plaintiffs approached him to sell their "Flor de B. Garcia Cigars," agreeing that defendant should have the sole and exclusive right of selling, handling and dealing in said cigars in Montana; that plaintiffs would not sell said cigars to anyone else in the Territory, that defendant would cease advertising and selling various other valuable brands of cigars in which he was dealing, and from the sale of which he was deriving much profit; that he would accept said sole agency, would purchase said brand of cigars from plaintiffs, and would introduce and promote the sale thereof to the best of his ability. The answer further alleges, in detail, the performance by defendant of his part of the contract, and the expenditure of large sums of money in placing said cigars upon the market. Then follows the allegation of breach by plaintiffs, in that they sold the said brand of cigars to other dealers in the Territory, by which breach the defendant suffered great damage in his business, which damage he recoups against the plaintiff's account for the cigars sold. The court below sustained a demurrer to this answer, on the ground that the contract pleaded was void, as against public policy, being in restraint of trade, and could not be pleaded in recoupment. Defendant accepted the ruling of the court, and took leave to amend, which he did by pleading the same contract, not in recoupment, but as an absolute defense, on the ground that, if the contract were void, the plaintiffs could not recover thereunder. The case went to trial in this condition, before the court without a jury. The theory of the case seems to have been preserved until the court made findings and conclusions of law, at which time he held that the contract was not void. Defendant presumably had not introduced evidence of damages by reason of breach, as he was not entitled to under the pleadings; and judgment was made and entered for plaintiffs for the amount claimed. Defendant seems not to have had a day in court. His motion for a new trial was denied. From that order, and the judgment as well, he appeals, having saved his errors complained of by exception.

We will first construe the contract as to whether it must be considered void as in restraint of trade. The rule that contracts that are in restraint of trade shall be void, as against public policy, is among our most ancient common-law inheritances. In Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 81, Morton, J., says: "As early as the second year of Henry V. (A. D. 1415), we find, by the Year Books, that this was considered to be old and settled law. Through a succession of decisions, it has been handed down to us, unquestioned, till the present time." The learned judge traces the history of the rule to its modern modification, that "contracts in restraint of trade, generally, have been held to be void; while those limited as to time or place or persons have been regarded as valid, and duly enforced." He gives the reasons for the rule in the following language: "(1) Such contracts injure the parties making them, because they diminish their means of procuring livelihoods, and a competency for their families. They tempt improvident persons, for the sake of present gain, to deprive themselves of the power to make future acquisitions, and they expose such persons to imposition and oppression. (2) They tend to deprive the public of the services of men in the employment and capacities in which they may be most useful to the community as well as themselves. (3) They discourage industry and enterprise, and diminish the products of ingenuity and skill. (4) They prevent competition, and enhance prices. (5) They expose the public to all the evils of monopoly; and this especially is applicable to wealthy companies and large corporations, who have the means, unless restrained by law, to exclude rivalry, monopolize business, and engross the market. Against evils like these, wise laws protect individuals and the public, by declaring all such contracts void." See also cases in that opinion cited.

The doctrine is again well stated in Lawrence v. Kidder, 10 Barb. 641, in which case the court, Selden, J., cites with approval Bronson, J., in Chappet v. Bruckway, 21 Wend 137, as follows: "There may be cases where the contract is neither injurious to the public nor the obligor, and then the law makes an exception, and declares the agreement valid."

In Oregon Nav. Co. v. Winser, 87 U. S. 30 Wall. 68 [23 L. ed. 315], Mr. Justice Bradley says: "There are two principal grounds on which the doctrine is founded that a contract in restraint of trade is void as against public policy. One is the injury to the public by being deprived of the restricted party's industry; the other is the injury to the party himself by being precluded from pursuing his occupation, and thus being prevented from supporting himself and his family. It is evident that both these evils occur when the contract is general, not to pursue one's trade at all, or not to pursue it in the entire realm or country. The country suffers the loss in both cases; and the party is deprived of his occupation, or is obliged to expatriate himself in order to follow it. A contract that is open to such grave objections is clearly against public policy. But if neither of these evils ensues, and if the contract is founded on a valid consideration, and a reasonable ground of benefit to the other party, it is free from objection, and may be enforced."

We have cited these reasons for the rule in full, in order to apply them to the contract under consideration. They embody the modern doctrine, as held by the authorities. A recitation alone, of the rule and its reasons, seems to us sufficient to take the contract under consideration out of the operation of its prohibitions. The contract is not general; it is limited as to place and person. The public is not deprived of the alleged restricted party's industry. On the contrary, the contract provides for the placing upon the Montana market the product of the plaintiffs' industry, by the selection and services of a local Montana agent, interested in the success of sales, and to be rewarded by such success. Nor is there any injury to the party himself, the plaintiffs, by their being precluded from pursuing their occupation. Rather, by the contract, they seem to have sought a means of extending the field of their operations, and not of restricting them. In the light of the authorities, the rule and the reasons therefor and the facts, we are clearly of the opinion that the contract was not in restraint of trade, and not void. It was simply a contract, for a consideration, for the enlistment of the services of an agent for the plaintiffs in their business. The court below was therefore correct in his last view of the contract. It follows that he was wrong in his first position in sustaining the demurrer to the original answer.

Respondent urges that all the proceedings and pleadings, prior to the amended pleadings, on which the case was tried, are before the case on appeal, — citing Sawyer, J., in Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 601: "The old complaint, in the form first filed, ceases to be the complaint in the case, or to perform any further function as a pleading, but the amended complaint falls into its place, and performs the same, and not different, functions." Upon an examination of this case, we find the judge further saying, "The identity of the action is in no respect affected," and it was preliminary to arriving at the conclusion last quoted that the previous utterance was made. The law, as counsel cites it, is true, as far as he goes. The old answer in the case at bar does not "perform any further function as a pleading;" but we are not precluded from examining that answer, and the sustaining of the demurrer thereto, for the purpose suggested infra. We are mindful of the consequences of defendant answering over, after demurrer sustained (Fraser v. Hennepe, 6 Mont. 248), and we, at this time, recur to that ruling, and review the same, not as if an appeal had been taken therefrom to this court, but for the purpose of ascertaining whether the court in such decision, together with his latter reversal of his position, in the same case, did not deprive defendant of a substantial right, and exclude him from his day in court. If that be true, defendant has a remedy. Ubi jus, ibi remedium. If the contract be valid, defendant certainly has the right to recoup his damages. If the contract be void, defendant has the right to plead it in bar. But the court below changed front as often as defendant aligned himself with the court's last evolution. It was impossible for the defendant to keep pace with the movements of the court, who finally left him a judgment debtor, after having twice declared that he had a good defense, but each time when the court had placed defendant in a position where he could not avail himself of such defense. For the defendant's disasters, thus resulting, there must be a remedy. We find it as follows: A party in an action is bound by his pleadings. He is also bound by the ruling of the court which he obtains upon his own motion, and is estopped from claiming such ruling as error. 3 Herman, Estoppel, § 822, and note.

A party is bound by his theory and presentation of his case. "A party cannot get relief on one basis, and then seek a new chance to litigate, on the suggestion that he has a defense, which he did not see fit to rely on before." Hess v. Macomber, 35 Mich. 487. See also Bilanger v. Hersey, 90 Ill. 76, Swamy v. Stetson, 67 Iowa, 461.

"Where a party gives a reason for his conduct and decision touching anything involved in a controversy, he cannot, after litigation has begun, change his ground and put his conduct upon another and a different consideration. He is not permitted thus to mend his hold. He is estopped from doing it by a settled principle of law." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 267 [24 L. ed. 806]. See also Dreyfous v. Adema, 49 Cal. 131, Long v. Fox, 100 Ill. 43, McQueen v. Gamble, 33 Mich. 344; Callaway v. Johnson, 51 Mo. 23, Edward's App. 105 Pa. 103.

When the plaintiffs in the case at bar had procured the ruling of the court that the contract was void, they placed their theory of the case upon record. Might they then, "upon after-thoughts, new suggestions and new aspects of the case, change their position of the case from that on which they deliberately chose originally to present it to the court?"—and especially after defendant had accepted the construction of the contract demanded by plaintiffs, and held by the court. Plaintiffs were estopped by the position they had assumed, and into which they had forced defendant, when, to change that position, in the time and in the manner that it was changed, deprived defendant of all defense whatsoever. The decision of the court holding the contract valid was made after the testimony was closed and the case argued and submitted, and submitted on pleadings which forbade evidence in recoupment. If the court had made his reformed ruling before the close of the case, defendant could have obtained leave to amend himself back to his original position, and obtain a continuance on the ground of surprise, if necessary, to enable him to obtain and produce his evidence of damages. It would seem that the action of the court was accident and surprise, against which no ordinary prudence could have guarded. We are of opinion that plaintiffs were estopped from asserting that the contract was valid, or of receiving the benefit of the ruling of the court to that effect, when such ruling came at the time, in the manner and under the circumstances that it did, and to the total deprivation to the defendant of his defense to the action. Therefore the latter ruling of the court, although correct by construing the contract, under the circumstances described, and entailing the results that it did, and taken with the former position assumed by the court, and depriving defendant of a substantial right, was error.

We make no reflection upon the distinguished judge who tried the cause. His reformation of his first opinion is a credit as well to his eminent and conceded ability as to his known sense of justice and probity. His action complained of was more in the nature of a misfortune, which happened to be fatal to the defendant.

Respondent urges that the statement on motion for a new trial cannot be considered, as it was not settled by the judge who tried the case, but by his successor in office. It is not necessary to consider this objection, as the data for our conclusion are all found in the judgment roll, and the appeal is from the judgment, as well as the order denying the motion. We cannot leave this case without animadverting upon the record as it is presented. This court has heretofore had occasion to remind counsel that the preparation of a record is their duty, and it is not for them to leave the supreme court to grope through a disorderly mass of immaterial matter to ascertain that which counsel relies upon. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 403; Raymond v. Thorton, Id. 306, Phat v. Tandy, Id. 448; Sherman v. Higgins, Id. 470.

In the record in this case, the complaint, second amended complaint, replication, judgment, notice of motion and specification of errors all appear twice in full, instead of being once inserted, and afterwards noticed by appropriate reference. Where reference is made, pages are omitted. It is difficult to refer to page _____. The matter is not presented in that orderly, systematic, chronological method that presents to the court an intelligent view of the case at a reading. When we do arrive at the gist of the matter, it is after such labor as caused the learned compilers of the Institutes of Justinian to say, in the dedication of that work, "et opus desperatum, quasi per medium profundum cunctis sensibus foveis ad implevimus."

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WILKINSON, Ch. J., and HARWOOD, J., concur.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

D. L. GORE, App't.,

D. L. TOWNSEND and Wife.

(....N. C....)

*1. Where a wife joined her husband in a mortgage conveying his land, together with personal property belonging to him, to secure his debt, and afterwards the husband alone executed a second mortgage, conveying the same and other personal property, to secure a second note executed by him, and before the personal property was sold directed that the proceeds of sale of the personal property, except so much as should arise from the sale of a mule and wagon, about which there was no direction, should be applied to the payment of the debt secured by the second mortgage.—Held, that the fund arising from the sale of the mule and wagon should be paid upon the debt secured by the first mortgage, in exoneration of the wife's inchoate dower interest.

*2. The inchoate right of the wife to dower in her husband's land, under Code, chap. 33, has a present value as property, depending on the ages, health and habits of both, and other circumstances competent to show the probabilities as to the length of life of each; and when she incumbers it by joining in a mortgage of his land to secure his debt she becomes his surety.

*3. The mortgagee cannot, because the husband failed to direct the application of the fund arising from the sale of the mule and wagon, apply it in discharge of the debt secured by the second mortgage, but must pay it on that secured by the first mortgage, for which the property is primarily liable, and in exoneration of the wife's dower.

Held notes by AVERY, J.

NOTE.—Dower right of wife protected.

The dower right of the wife cannot be conveyed away by the husband, nor can it be taken by his creditors on execution. Burdett v. Ladd, 20 N. H. 16; Doty v. Baker, 11 Hun, 333; Bartlett v. Van Sandt, 4 Sandf. Ch. 333, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1147.

A wife's inchoate right of dower in lands is substantial and valuable interest, which will be protected and preserved to her, and she has a right of action to that end, and the only exception to that rule is where the State or its agents, exercising the right of eminent domain, take for public use the lands affected by said inchoate right of dower. Douglas v. Douglas, 11 Hun, 413; Stear v. Chesday, 25 N. Y. 234; Mills v. Van Voorhies, 20 N. Y. 412; Matthews v. Duryea, 4 Keyes, 333; Denton v. Manly, 3 Barb. 513; Vartie v. Underwood, 13 Barb. 331; Duncan v. Terre Haute, 25 Ind. 104.

The rule for computing the present value of a wife's inchoate right of dower during the life of the husband is to ascertain the present value of an annuity for her life equal to the interest in the third of the proceeds of the estate to which her contingent right of dower attaches, and then to deduct from the present value of the annuity for her life the value of a similar annuity depending APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Robeson County applying a certain fund in reduction of the mortgage which the action was brought to foreclose, in exoneration of the female defendant's liability as surety thereon. Affirmed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a civil action tried before Shipp, J., at the Fall Term, 1886, of Robeson Superior Court, and was brought to foreclose a mortgage set out in the pleadings. The mortgage was executed to secure a note for $750, dated 19th of March, 1884, and was made the same day, and in addition to the land conveyed therein, which was the individual property of D. L. Townsend, two mules and one wagon were also mortgaged therein to secure said debt, which was the individual debt of said Townsend. One of the mules died subsequently. The land was acquired by D. L. Townsend in 1884, and he intermarried with the female defendant in 1875, and they were then, and have been ever since, citizens and residents of this State, and it is on the land on which they were living at the time that they executed the mortgage, and on which they are now living, and neither of said defendants owns any other land in the State of North Carolina.

On the 12th of March, 1887, D. L. Townsend, to secure further advances from plaintiff, executed his note for $1,119.10, due on the 1st day of January, 1888, and secured same by a mortgage on personal property therein set out, of even date with the note, in which was in-upon the joint lives of herself and her husband, and the difference between those two sums will be the value of her contingent right of dower. Doty v. Baker, 11 Hun, 333; Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 222, 40 Am. Rep. 514.

The claim of the wife of the mortgagor, who joined in the execution of the mortgage, upon the surplus moneys arising on foreclosure, for the value of her inchoate right of dower, is superior to the claims of judgment creditors of the mortgagor, notwithstanding a provision in the mortgage for the return of the surplus, if any, to the mortgagor, his heirs or assigns. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Mayer, 19 Abb. N. C. 103.

The inchoate right of the wife to dower attaches to the surplus which, pro hac vice, is still to be deemed real estate, and entitles her to claim that such inchoate and contingent right be recognized and protected by a reservation of one third of such surplus until it shall be known whether she will survive her husband, and that in case she so survive she may, as widow, receive the thereafter accruing income of such one third during her life. Matthews v. Duryea, 4 Keyes, 333, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 333.

cluded the mule and wagon also conveyed in first mortgage. About January 1, 1888, it was mutually agreed between plaintiff and defendant D. L. Townsend that all the property conveyed in the second mortgage, dated 12th of March, 1887, should be surrendered to plaintiff, and, on a sale thereof on the best terms possible, the proceeds, except mule and wagon, were to be credited on note and mortgage, dated 12th of March, 1887, the defendant, D. L. Townsend, however, not giving any directions as to how the proceeds of the sale of the mule and wagon above referred to, conveyed in both mortgages, were to be applied. This property, including the mule and wagon, was sold, and the proceeds of sale of mule and wagon, amounting to $144.10, were applied by D. L. Gore to the note and mortgage dated March 12, 1887. The mule and wagon were the property of D. L. Townsend at the time of the execution of both mortgages. The same defendant joined with her husband in the execution of the mortgage of 1884, and her privy examination was regularly taken. There was a verdict in response to the issues submitted to the jury as to the value of the land as appears in the record. Upon these facts, a trial by jury being waived, except as to the value of the land, his honor was of opinion that the flaw defendant, having joined in the execution of the mortgage conveying her husband's land, became a surety to the debt, and the proceeds of the sale of the mule and wagon, amounting to $144.10, should be applied as of January 1, 1888, the time of sale, to the note and mortgage of March 12, 1884, and so adjudged, and the plaintiff excepted.

Messrs. T. A. McNeill and E. O. Well for plaintiff.

Mr. W. F. French for defendants.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In all cases where the wife executes a mortgage on her property for her husband's debts, or for money loaned to him, it is well settled that she occupies the position of, and is entitled to all the rights and privileges of, surety for her husband. Kelly, Cont. Married Women, 105.

She "assumes, in the eye of a court of equity, the character of a surety for the husband. Properly speaking, she is not a surety, but she is so called by analogy. She has a title to call upon the husband to exonerate her estate from the debt." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 604; Purvis v. Christopher, 78 N. C. 575.

It is true that the inchoate right of dower was never considered an estate or interest in a court of law, which did not even concede the power of the widow to convey her unassigned dower after the right had become consummate by the husband's death, but she might make a contract for the sale that would be enforced in a court of equity. Potter v. Sterritt, 7 Ired. Eq. 153; Buyler v. Owm, 40 Pa. 87.

It must be remembered, however, that the discussion of the nature of the wife's interest in her husband's land has assumed a new phase since the enactment of the law restoring the common-law right of dower in North Carolina.

In Guthway v. Pearce, 74 N. C. 808, Justice Rende, after citing Purvis v. Christopher as establishing the doctrine that the wife, when she joins her husband in a mortgage of her separate property to secure his debt, sustains the relation of his surety in that transaction, says, in reference to the former case: "Here the wife joined her husband in the conveyance of his land in trust to pay his debt, in which land she had, under our Dower Statute, a vested right to dower, to be allotted after her husband's death; and she joined in the deed for the purpose of binding her dower. After her husband's death, the whole land, her dower included, was sold under the trust deed to pay the debt. This made the wife a creditor of her husband's estate to the amount of the value of her dower in the land." The Dower Statute referred to by the court was the Act of 1868-69 (chap. 93, §§ 83-87), and was substantially the same as sections 2103, 2104, 2106 and 2107 of the Code; and therefore, if the inchoate right to dower was a "vested right," then it is of equal dignity and importance now, and the mortgage in which the defendant's wife joined in the present case passed an interest that imputed additional present value to the mortgage's security in proportion to the worth of her life estate in one third of the land, estimated according to the life tables, or certainly to a sum that an expert could ascertain, having as data for his calculation the value of the land and the chances of survivorship on her part after the husband's death.

Although in Guthway v. Pearce, supra, the wife was declared a creditor of the husband's estate after his death to the value of her dower, the ruling could have been sustained only on the principle, upon which it is explicitly made to rest, that the wife was a surety, and she did not sustain that relation to the original contract because her husband died, but because she signed a deed that subjected her interest in the land conveyed. It would seem, therefore, that this court has settled the principle that the wife, by joining in a mortgage of the husband's land to secure his debt, becomes then a surety, and in case she survives him, and the land is sold to satisfy the debt, she becomes also a creditor to the value of the life estate. The language of sections 2106 and 2107 of the Code seems to recognize the right during the husband's life as a valuable interest, that may pass by a conveyance, rather than a naked right, that the claimant may be barred by the estoppel of her deed from enforcing; and this interpretation follows the line of more modern legislation to make every valuable interest transferable and convertible into money, while it is in accord with the older idea that the claim of the wife to dower is favored by the law. While there is conflict of opinion as to the nature and qualities of the wife's inchoate interest, there is much authority that, either directly or indirectly, sustains the view advanced by this court, apart from any peculiarity in the language of our Statute; and it is strongly supported, too, by analogy.

The right of exoneration in equity grows out of the suretyship, and must exist so soon as the interest conveyed is about to be subjected to sale, and it appears that there is a fund or property belonging to the principal debtor equally liable with such interest for the debt. The contract of suretyship, or the conveyance of one's property to secure the debt of another, is a transaction primarily between, not the principal and the surety, but the surety and the third person. 2 Bishop, Married Women, § 370.

In Ballard v. Briggs, 7 Pick. 509, it was held that the relinquishment of the right of dower was a valid consideration for the conveyance of the equity of redemption, even as against the claim of creditors; and Parker, Ch. J., in discussing the nature of the wife's interest during the husband's life, says: "The consideration for this intended settlement on the wife was her right of dower in the estate, which the husband was about to mortgage. Without her relinquishment, he could not raise the money wanted for his support and his debts. His days were numbered by intemperance and disease. Though she had no actual estate in the dower during the life of her husband, yet she had an interest and a right of which she could not be deprived but by her consent or crime, or her dying before her husband. It was a valuable interest, which is frequently the subject of contract and bargain. It is an interest which the law recognizes as the subject of conveyance by fine in England, and by deed with us."

In Varile v. Underwood, 18 Barb. 561, the court held that "the wife's inchoate right of dower in the husband's land follows the surplus moneys raised by a sale in virtue of the power of sale in a mortgage executed by her with her husband, and will be protected against the claims of the husband's creditors, by directing one third of such surplus moneys to be invested, and the interest only to be paid to the creditors during the joint lives of husband and wife." See also Dunton v. Nanay, 8 Barb. 618.

In the later case of Wedge v. Moore, 8 Cush. 9, Chief Justice Shaw delivering the opinion of the court, it was held that where the husband executed three mortgages upon his land, his wife joining only in the second one, she was entitled, after his death, to dower against the third mortgagee, who had paid the debts secured by the two first mortgages.

In the case of Kelly v. Harrison, 2 Johns. Cas. 39, the court held that a wife who remained a subject of Great Britain, while her husband took part with the Colonies in the Revolution, was entitled to dower after the death of the husband in all land acquired by the husband up to the beginning of the war. Kent, J., says: "But the right could not attach till the land was purchased, and I distinguished between the capacity to acquire and the vested right. The Revolution took away the one, and did not impair the other."

Scribner, in his work on Dower (vol. 2, p. 9), says: "Although, therefore, an inchoate right of dower cannot be properly denominated an estate in lands, nor indeed a vested interest therein, and notwithstanding the difficulty of defining with accuracy the precise legal qualities of the interest, it may nevertheless be fairly deduced from the authorities that it is a substantial right, possessing, in contemplation of law, the attributes of property, and to be estimated and valued as such."

It has many of the incidents of property. It has a present value that can be computed. Jackson v. Edwards, 7 Paige, 386, 406, 4 N. Y. 6 L. R. A.

It is a valuable consideration for a conveyance to the wife. Ballard v. Briggs, supra; Ross v. Horst, 55 Md. 42.

The wife may maintain an action for its protection. Patty v. Patty, 4 B. Mon. 218; Burns v. Lynde, 8 Allen, 205; Simar v. Canaday, 68 N. Y. 298; Bissell v. Taylor, 41 Mich. 702; Donohue v. Murria, 47 Mo. 587.

She may file a bill or bring an action for the redemption of a mortgage covering it. Davis v. Wetherell, 18 Allen, 80.

It has been repeatedly declared by the courts an incumbrance, within the meaning of a usual covenant in a deed. Hill v. Remington, 17 Barb. 102; Shaw v. Ranger, 22 Pick. 447.

The right of dower is favored by the law; and, apart from the idea of suretyship, a widow may maintain an action for dower in equity, and may demand that a lien upon the land be discharged out of the personal estate, or that a portion of a tract of land shall be sold to relieve the dower of the lien of a mortgage, or an equitable estate of the lien for the purchase money. 1 Scribner, Dower, § 61.

It is true that it was held in Jennett v. Outler, 12 Kan. 500, that where the wife joined the husband in a mortgage deed conveying his land, and waiving the homestead right, she was not a surety, but the ruling rested upon the undefined nature of the homestead right. It was not only not an estate, but not a right peculiar to the wife. Brandt, Bur. § 22.

It must be recollected that the restoration of the common-law right of dower by our Statute worked a change in the nature of the wife's present interest in her husband's lands. It is no longer subject to the double contingency of survivorship and failure by the husband to alienate before death, but only to the former; and, if he venture to sell without the joinder of the wife, a prudent purchaser, in fixing the price, will deduct from the actual value such sum as, looking to the ages of husband and wife, their habits, etc., he estimates the chances of the wife's dower to be worth. Hence this court, in holding in the case of Quistway v. Parris, supra, that the widow was a creditor after the death of the husband to the extent of the value of the land mortgaged, because she had become his surety when she incumbered her inchoate right of dower, assigned as a reason that the then recent changes in the law had made her interest a "vested right," and imparted to it a value, even during the life of the husband.

We concur with the court below in the opinion that the wife was a surety, and the proceeds of the sale of the mule and wagon should have been applied to the payment of the debt secured by the first mortgage in exoneration of the land, in which she had a valuable interest. Her right to exoneration could not be defeated by the failure of the husband to direct the application of the proceeds of the sale of the mule and wagon which was primarily liable under the first mortgage, in exoneration of the land. The inchoate right of the wife to dower in her husband's land has a present value as property, depending on the ages of both, their health, habits and other circumstances tending to show the probabilities as to the length of the life of each; and, where she incumbers it by joining in a mortgage of his land to secure his debt, she becomes his surety. Her right to exoneration could not be defeated by the failure of the husband to direct the application of the proceeds of the sale of the mule and wagon, that fund being primarily liable under the first mortgage.

There is no error.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

CARLETON MILLS CO.

v.

Joshua E. SILVER et al.

(...Me....)

1. If it is doubtful from the terms of a grant whether the kind of mill or particular machinery mentioned therein, for which water is to be furnished, indicates the quantity of water and measures the extent of the power intended to be conveyed, or is referred to as a limit of the use to the particular kind of mill or specified machinery, the former construction will be favored.

2. A grant of a certain water privilege for the purpose of propelling a factory and its machinery and appurtenances, the building to be of a certain size with necessary appurtenances and machinery, will be construed to measure the quantity of water, and will not limit the use of water to carry only such machinery as may be in the main building, if some of the machinery is in an annex and no more power is required to propel it than if it were in the main building, where it could all be placed.

3. Parties have the right to run their factory as many hours a day as they consider proper where they have a grant of water for the purpose of their factory with no limitation therein upon the number of hours per day in which they can run the factory.

(December 30, 1889.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court for Piscataquis County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged interference by defendants with plaintiff's water rights. Overruled.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. A. G. Labroke, with Messrs. Crosby & Crosby, for defendants:

The measure of power on our construction is simple, clear, easily understood. But on plaintiff's theory it is complicated, mixed, uncertain, indefinite. What certainty can there possibly be that the plaintiff does not exceed its rights of power when it deserts the simple 98 x 48 and extends, divides and diffuses it in numerous ways?

It is not right to subject the defendants to perplexing difficulties.

Drummond v. Bickley, 30 Me. 483.

Ten hours a day is a legal day's work unless there be a special agreement for a larger day's work. Williams in the deed never made any agreement for a longer time. The statute must govern.

Bachelder v. Bickford, 63 Me. 526; Barrett v. Parsons, 10 Cush. 372.

Mr. Henry Hudson for plaintiff.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 8, 1881, Owen B. Williams was the owner of the premises, land and water privilege about which this contention has arisen, situated upon Carleton Stream, in the Village of Sangerville. Upon that day he conveyed by metes and bounds a specific part of the premises to the plaintiff, and in the conveyance, immediately following the description of the boundaries, is this language: "Together with the Williams dam, and all the water privileges of the 'Carleton Mill Stream,' so called, for all the purposes of propelling a factory, and its machinery and appurtenances, to be built on said privilege, said factory building to be ninety eight feet in length, and forty-eight feet in width, with all necessary appurtenances and machinery for working the same up to its full capacity."

Subsequently the plaintiff built a woolen factory on the privilege conveyed by this deed, two stories high besides a basement, the main building being the same dimensions as that named in the deed. On the easterly side of

By the conveyance of a mill lot, with a mill turned by water upon it, the right to use the dam and the necessary pondage would pass as appurtenant, if the dam and pond were upon the remaining lands of the grantor. Central R. Co. v. Valentine, 39 N. J. L. 597. See Leonard v. White, 1 Mass. 6; Wetmore v. White, 3 Cal. Ch. 37.

3 L. R. A.

The conveyance of land would pass a mill and millpond and canal upon the same; and the latter would pass the flowage of water and water-privileges enjoyed and used with it and often giving to it its chief value. Babcock v. Utter, 1 Keyes, 433, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 31; Oakley v. Stanley, supra; Barr v. Mills, 21 Wend. 330.

The conveyance in terms of a "mill" or "mill-race" or "privilege" would undoubtedly pass the right to flow sufficient to raise the necessary head of water to carry the mill. Tabor v. Bradley, 18 N. Y. 112.

Where grantor had imposed the burden upon the land adjoining for his own benefit, it would continue to be attached unless the right to subvert it was expressly reserved. Green v. Collins, 33 N. Y. 251; Lampman v. Milka, 21 N. Y. 306; Simmons v. Cloonan, 47 N. Y. 2. See note to Dowling v. Burton (N. C.) 3 L. R. A. 303.

the main building, but connected with it, a tower eighteen feet by twelve feet was erected, in which were the stairways to the main building, and an elevator operated by power from the factory wheel.

On the northerly end of the main building, and connected with the same, outside the ninety eight feet in length, was erected an annex, in which were placed the factory wheel, two pickers, a duster and a force pump, which were run by the factory wheel, also dye kettles, rinsing tubs, boiler to heat the factory and chimney. The only wheel which ran the factory was built under this annex.

The case shows that, while the main building contained sufficient room for the wheel, pickers and duster, yet no more power was required to propel them in this annex than if located in the main building.

The points in controversy, so far as they are raised by the bill of exceptions, pertain to the legal construction of this deed, and may be determined by the answer to this single question, whether the language in the deed shall be construed to measure the quantity of water to which the plaintiff is entitled, or to limit the use of water to carry only such machinery as may be in the main building.

The plaintiff's contention is for the former, that the grant is of water sufficient or necessary to propel a particular factory, reference to the mill being made only to indicate and measure the quantity of power intended to be conveyed.

The defendants, upon the contrary, contend that the deed is to be so construed as to limit the power for the special purpose of propelling only such machinery as may be contained in the main building.

It is undoubtedly competent for the owner of the whole of the mill privilege to convey any part of the power he pleases, and limit its use to any particular purpose which he may see fit to express in the grant, and the other party is willing to accept. Where such purposes are plain from the terms of the conveyance, courts will so construe the contract as to carry into effect the expressed intention of the parties. Oftentimes, however, where such rights are derived solely from grant, particularly where they are a part only of a larger waterpower, it is a question of some difficulty, in construing the grant, to determine whether the power granted was intended to be applied to a specific use only, or whether a reference to the purposes named in the grant was made for the sole purpose of defining and measuring the quantity of power granted. If the parties, from the terms of the grant, have left it doubtful whether the kind of mill or particular machinery mentioned indicates the quantity of water, and measures the extent of the power intended to be conveyed, or is referred to as a limit of the use to the particular kind of mill or specified machinery, the former construction will be favored, as being more favorable to the grantee, more for the general interest of the public, and as being more probably the intention of the parties. This is the general doctrine adopted by the courts and adhered to in grants of this nature, whenever the description of the rights conveyed is in such terms as to leave it in doubt which of these two kinds of species of grants was intended. Deshon v. Porter, 35 Me. 240, 208; Pruitt v. Lamson, 2 Allen, 375; Tourtillot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370, 374; Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 208, 276; Conant v. Hart, 56 Me. 518.

In this case the court instructed the jury that the "plaintiff's rights are not confined to such machinery alone as it might put into the main building, for the true construction of that deed does not restrict the water to such machinery as is in there, but the language of the deed is simply used to express the measure of the water to which it is entitled."

This instruction, we think, presented the law correctly to the jury. In construing the plaintiff's deed from Williams, the intention of the parties must first be sought from the language of the deed, taken in connection with the situation of their business, the subject matter to which it relates and the object to be obtained. Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 163; Deshon v. Porter, supra.

When we consider, therefore, the objects and purposes for which the power was granted, we think it clear that the language of the deed does not restrict the grantee to the use of the water for the specific purpose of propelling such machinery only as might be in the main building, but that by the terms of the deed, so far as they relate to the machinery to be used in a factory of the dimensions named, the intention was to describe the quantity of water, the use of which is thereby conveyed. Hence, if some of the machinery required in a factory like this is located in an annex, instead of being in the main building, and no more power is required to propel it than if it were situated in the main building, it would certainly be within the terms of the plaintiff's deed.

The power intended to be conveyed, as expressed in the deed, is "for all the purposes of propelling a factory and its machinery and appurtenances" essential to the successful operation of a building of the size mentioned in the terms mentioned in the grant, "with all the necessary appurtenances and machinery for working the same up to its full capacity."

The annex and tower situated upon the plaintiff's land, and thus connected with the factory building proper, considering the nature of the grant, and the purposes to which the power was to be applied, may properly be considered as embraced within the terms of the deed. The case discloses the fact that there was sufficient room in the main building for such machinery as was placed within this annex. If, therefore, the plaintiff considered it for its interest or convenience to place some portion of the machinery necessary to the operation of its factory in this separate apartment, provided no more power was required to operate it than if it had all been under the same roof, it had a right so to do. The instructions of the court to which exceptions are taken were in accordance with the views we have here expressed, and were therefore correct.

Nor were the defendants' rights affected by the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not operate the factory more than a reasonable time, and that ten hours a day through the year is a reasonable time. The plaintiff's rights are not thus circumscribed. It is expressly stated that the plaintiff "has the first right to, and control of, all the water in said stream at the said dam and privilege, at all times and seasons of the year, for propelling its said factory and machinery for the factory building as before described." Having the right to the use of the water for the purposes of its factory, at all times and seasons of the year, it had a right to run its factory as many hours a day as it considered proper. Its deed contains no limitation upon the number of hours out of the twenty four each day in which it can run its factory. It is not for the court to restrict the time when the factory shall be operated, when the parties have not seen fit to do so.

Exceptions overruled.

Haskell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Trespass q. a. and d. b. for entering upon the plaintiff's land, and liberating a moose and deer there confined. The plaintiff had captured the moose and purchased the deer during close time. The defendant justified as game warden.

1. The defendant cannot be considered as having seized the game under any provision of statute, inasmuch as he held no precept either to arrest the plaintiff, or to seize the game, nor does he pretend that he ever had any intention of procuring one. His testimony that he acted by the consent of the plaintiff was not believed by the jury; and, as the evidence is conflicting upon that point, the court cannot say that the finding of the jury was wrong.

2. No property exists in wild animals so long as they remain in a state of nature, but when killed or reclaimed they become property,—absolutely when killed, and qualifiedly when reclaimed; for, when restored to their natural, wild and ferocious state, the dominion of man over them is at an end, and all property in them is extinguished. Case of Swans, 7 Coke, 16; Finch, Com. He has not justified the taking of the deer, for the plaintiff's possession of it is sufficient evidence of title until impeached. Moreover, the evidence shows that the plaintiff purchased the deer, and fails to show that it had been captured in violation of law. He therefore is entitled to recover the value of the deer. The instructions of the presiding justice relating to the deer were correct, and the evidence sustains the verdict for its value.

The New York Laws of 1883 authorize the fish and game protectors to sue for penalties in the same circumstances as actions therefor "might now or may hereafter be brought by any individual" under existing statutes. It was held that a judgment in an action brought by an individual was a bar to an action brought by the fish and game protectors. People v. Robbins, 39 Hun, 137.

Under the provisions contained in Laws 1883, chap. 317, § 1, an action to recover the penalties imposed for a violation of the Game Laws may, upon the request of a game protector, be brought by any district attorney, where the offense was committed in his county or in an adjoining county. People v. McDonald, 44 Hun, 303.

Under N. Y. Laws 1883, chap. 317, a district attorney cannot sue for the violation of Game Laws occurring outside of his own county. People v. McDonald, 11 Cent. Rep. 331, 103 N. Y. 433.

Under the Ohio Crimes Act it is unlawful to kill wild ducks on the land of another person, although within the channel of a navigable river, when the owner has set up a notice "No shooting or hunting allowed on these premises." State v. Shannon, 35 Ohio St. 422.

The right reserved to the owner of premises to use and employ ferrets to catch rabbits thereon, is personal to himself and those acting for him; he cannot permit their use to another, nor would his permission relieve the latter from the penalty prescribed by statute. *Hart v. soil, whose property it would have been, had he killed it. Blades v. Higgs, supra.

This court has said, in substance, that the law protects the title or claim of no one that arises from a violation of law. It has held that no action can be maintained upon a contract executed on Sunday; that the price of chattels sold in violation of law cannot be recovered, and that no action can be maintained on a note given for goods bought to be peddled contrary to law; that no action for a tort arising from transactions done by the plaintiff in violation of the Sunday laws can be maintained. The court says: "The law distinguishes between rights acquired in conformity with and arising under its provisions, and claims originating in their clear and palpable violation; that it will not enforce claims made in contravention of its mandates, nor protect property held against, and being used for, the deliberate purpose of disobeying its enactments. A different course would be suicidal. The law cannot lend its aid to the destruction of its own authority, and to the disobedience of its own commands." Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 429, 439.

Damages were claimed for preventing the plaintiffs from doing an illegal act which, if done, would have been criminally punishable, and the court says: "It is difficult to perceive how the prevention of an offense constitutes a valid cause of action on the part of the would-be offender, who is interfered with in the commission of his intended offense. It is still more difficult to understand how any damages can have been sustained by reason of such interference." Banger, O. & M. R. Co. v. Smith, 49 Me. 9.

Suppose a hunter has his rifle leveled at game in close time, and some one shoves it aside so that the game is missed. Shall the hunter have damages? He has only been prevented from continuing a criminal act.

Suppose lobsters illegally taken are thrown overboard alive. Is he who does it a trespasser? Shall the taker of them have damages for his illegal catch? Or suppose one lands a salmon in violation of law, and a bystander, while it is yet alive, throws it back into the water. Shall the fisherman have the value of the salmon that the law forbids his having at all?

When game is killed, it absolutely becomes property, but, when taken alive, only conditionally so; for, when released, property in it is gone. So long, then, as the possession of live game is illegal, qualified property in it is illegal also, and the releasing of such game interferes with no legal right or title of the person illegally holding it captive.

The plaintiff's possession of the moose was prima facie title, but, when it appears that his possession was gained in violation of law, it cannot be that the same law will say that his illegal act gave him a legal title; and if he had no legal title to the moose he has suffered no damages from its being set loose.

The plaintiff's illegal act prevented the moose from becoming property at all. Not so with the illegal act of a thief who may have stolen a coat; for the coat was already property, and had an owner, who alone could lawfully take it from the thief. The public, whose servant the defendant was, stands in the place of the owner of the coat. Care should be taken, 6 L. R. A.

therefore, not to confound the doctrines of this case with the well-settled rule of law that possession of property is a good title against everybody but the true owner.

4 Rev. Stat., chap. 80, § 9, provides: "No person shall [during close time] in any manner hunt, kill or destroy any moose, under the same penalty," of $100. The plaintiff followed the moose in the forest until it became snow-bound, and then, by the use of a rope, tied it to a tree, and finally bound it upon a sled, and hauled it some fifteen miles to his home, when he confined it until it was released by defendant. Without doubt, this conduct, resulting in capture, was in violation of the Statute. The plaintiff did not destroy or kill the animal, but he did hunt and thereby capture it.

The purpose and scope of the Statute is to give moose absolute immunity from the vexations of men during a portion of each year deemed by the Legislature necessary for their preservation and protection, and to prevent their decimation and extinction. The defendant's act, therefore, was meritorious, and in the aid of the purpose of the Statute; and, while his authority gave him no especial protection, still duty as an officer called him to interfere and prevent a continued violation of the Statute.

The contention that the game had been bonded by the plaintiff is not sustained. No bond signed and conditioned as provided by statute was ever given. It was so irregular that it was absolutely void.

Motions and exceptions sustained, unless plaintiff remits $100.

1. The words "all persons," in Rev. Stat., chap. 17, §§ 22, 24, requiring notice by those engaged in blasting before an explosion so that "all persons" or teams shall have time to retire to a safe distance, do not apply to the workmen in the quarries.

2. Fellow servants owe to each other the duty to exercise ordinary care and prudence in the prosecution of their work, and for failure to do so are liable at common law to each other for resulting personal injury.

(January 4, 1892.)

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from defendant's alleged negligence in firing a blast in a granite quarry without giving notice of it. Nonsuit.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph E. Moore for plaintiff.

Mr. Charles E. Littlefield for defendant.

Virgin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action by one workman in a granite quarry against his fellow workman, to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by a rock thrown from a blast discharged by the defendant. The case comes up on a report of the evidence; and, if the action is maintainable, it is to stand for trial for the assessment of damages.

The action is founded on Rev. Stat., chap. 17, §§ 23, 24, the material provisions of which, including the words in brackets found in the original Act of 1853, chap. 257, are as follows: (23). "Persons engaged in blasting lime rock, or other rocks, shall, before each explosion, give reasonable notice thereof, so that all persons or teams [that may be] approaching shall have [a reasonable] time to retire to a safe distance from the place of said explosion. (24). Whoever violates the preceding section . . . is liable for all damages caused by any explosion [when reasonable notice thereof was not given]; and if the persons engaged in blasting rocks are unable to pay, or after judgment and execution avoid payment . . . by the poor debtor's oath, the owners of the quarry, in whose employment they were, are liable for the same."

Is this statutory remedy intended to apply to workmen in quarries?

A literal construction of the words "all persons" would doubtless include them. Still, when read in connection with the other clauses of the Statute, we do not think the Legislature so intended. "Persons that may be approaching" seem rather intended to apply to those only who are not engaged in and about the quarry, and who, therefore, being ignorant of their proximity to danger, are seen coming within the danger line, instead of including with them such persons, also, as are constantly engaged there, and have personal knowledge of what is taking place there. That clause apparently limits the remedy to such outsiders as might unsuspectingly be approaching within the possible range of the blast, and the object of the "reasonable notice" to them is "so that they and their teams may have a reasonable time to retire to a safe distance."

Moreover, if the real intention of these provisions, derived from their language alone, left any doubt on this question, it is entirely removed by the further consideration that the other construction would make it in derogation of the common law; and, to warrant such a result, the intention should be clearly expressed. Dwight v. Dwight, 46 Me. 377; Carle v. Bangor & P. C. & R. Co. 43 Me. 369.

By the universally acknowledged rule of common law, when an employé, of age and intelligence, enters another's service, he is presumed to understand, and therefore, as between himself and his employer, and in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, to assume, all the ordinary risks incident thereto, and to measurably predetermine his wages upon the extent of the perils he is to encounter and assume, among which are those which he knows are more or less likely to occur through the occasional negligence of his co-employé. And, as it is utterly impracticable for the employer to absolutely prevent such negligence, and the best thing he can do in that direction is to employ such prudent workmen as are least likely to act negligently, therefore, if he has used proper care in respect of their selection, the employer is not responsible to any one of them for an injury resulting from the negligence of any other. But, if the Statute in question is intended to include workmen in quarries, then this long-established, salutary rule of the common law is thereby reversed; for the Statute expressly makes the employers liable for an injury occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant, if the one who causes it is unable to pay, or avoids. If such a radical change of the law governing the duties and liabilities of employers to their employes had been in the mind of the Legislature, we think the law-makers would have clearly and directly expressed such intention, and, even, not limited it to workmen in quarries, but extended it to other kinds of business involving more or less danger, and in which large numbers of employes are engaged.

This view finds apposite illustration in a decision of this court construing a statute defining the liability of railroad companies. Chapter 81, Rev. Stat. 1841, after providing for the erection of sign boards and gates, and stationing agents at crossings, and fixing penalties for non-compliance therewith, continued as follows. "Every railroad corporation shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of any neglect of the provisions of the foregoing section, or of any other neglect of any of their agents, or by any mismanagement of their engines, in an action on the case by the person sustaining such damages." Rev. Stat. 1841, chap. 81, § 21.

In an action by an employé against a railroad company to recover damages for an injury caused by another employé, the court, in deciding that the Statute did not apply, says: "Notwithstanding its literal construction [of the Statute] might entitle . . . any servant to recover for injuries occasioned by the fault of a fellow servant, still such a construction is wholly inadmissible. Statutes, unless plainly to be otherwise construed, should receive a construction not in derogation of the common law." And, after expressing the opinion that the Statute was not intended to change the nature of contracts between such corporations and their servants, the court continues: "If such had been the intention, we think it would have been more plainly or directly expressed. The words 'any person' . . . must be limited in their application to such persons as were not the servants of the corporation, . . . leaving such servants, who are presumed to have arranged their compensation with their eyes open, and to have assumed the relation with all its ordinary dangers and risks, without any remedy against the corporations for such injuries as may be incident to the service they have engaged to perform." Carle v. Bangor & P. C. & R. Co. supra.

Can the action be maintained at common law?

Some of the elementary writers seem inclined to the opinion that one servant is not liable to a fellow servant for negligence. Wharton, Neg. § 245; Wood, Mast. and Serv. § 335.

To maintain his action, the plaintiff must prove some contract or obligation from which, in legal contemplation, arises a duty, the breach whereof is alleged against the defendant, or facts establishing such a relation between himself and the defendant that such a duty will thence result, together with a breach thereof. Broom, Com. Law, 670.

There is no subsisting contract between fellow servants, and neither receives any compensation from the other. Neither is a party to, or has any interest or privity in, the other's contract with their common master. Their separate, independent contracts with him are only material as showing that they are, individually, rightfully on the premises, and engaged in the performance of their service there. The action cannot, therefore, be founded on any contract, but, if at all, on the defendant's misfeasance, which, even if it could be deemed a breach of his contract with his master, would not for that reason exempt him from liability to others injured thereby, provided such misfeasance was a violation of a duty springing from the relation between them. And we are of opinion that where two or more persons are engaged in the same general business of a common employer, in which their mutual safety depends somewhat upon the care exercised by them, respectively, each owes to the other a duty, resulting from their relation of fellow servants, to exercise such care in the prosecution of their work as men of ordinary prudence usually use in like circumstances, and he who fails in that respect is responsible for a resulting personal injury to his fellow servant. Such a liability would necessarily have a salutary influence in inducing care on their part.

The great weight of authority lies in this direction. Thus, where the plaintiff sued a railroad company to recover damages for the death of her husband, one of its employes, killed by the negligence of one of the defendant's engine drivers, Barnes Pollock and Huddleston, while they exempted the company because the death was caused by a fellow servant, said: "It is clear that an action would well lie against the driver of the engine, by whose negligent act the death was occasioned." Swanson v. North Eastern R. Co. 1 R. 3 Exch. Div. 841, 843.

A like dictum was made by Baron Alderson in Wignett v. Fox, 11 Exch. 883, 889, and by Baron Bramwell in Dogg v. Midland R. Co. 1 Hurlst. & N. 773, 780. And it has been directly adjudicated in Wright v. Barbergh, 2 Ct. Sess. Cas. 3d Series (Macpherson, L. & B.) 748; Hinde v. Harbou, 38 Ind. 131; Hinde v. Overaker, 66 Ind. 347; Griffiths v. Wolfram, 23 Minn. 183, and in Osborn v. Morgan, 130 Mass. 108, which last case expressly overrules Abre v. Jaquith, 4 Gray, 99.

The contrary doctrine "is not only destitute of sense," says the eminent author of "Thompson on Negligence," "but it involves the monstrous conclusion that one servant owes no duty of exercising care to avoid injuring his fellow servants." 2 Thomp. Neg. 1002. See also Addison, Torts, § 243; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 144.

Facts. In September, 1883, the defendant, a quarryman of twelve years' experience, was engaged in opening a new place in the quarry, by blasting off the outside layer of soft stone so as to uncover those fit for use which lay beneath, in sheets about two feet thick. He sunk his first hole fifteen inches deep in the front edge of the top layer, and charged it with "a little more than half a pound of powder." Next north was a table rock six or seven feet high. South, southeast and southwest of this place of blasting were two tiers of long, narrow sheds, extending easterly and westerly, seven or eight feet high, divided into bands, where quarried rocks were shaped and dressed. These sheds had narrow doors in each end for ingress and egress, with two sets of doors on their north and south sides,—the lower ones two and one half feet wide, and so constructed as to be taken out, and the upper ones three and one half feet wide, hung at their upper edges by hinges, and were opened by being swung upward.

The plaintiff was a quarryman and stone-cutter. He had cut stone there in May and June, and, after working July and August in the crew of one who then had charge of blasting, he returned to cutting again in September, when he was engaged in the extreme west end of shed No. 3, 265 feet south of the place of blasting. The north side doors, towards the blast, were closed to keep out the north wind, while the upper south door was open, and the lower one closed. When the blast exploded, a piece of rock weighing about ten pounds came through the north wall of the shed, above the closed upper door, and hit the plaintiff's back, while in a stooping attitude, and thence out of the south open door to an iron rail, where it broke.

The injury caused by this rock is the foundation of the action, and the particular complaint is that no notice was given to the plaintiff previous to the firing of the blast.

A careful examination of the mass of evidence reported satisfies us that the general notice usually given when a small blast is to take place was seasonably given, to wit, a cry of "Fire" three times made, with short intervals of time between them, before applying the fire, and that the explosion did not take place for several minutes thereafter. It also appears that when heavy blasts, which seldom occur, with twenty-five to fifty pounds of powder, are made, the custom is to send word to the several sheds. Frequently, when light blasts are fired, many workmen, on hearing the alarm, go into the sheds for protection, and those already in remain, and hence has grown up a sort of careless feeling of security on their part.

The plaintiff and some others in the same shed testify that they heard no alarm,—accounted for, perhaps, by reason of the din of their hammers, and the fact that the doors on the side next to the blast were closed. Still others in the same direction, and much further away, distinctly heard it.

But we think the plaintiff mistook his form of remedy, and that the real fault of the defendant was not in failing to give sufficient notice, but in not sufficiently covering the blast. It is absurd to say that rocks from a blast properly covered will fly as did those which rained down upon shed 3, one of which went through its board wall. The gross carelessness of such omission appears upon its face,—res ipsa loquitur. But there is no such claim in the declaration, and evidence thereof was therefore excluded. Neither is there any allegation, in terms, of negligence on the part of the defendant, or due care on the part of the plaintiff. We are of opinion, therefore, that this action is not maintainable.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Phlander W. FOBES, Rept.,

v.

ROME, WATERTOWN & OGDENSBURG
R. CO., Appt.

(.....N. Y.)

The construction and operation of a surface railroad along and upon a city street, substantially upon the same grade therewith, under authority from the Legislature and by permission of the city, is not a taking of any property of an abutting land owner, who has no title to any portion of the street which will entitle him to compensation either for interference with any of his easements in the street or for consequential damages to his adjoining property necessarily resulting from a reasonable operation of the road, where the use of the street is not exclusive in its nature and the passage through and across it is left free and unobstructed for the public.

(June, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendant from operating its road in front of plaintiff's property until it should make compensation to him for the damages thereby occasioned. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. William B. Hornblower, with Mr. Edmund B. Wynn, for appellant:

A steam surface railroad may be built and operated in the street of a city without any compensation to the owner of abutting property for injury to his property or its easements, provided the abutting owner has no title to the fee under the bed of the street, and provided the railroad is built without causing any unnecessary obstruction to the use of the street as a public street, and provided the railroad is operated in a reasonably prudent and careful manner.

The overwhelming weight of authority in other States is against the right of an abutting owner on a city street to compensation for the

It is within the power of a city to grant a railroad company the right to construct and operate its road over its streets. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Manley, 42 Kan. 377.

The right of a street railroad company to construct and operate its line is a franchise emanating from the sovereign power. See notes to Arbena v. Wheeling & H. R. Co. (W. Va.) 5 L. R. A. 371; People v. O'Brien (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 255; People v. Newton (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 174.

The city may authorize a railroad company to lay a track at grade and use it for the passage of its cars in common with other conveyances, although the contiguous property may be depreciated and egress be difficult, if the owners are not excluded entirely. For such incidental injury there is no redress, either public or private, unless in case of unreasonable delay in passing so as to encumber the street. Dwenger v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 68 Ind. 167; Tate v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 7 Ind. 478.

This court cannot restrain the construction of a railway for the benefit of the residents along streets and squares; if such residents are damaged by the construction they will be heard by the courts upon a proper case made. Savannah & T. R. Co. v. Savannah, 45 Ga. 303.

So held in a case brought by the city authorities to recover pecuniary compensation for the additional servitude placed upon streets and squares by the Legislature, where the corporation had the 3 L. R. A.

right to run a street railway. See 1 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 128.

To allow a street in a city or village to be used for a railroad track, either upon its natural surface, or by tunneling, is not a misappropriation of it, provided that such use does not interfere with its free and unobstructed use by the public, as a highway. Adams v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. 11 Barb. 420; Williams v. New York C. R. Co. 13 Barb. 246; Hudson & D. Canal Co. v. New York & H. R. Co. 9 Paige, 323, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 718.

A street railroad which does not materially interfere with the use of the street is not a nuisance per se. Hamilton v. New York & H. R. R. Co. 9 Paige, 171, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 658; Harris v. Thompson, 9 Barb. 384; Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 556; Anderson v. Rochester, L. & N. F. R. Co. 9 How. Pr. 556; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana (Ky.) 229; Hents v. Long Island R. Co. 13 Barb. 656.

The right to establish a railroad at the places where it was proposed to be constructed was challenged on the ground that compensation had not been provided for the taking of, or the injury to, private property, but the exception in that respect was not allowed. Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 313; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, supra; Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 508; Plant v. Long Island R. Co. 10 Barb. 26; *Adams v. Saratoga & W. R. Mr. C. P. Ruger, for respondent:

Every abutting owner is, by the mere fact of such ownership, the owner of an easement in the highway without regard to the nature of its origin.

Fritz v. Hobson, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 543; Adams v. Chicago, C. B. & N. R. Co. 30 Minn. 286; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heist, 38 Mich. 63.

The simple fact that the lot owner is liable to taxation, for the purpose of maintaining the adjacent highway, gives him an interest therein in the nature of an easement.

Lahr v. Metropolitan E. R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 871, 104 N. Y. 268; Abendroth v. New York Elevated R. Co. 23 Jones & S. 417.

Any interference with the highway which substantially impairs the abutter's easement is a taking of his property, unless such interference is by the proper authorities, directly or indirectly, for some ordinary street purpose, such as the establishment or change of a grade.

Drucker v. Manhattan R. Co. 8 Cent. Rep. 66, 106 N. Y. 157.

The owner of an easement can complain of the permanent appropriation of the street to uses which destroy or substantially impair his easement. The steam railway is such a use and the street permanently appropriated therefor.

Huener v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 114 N. Y. 423.

The elevated railway decisions have established a general rule of law under which the construction and operation of a steam surface railway is a taking of the abutter's easement.

Fanning v. Osborn, 34 Hun, 121, reversed in the Court of Appeals, 3 Cent. Rep. 453, 103 N. Y. 441, but upon another point.

The abutting owner's easement of light, air and access in and to the highway is private property, and, like other property, entitled to the benefit of the constitutional protection.

Story v. New York Elevated R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elevated R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 871, 104 N. Y. 268; Drucker v. Manhattan R. Co. 8 Cent. Rep. 66, 106 N. Y. 157; Arnold v. Hudson River R. Co. 55 N. Y. 661; White's Bank v. Nichols, 54 N. Y. 65.

This rule is not confined merely to elevated railways.

Some cases hold that any material obstruction, whether by the ordinary operation of the road or not, is considered a taking of property for which compensation must be made.

The modern tendency throughout the country manifestly is toward the protection of private property rights in these cases as being equally important to those of corporations. In several States late decisions have come out squarely in line with the principles of Story v. New York E. R. Co., 90 N. Y. 122, in their application to steam surface railways.

Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co., Scioto Valley R. Co. v. Lawrence and Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Bourne, supra.

Pockham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think that the defendant has, by its exceptions, duly raised the question argued before us. We are also of the opinion that the plaintiff's lot is bounded by the exterior line of the street in question, and that he has no title to the land to the centre of the street, subject to the public easement. The courts below held that the occupation and appropriation by defendant of a part of plaintiff's easement in Franklin Street is and always has been unlawful. To that conclusion the defendant excepted.

It admits that plaintiff had an easement in that street, but it denies that it has occupied or appropriated it.

Whether it has taken any portion of the plaintiff's easement in the street in question is what the defendant asks shall be decided by us, and it denies in toto any taking whatever of the plaintiff's property or any portion thereof.

For many years prior to the decision of the case of Story v. New York Elevated R. Co., 90 N. Y. 129, I think the law was that a duly incorporated railroad company, having authority from the State to build its road, and laying its tracks and operating its road through and upon the surface of the streets of a city under the protection of a license from such city, took thereby no portion of the property of an individual who owned land adjoining the street, but bounded by its exterior line. The company was therefore not liable to such an owner for any consequential damages to his adjoining property arising from a reasonable use of the street for railroad purposes, not exclusive in its nature and substantially upon the same grade as the street itself, and leaving the passage across and through the street free and unobstructed for the public use.

The first case in this State upon that subject, and decided more than forty years ago, is that of Drake v. Hudson River R. Co., 7 Barb. 508. This was a case decided by the General Term of the Supreme Court, sitting in the City of New York, and composed of three most able and learned judges, and I do not find that the principle involved in that decision has been reversed or overruled by any judgment of this court. That case holds the doctrine which I have above stated. It was elaborately argued on both sides by counsel as eminent at the bar as the State afforded, and the opinions of the learned judges are conclusive proof of the ability with which the case was considered by them.

In Williams v. New York Cent. R. Co., 16 N. Y. 97, it was held that the dedication of land to the use of the public for a highway is not a dedication of it to the use of a railroad, and such a road cannot be built upon it without compensation to the owner of the fee. It was in that case held to be another and an additional burden upon the land if used for railroad purposes, not covered by the dedication for ordinary street purposes, and hence the owner of the fee was entitled to a compensation for an additional burden to which he had never dedicated his property. It was not a mere additional use of an easement, but it was an actual taking of the land for railroad purposes (though not absolutely exclusive), and hence the owner was protected by the Constitution from such a taking without a compensation. The Drake Case was alluded to, but only for the purpose of pointing out the clear distinction between the two cases, and the court said the Drake Case involved simply the right of an adjoining owner on the street, who did not own the fee, to recover for incidental damages unavoidably resulting from the construction of the railroad in the street under authority of the law and with the permission of the city authorities, where no land or easement of the adjoining owner was taken. It was also stated that the Drake Case might be considered as settling the question that a railroad in a populous town is not a nuisance per se (of course when legally authorized), and that when the company has acquired the title to the land upon which its road is located, such company is not liable, unless guilty of some misconduct, for consequential damages resulting from the operation and use of its road. It has been regarded as having such title so far as the adjoining owner is concerned, who has no fee in the street, when, by authority of law and the consent of the city owning the street, its rails are therein laid upon the surface, and the use of the street for ordinary street purposes is not thereby prevented.

In Wager v. Troy Union R. Co., 25 N. Y. 526, it is assumed that there is no difference in kind or species between a railroad in a city street, operated by horse power, and one operated by steam. Smith, J., in writing the opinion in that case, says that such difference would present simply a question of degree in respect to the enlargement of the easement, and would not affect the principle. He also said that if the title to the Troy Street were in that city as the fee in the streets in New York is in the city itself, the mayor and common council of Troy might perhaps have authorized such appropriation of the street without compensation to the adjoining owners.

The case of Wager was followed in this court by that of People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188. It was there held that the legislative permission to lay down street railroad tracks without change of grade in those streets in the City of New York where the city owned the fee, was a sufficient justification for such action by the company, and that no compensation was necessary to be paid to the owner of the adjoining property. It was an appropriation to public use to provide for the construction of a street railroad through a street without change of grade. As this was a horse railroad the decision of the court must be regarded in the light of that fact. But still it is apparent that although a horse railroad was regarded as a different public use for a street from that which had heretofore obtained, yet it was such a public use as was not inconsistent with its continuous use as an open and a public street. There was no change of grade, and no continuous and exclusive possession of the street, except in a limited sense, by the mere laying of the rails therein.

I think there is no authority in this court which holds that there is any real difference between a railroad operated by horse power and one operated by the power of steam in the streets of the city. If the Legislature can authorize the one it can, under the same circumstances, authorize the other. I refer to railroads on the same grade as the street itself and where the chief difference lies in the different motive powers which are used.

In Orwig v. Rochester City & B. R. Co., 80 N. Y. 404, it was held that the owner of a lot on a street, who owned a fee thereof subject only to the public easement for a street, was entitled to compensation for the new and additional burden upon the land so used as a street, by the erection of even a horse railroad thereon. In this case Judge Miller said he saw no distinction in the application of the rule between cases of steam and cases of horse power.

In Kellinger v. Forty Second St. & G. St. F. R. Co., 50 N. Y. 206, it is held that one who did not own the fee of the street could not recover damages for inconvenience of access to his adjoining lands caused by the lawful erection of a street railroad through the street.

By these last two decisions it is seen that to construct even a horse railroad in a city street is to place a new and additional burden upon the land, the right to do which does not exist by reason of the general right of passage through the street; but if the adjoining owner of land is not the owner of the fee in the street, and the railroad company has obtained the proper authority, he has no right to compensation for such added burden, nor to complain of such use so long as it is not exclusive or excessive. The same reasoning applies, as we have seen, in the case of a steam surface railroad. Such a use of the streets would be an additional burden upon the land, and, of course, if the adjoining owner had title in fee to the centre of the street, subject only to the public easement, he would have a right of action, as held by the Williams and other cases, while if he did not, no such right would exist in his favor merely because it was a steam instead of a horse railroad which was to be constructed. The authority of the law and the consent of the city would be enough to authorize the building of either, and the difference between the steam and the horse railroad would not be one of such a nature as to require or permit any difference in the decision of the two cases. If the use of either became unreasonable, excessive or exclusive, or such as not to leave the passage of the street substantially free and unobstructed, then such excessive, improper or unreasonable use would be enjoined, and the adjoining owner would be entitled to recover damages sustained by him therefrom, in his means of access, etc., to his land. Atkady v. Bushwick R. Co. 91 N. Y. 149.

In Washington Cemetery v. Prospect Park & A. L. R. Co., 98 N. Y. 891, 898, Andrews, J., assumes the right of the Legislature to authorize the construction of a railroad on a street without exacting compensation from the corporation authorized to construct it, to the owner of adjoining land, provided such owners did not own the fee in the street. The Statute in the case cited permitted the use of steam on some portion of this road, so that Judge Andrews' remarks were not confined to horse railroads.

Assuming that the plaintiff had no title whatever to the land in the street through which the defendant laid its rails, and ran its trains under legislative and municipal authority, I think it is clear that prior to the decision of this court in the Story Case, 90 N. Y. 122, he had no cause of action against the defendant, based upon any alleged taking of the plaintiff's property or easement by defendant. If its user of the street became excessive, or exclusive, and hence degenerated into a nuisance, the plaintiff had another remedy.

The claim is now made that the Story Case, supra, and those cases which followed and are founded upon it, so far altered the law as to permit a recovery in all cases where the easement of the adjoining lot owner, through the building and operation of the road, is injuriously affected by any deprivation, or diminution of light, air or access to his lot, even though he do not own the fee to the centre of the street; and where such injury occurs, it is claimed that the property of the owner in his easement of light, air or access has been taken to a greater or less extent, and compensation is guaranteed to him therefor by the Constitution.

The Story Case did not intend to overrule or change the law in regard to steam surface railroads. The case embodied the application of what was regarded as well-established principles of law to a new combination of facts, such facts amounting, as was determined, to an absolute and permanent obstruction in a portion of the public street, and in a total and exclusive use of such portion by the defendant; and such permanent obstruction, and total and exclusive use, it was further held, amounted to a taking of some portion of the plaintiff's easement in the street for the purpose of furnishing light, air and access to his adjoining lot. This absolute and permanent obstruction of the street, this total and exclusive use of a portion thereof by the defendant, was accomplished by the erection of a structure for the elevated railroad of defendant, which structure is fully described in the case as reported. The structure, by the mere fact of its existence in the street, permanently and at every moment of the day, took away from the plaintiff some portion of the light and air which otherwise would have reached him, and, in a degree very appreciable, interfered with and took away from him his facility of access to his lot; such interference not being intermittent and caused by the temporary use of the street by the vehicles of the defendant while it was operating its road through the street, but caused by the iron posts and by the superstructure imposed thereon, and existing for every moment of the day and night. Such a permanent, total, exclusive and absolute appropriation of a portion of the street as this structure amounted to was held to be illegal and wholly beyond any legitimate or lawful use of a public street. The taking of the property of the plaintiff in that case was held to follow upon the permanent and exclusive nature of the appropriation by the defendant of the public street or of some portion thereof. If that appropriation had been held legal, any merely consequential damage to the owner of the adjoining lot, not having any title to the street, would have furnished no ground for an action against the defendant. It was just at this point that the disagreement existed between the members of this court in the Story Case. The judge who wrote one of the dissenting opinions did not think that the facts presented any different principle from that of any ordinary steam surface railroad operating its road through the streets of a city under the authority of the Legislature and of the municipality, in a case where the adjoining lot owner did not own the fee in the street. The character of the structure and all the facts incident thereto were regarded by him as simply resulting in an additional burden upon the street, somewhat greater in degree, it is true, than a steam surface railroad, but still it was such a use of the street as the Legislature might permit, and the Legislature having in fact granted it such power, the defendant was not responsible for the incidental damage resulting to one whose property was not in fact taken within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and the defendant did him therefore no actionable injury. The other dissenting judges were of the same opinion.

A majority of the court, however, saw in the facts existing in that case what was regarded as a plain, palpable and permanent misappropriation of the street or some portion of it to the exclusive use of the defendant corporation, and as resulting from it the court held that there was a taking of property belonging to the plaintiff without compensation, which no Legislature could authorize or legalize. But this taking, it cannot be too frequently or strongly asserted, resulted from the absolute, exclusive and permanent character of the appropriation of the street by the structure of the defendant. There is no hint in either of the prevailing opinions in the Story Case of any intention to interfere with or to overrule the prior adjudications in this State upon the subject now under discussion, as to steam surface railroads. In the Story Case it was argued that no real distinction in principle existed between a steam surface and an elevated railroad resting on such a structure as was proved in that case. This court, however, made the distinction, and the two prevailing opinions are largely taken up with arguments going to show that the distinction was obvious, material and important, and was so real and tangible in fact as to call for a different judgment than would have been proper and appropriate in the case of the ordinary steam surface railroad such as the Drake Case was.

Judge Tracy, in the Story Case, said that the conclusion reached in that case was based upon the character of the structure there involved, and that the language of Judge Wright in the Kerr Case, supra, where he asserted that the abutting owners had no property or estate in the land forming the bed of the street in front of their premises, must be construed with reference to the point then considered. In another portion of his opinion Judge Tracy said that no structure upon the street can be authorized which is inconsistent with the continued use of the street as an open public street. He also added that whatever force the arguments may have as applied to railroads built upon the surface of the street, without change of grade, and where the road is so constructed that the public is not excluded from any part of the street, it has no force when applied to a structure like that authorized in the present case. This, he says, is an attempt to appropriate the street to a use essentially inconsistent with that of a public street, and hence illegal. He does not pretend that the ordinary steam railroad, laid on the same grade as the street, and not excluding others from its use, appropriates the street to a use essentially or at all inconsistent with that of a public street. The use may be an additional burden laid upon the street, but nevertheless it is such a use as is entirely consistent with its continued use as a public street.

Judge Danforth, in his opinion, views the structure in much the same light. He cites the case of Corning v. Louerre, 6 Johns. Ch. 499, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 178, where Chancellor Kent restrained the defendant by injunction from obstructing Vesey Street, in New York City, by building a house thereon, and he says that the railroad structure designed by the defendant for the street opposite the plaintiff's premises is liable to the same objection, that is, it is as permanent in its character and as exclusive in its possession of that portion of the street, as was the defendant's building in the case cited. He further says that the street railway cases are in no respect in conflict with the doctrine announced in his opinion.

Other citations might be made from both opinions of those most learned and able judges, but enough has been shown to enable us to say with entire correctness that there was no intention in deciding the Story Case to reverse or overrule the cases in regard to steam surface railroads which have been already cited. Those cases include just such a case as is the one at bar.

Following the Story comes the Lahr Case, 104 N. Y. 308, 6 Cent. Rep. 571, and the principles decided in the former were reiterated in the latter case. It is difficult to see that any enlarged rule as to awarding damages in that class of cases has been definitely announced in the Lahr Case. The general rule to be adopted was agreed upon by the parties and involved an award once for all. The particular damage which the defendant was liable for, growing out of the existence of the defendant's structure, was held by three of the five members of the court then voting, to embrace any injury or inconvenience resulting from the unlawful structure, or any such injury or inconvenience as was incidental to the use thereof. Two of the five members were in favor of a more restricted rule, and they agreed simply in the result which affirmed the judgment of the court below.

Then came the Drucker Case, 106 N. Y. 157, 6 Cent. Rep. 66, and in it the principle was announced, as stated in the head note, that in awarding damages it was proper to prove and take into consideration as elements of damages the impairment of plaintiff's easement of light caused by the road itself and the passage of trains, and the interference with the convenience of access caused by the drippings of oil and water. This was held as a fair result from a holding that the structure was an illegal one, and to the extent above described the court held the plaintiff entitled to an award of damages. But the foundation for the recovery in all the cases above cited of any damages whatever, lies in the fact of the illegality of the structure.

Looking carefully over the cases involving the elevated railroads and their rights and liabilities, we cannot see that any new rule was adopted in any of those cases which would hold the defendant herein liable under the facts proved, for the taking of any property or any portion of an easement belonging to the plaintiff. On the contrary, we think the plaintiff's case is still governed by the case of Drake and the other cases in this court which have already been cited, and in which the principle decided in the Drake Case has been assented to and affirmed. Upon such facts it has been held that there was no taking of any property or easement of an adjoining owner who had no title to any portion of the land upon which the street was laid out, where the Company was authorized by law and licensed by the city to so use the street.

Plaintiff's counsel cites the case of Hussner v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 114 N. Y. 433, as bearing upon this question. We cannot see that it does. The use of steam on the portion of the road spoken of in that case was not permitted, and it was therefore unlawful, and for the damages caused to an abutting owner by reason of the nuisance the defendant was held liable.

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff made out no legal ground for an action against defendant based upon any alleged taking of his property by the defendant. If there are any facts which go to show that the use of the street by the defendant is excessive and in that way a nuisance, the recovery herein was not based upon any such liability and it cannot be sustained on that ground now.

The judgments of the Special and General Terms of the Supreme Court must be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur, except Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews, J., not voting.

Re Proof of Claim of ILION NATIONAL BANK, Resp't.

(....N. Y.)

A creditor of an insolvent has the right to prove and have dividends upon his entire claim, irrespective of collateral securities held by him.

(June 2, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant's receivers from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming an order of the Onondaga Special Term overruling exceptions to the report of a referee allowing a NOTE.—Rule of distribution of insolvent's estate among creditors, secured and unsecured.

The rules of the Bankrupt Law, that where a creditor holds the securities of third persons he may prove his whole debt, but in case he realizes on the security before proving he can prove only the balance remaining unpaid (Blumenstiel, Bankruptcy, 287), have not been uniformly applied in distributions under State Insolvent Laws; for in Massachusetts it is held that the creditor can share only on the deficiency of his debt after exhausting the security (Amory v. Francis, 18 Mass. 308), without recognizing the distinction as made in the Bankrupt Act between securities on the debtor's estate and those of third persons. See Cabot Bank v. Bodman, 11 Gray, 184; Richardson v. Wyman, 4 Gray, 553; Lanckton v. Wolcott, 5 Met. 305.

In Iowa, and by the earlier decisions of New York and Rhode Island, a creditor who has a claim secured by a lien is entitled to a dividend from the voluntary assignee of his debtor only on such residue of his claim as may remain unpaid after he has exhausted the property subject to his lien. Re Knowles, 13 R. L. 90; Strong v. Skinner, 4 Harb. 590; Beasley v. Lawrence, 11 Paige, 581, 5 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 240; Midgely v. Slocumb, 28 How. Pr. 426; Dickson v. Chorn, 6 Iowa, 19; Wurts v. Hart, 13 Iowa, 512.

This rule is in accordance with the established rule in equity that where one creditor has a lien on two funds, and another has a lien only on one of claim against defendant in insolvency proceedings. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This is an appeal by the receivers of E. Remington & Sons, an insolvent corporation, from an order of the general term affirming an order of the special term, which overruled their exceptions to the report of a referee upon the claim of the Ilion National Bank, a creditor. The defendant corporation was proceeded against by the people in an action for its dissolution on the ground of insolvency. Receivers were appointed and a reference ordered to take proof of claims.

The Ilion National Bank, this respondent, was a creditor to a large amount, and as collateral security for the payment of the indebtedness to it had received pledges of properties and securities. It made proof of its full claim against the insolvent corporation on the indebtedness theretofore created. The receivers objected that there should be deducted from the proof of claim the sums already realized by the respondent from the collateral securities and the value of the securities still held, and that the claim should be allowed for the balance only. But the referee allowed and reported the claim at the full amount, without regard to the securities or the sums realized therefrom.

Mr. William Kernan, for appellants:

Where one creditor has two funds of his debtor to which he can resort for payment, and another creditor has a lien on one of the funds only, equity will compel the first creditor to resort to that fund to which the lien of the other does not extend.

them, the former must exhaust the fund upon which the latter has no lien. Re Knowles, supra.

But the equitable rule that where one creditor has a lien upon two funds, and another creditor a lien upon only one of them, the former will be compelled to resort, in the first instance, to the fund upon which he has an exclusive lien, will not be enforced where it would operate to the prejudice of the party entitled to the double security. Bates v. Paddock, 7 West. Rep. 222, 118 Ill. 527; Sweet v. Redhead, 76 Ill. 374; Brown v. Cozard, 68 Ill. 173; United States v. Duncan, 13 Ill. 523; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1414.

In proceedings under the Insolvent Law, a secured creditor, not having sold or surrendered his security to the assignee, has no right to prove the secured debt, unless the assignee can treat the act of the creditor as a conclusive election to prove the debt, and a waiver and equitable release of the security to him. Nichols v. Smith, 3 New Eng. Rep. 507, 143 Mass. 455.

When the creditor who holds the security which comes within the terms of the statute inadvertently, by mistake either of law or fact, proves his whole debt without disclosing his security, and, before he has derived any advantage, or the creditors have suffered any detriment from his act, takes proper measures to waive or abandon his proof, and to pursue his rights as a secured creditor, according to law, he does not thereby waive

A mortgagee petitioned for the sale of his security and to be permitted to prove the full amount of his debt in the suit for the administration of the assets of the deceased mortgagor. It was held he could prove only for so much of his debt as might remain unpaid by the proceeds of the mortgaged estate.

Greenwood v. Taylor, 1 Russ. & M. 185; Brecklehurst v. Jenop, 7 Sim. 438.

The same rule is enforced as against creditors of insolvent estates.

Upon principles of equity and justice between the creditors, the rule is as we maintain. It was provided for by the statute in cases of bankruptcy, for the reason that it was just and equitable. It was enforced in England before any statutory provision.

Mr. A. M. Mills, for respondent:

The creditor is entitled to prove and have dividends upon his entire debt, irrespective of his collateral security.

The doctrine that where one creditor has a lien upon two funds for the payment of his debt, while other creditors of the same debtor have a lien upon one of the two funds, the first creditor will be obliged to resort to that fund upon which the second creditor has no lien, is never applied when it will in any manner trench upon the rights or in the least operate to the prejudice of the double-fund creditor.

Where the sufficiency of the fund, to which the junior creditor cannot resort, to pay the prior creditor's debt in full, is doubtful, or the prior creditor refuses to run the hazard of getting his pay out of that fund, the rule does not apply.

Overton v. Booth, 19 Johns. 436; Bernhardt v. Lymburner, 85 N. Y. 173.

The rule in bankruptcy, which requires that the collateral security be exhausted before the creditor draws a dividend, was purely statutory and does not govern us.

Mason v. Bogg, 3 Myl. & Cr. 443; Jervis v. Smith, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 217.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented for our consideration and determination by this appeal is whether the creditor of this insolvent corporation was entitled to prove and receive a dividend upon the full amount of the debt due from the insolvent estate, or whether the receivers, as the personal representatives of the insolvent, could reduce the claim of the creditor, for the purposes of a dividend, by counterfeit his security; nor do the unsecured creditors acquire an equitable right to it which can be enforced by the assignee. Ibid.

That he is entitled to a dividend only on that portion of his claim which remains unpaid after deducting the moneys received from the securities, is held in Third Nat. Bank v. Lanahan, 6 Cent. Rep. 425, 66 Md. 461.

The obligation of the trustee of an insolvent assignor to pay the latter's debt depends upon the state of the account between the creditor and the assignor at the time when payment is made. Ibid.

The creditor of an insolvent, holding a mortgage to secure notes given by the debtor, cannot claim to enforce the lien of the mortgage, and at the same time claim allowance from the estate for the face value of the notes. He will be deemed to have elected to claim his right under the mortgage. Gummersall v. Hanbloom, 1 West. Rep. 717, 19 Mo. App. 374.

The authorities are in conflict, and a plausible reason can be given for either view; but the weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that the dividend should be allowed on the whole claim. Paddock v. Bates, 19 Ill. App. 430; Findlay v. Homer, 2 Conn. 350; Moses v. Banlet, 2 N. H. 488; Logan v. Anderson, 18 B. Mon. 114; Patten's App. 45 Pa. 151; Keim's App. 37 Pa. 48; *Putnam v. The Pennsylvania decisions hold that a creditor is entitled to a dividend under an assignment not merely as a creditor but as an equitable owner of the assigned estate, and that the extent of his ownership is fixed by the amount of his claim when the assignment is made. Re Bates, 118 Ill. 629; Shunk's App. 3 Pa. 306; Keim's App. 37 Pa. 48; Brough's Estate, 71 Pa. 400.

So a creditor by bond and mortgage was held entitled to a pro rata dividend on his whole claim, even though he had collected the greater part of it out of the mortgaged property. Morris v. Olwines, 23 Pa. 441; Müller's App. 36 Pa. 481; Gruff's App. 78 Pa. 146; Bates v. Paddock, 7 West. Rep. 229, 118 Ill. 524.

A creditor may prove his whole debt without regard to any collateral security he may hold. If the dividend so reduces the debt that the collateral security will more than pay for it, the personal representative is bound to redeem for the benefit of the general creditors. Bates v. Paddock, supra.

Where a creditor held a trust deed to secure her claim, which had never been foreclosed, and her whole debt was provided for in the assignment, and was listed as one of the liabilities of the debtor, the whole is to be paid pro rata from the assets; and the amount of her dividend must be credited on the whole debt, and the mortgage foreclosed on the balance; and, should there be a surplus, it would go to the assignee. Ibid.

One having a lien on property for securing the payment of a debt against an insolvent debtor may retain the property and enforce his lien, if the assignee does not require it to be sold. Rogers v. Heath (Vt.) Jan. 8, 1880.

making a deduction from the amount of the proved debt of the value of collateral securities or of any proceeds thereof.

There are conflicting decisions upon this question in the courts of the United States; and in England, if we look back, up the current of opinions, we may find some differences in view. But the preponderance of authority is in favor of the view that the creditor has the right to prove and have dividends upon his entire debt, irrespective of the collateral security. In this State the precise question is without any controlling precedent. Two cases decided by the special term of the supreme court are to be found in the reports which perhaps bear upon the question. They arose under general assignments for the benefit of creditors and are conflicting. It may be said, therefore, that the field is open to us for review and determination. I think we must conclude that the view which I have mentioned as having the weight of authority in its favor is the one best according with the principles and established rules of equity jurisprudence, to which department of legal science the question pertains. Some confusion of thought seems to be worked by the reference of the decision of the question to the rules of law governing the administration of estates in bankruptcy; but there is no warrant for any such reference. The rules in bankruptcy cases proceed from the express provisions of the statute, and they are not at all controlling upon a court administering in equity upon the estates of insolvent debtors. The Bankrupt Act requires the creditor to give up his security in order to be entitled to his whole debt; or, if he retains it, he can only prove for the balance of the debt, after deducting the value of the security held. The jurisdiction in bankruptcy is peculiar and special, and a particular mode of administration is prescribed by the Act. To administer, in cases of insolvency coming within the jurisdiction of courts of equity, by analogy with the modes of bankruptcy courts is not required, and their precedents are not to be deemed as causing any change in the rules established by courts of equity for the marshaling and distribution of assets.

Suggestion is also made of a principle of equity, as controlling upon the question. It is, that where the creditor has two funds of his debtor to which he can resort for payment, and another creditor has a lien on one fund only, equity will compel a resort by the first creditor to that fund to which the lien of the other does not extend. But that is not exactly this case; nor is the principle, if it were, decisive. The author, whose statement of the principle is quoted from, has limited its application to such cases, where, to compel the first creditor to resort to the one fund, will not operate to his prejudice, or trench upon his rights. Story, Eq. Jur. § 603.

Judge Story assigns as a reason for the application of the principle, that by so compelling the creditor to satisfy his claim out of one of the funds no injustice is done to him in point of security or payment. The learned author's reason negatives the proposition that a secured creditor shall lose or forgo any advantage which he may have by reason of security, and § L. R. A.

through which the fullest satisfaction of his debt can be obtained.

In Swinton v. Scott, 19 J. Cas. 486, Spencer, Ch. J., held, with reference to the equitable rule invoked by the appellants here, that it is not to be enforced if it will "in the least impair the prior creditor's right to raise his debt out of both funds." And he emphatically remarked: "I know of no principle of equity which can take from him any part of his security until he is completely satisfied."

Where could any such principle have its origin? The agreement between the debtor and the creditor was that a debt should be paid. That debt is a definite quantity, and nothing less than its full amount can be said to be the debt. It is not altered or affected in its amount because the creditor may hold some collateral security. That is not a factor of the debt; but merely an incident to the debt. The very force and meaning of a collateral security are in the idea of a guaranty of the performance of the principal agreement which was to pay the debt. The property which a creditor holds as collateral to the indebtedness of his debtor secures him to that extent, in case his debt is not paid in full by the debtor, or by his estate.

As between the creditor and his debtor, the latter could not compel the former to resort first to his collateral before asserting his claim by a personal suit. The debtor has no control over the application of the collateral. It is the general rule of equity that the creditor is not bound to apply his collateral securities before enforcing his direct remedy against the debtor. Story, Eq. Jur. § 640. Lewis v. United States, 23 U. S. 615 (23 L. ed. 518).

Then on what principle can we hold that because the debtor becomes insolvent the contract with his creditor is changed, and that the creditor cannot, under those circumstances, enforce his direct claim against the debtor until he has realized on his securities? Is the rule capable of such inversion? I cannot see any reason in the proposition. I do not see why, in the absence of intervention by positive or statutory law, the engagements of parties should be varied.

If in bankruptcy another method was prescribed by the Statute for the proof and payment of debts, it was a matter purely within the discretion of the Federal Legislature. Its constitutional right to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States obviously included the power to prescribe the mode of marshalling the insolvent's assets for distribution among creditors, and, being the law of the country, it becomes a part of every contract. But this furnishes no reason why the established rules of courts of equity should be changed in the administration of the estates of insolvents.

In Kellock's Case, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 700, decided in 1868, it was held that in the winding up of a company, under the Companies Act of 1862, a creditor holding security might prove for the whole amount due to him, and not merely, as in bankruptcy, for the balance remaining due after realizing upon or valuing his security.

In Greenwood v. Taylor, 1 Rom. & M. 100, decided in 1880, it had been held that the pro-tice in bankruptcy furnished a precedent, which should be followed in the administration of assets; but, in Mason v. Bogg, 9 Myl. & Cr. 447, decided in 1837, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "That the principle which the decision in Greenwood v. Taylor professes to follow cannot be the principle of a court of equity, is further proved by the circumstance that in bankruptcy a particular mode is prescribed. A creditor may there prove; but then he must give up his security, or he may obtain an order that his security should be sold and that he should prove for the difference. In equity, however, a party may come in and prove without giving up or affecting his securities, except so far as the amount of his debt may be diminished by what he may receive."

Mason v. Bogg was a case of the administration of the insolvent estate of a deceased person, and Lord Cottenham further remarked, as to the rights a mortgage creditor, "a mortgagee has a double security; he has the right to proceed against both and to make the best he can of both. Why he should be deprived of this right because the debtor dies and dies insolvent is not very easy to see."

Then Sir Wm. Page Wood, speaking in Hellock's Case, supra, of the decision in Greenwood v. Taylor, said: "This court is not to depart from its own established practice, and vary the nature of the contract between the mortgagor and mortgagee by analogy to a rule which has been adopted by a court having a peculiar jurisdiction, established for administering the property of traders unable to meet their engagements; which property the court found it proper and right to distribute in a particular manner, different from the mode in which it would have been dealt with in the court of chancery. . . . We are asked to alter the contract between the parties by depriving the secured creditor of one of his remedies, namely, the right of standing upon his securities until they are redeemed."

So in this country we find that rule more generally prevailing which allows the creditor holding securities to prove and to receive his dividend on the whole debt. It is asserted in Judge Story's work on Equity Jurisprudence, § 524, and in the following cases: Re Bates, 118 Ill. 534; West v. Rutland Bank, 19 Vt. 409; Moss v. Banlet, 2 N. H. 488; Findlay v. Bessmer, 2 Conn. 850; Logan v. Anderson, 18 B. Mon. 114.

In Patten's App., 45 Pa. 151, it was held, in relation to an assignment made for creditors, that the unsecured creditor has no right to the benefit of the securities held by another creditor, until that other's whole debt was paid.

In Allen v. Danielson, 15 R. I. 480, 4 New Eng. Rep. 106, which was a case arising under an insolvent assignment, Durfee, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of that court, said: "According to the decided weight of authority the rule is to allow creditors to bring in their claims in full and have dividends accordingly."

That opinion is both well considered and able; and it deliberately overruled a prior decision of the court in the case of Knowles' Petition, 18 R. I. 90. The learned chief justice admitted the error into which they had previously fallen, and remarked that they would have decided the case differently, if they had then, as now, the same array of authorities presented, and that, in adopting the other view, not only the correct rule would be established, but the rule which was generally prevalent elsewhere. The counsel for the appellants finds decisions by the courts of Massachusetts, Iowa and Maryland, which undoubtedly conflict with the views we incline to. But I think that, whether we look at this question in the light of reason, or of the adjudged cases, the rule which best commends itself to our judgment is that which leaves the contractual relations of the debtor and his creditors unchanged when insolvency has brought the general estate of the debtor within the jurisdiction of a court of equity for administration and settlement. The creditor is entitled to prove against the estate for what is due to him, and to receive a dividend upon that amount. If the collateral securities are more than sufficient to satisfy any deficiency in the payment of the debt from the dividends, the personal representatives may redeem them for the benefit of the estate.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

1. Insanity which leads the person afflicted with it to make indecent exposure of his person in public renders him dangerous to community within the meaning of Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 5142-5150, which provide for the restraint of such persons at public expense and the reimbursement of the public treasury out of their estates.

2. County commissioners are not authorized to enter into contracts for the care and support of persons in the county anytime for the poor, which are organized solely for the purpose of public charity and benevolence; hence no recovery can be had by them upon a contract to pay for care and support furnished to an inmate.

3. The law raises no implied obligation on the part of one received into a charitable institution for support or treatment to pay therefor in the absence of a contract; such relief is referred to motives of charity unless the charter or by-laws of the institution provide that compensation may and shall be demanded.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover compensation for care and support furnished to an insane person. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Burford for appellants.

Messrs. Kennedy & Kennedy for appellee.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1878 John W. Hulett was adjudged a person of unsound mind, incapable of managing his estate, and was accordingly placed under guardianship by order of the Circuit Court of Montgomery County. At the September Term, 1874, the guardian appeared before the Board of Commissioners of the County and represented that his ward was possessed of an estate amply sufficient to pay for his board and care, and that, as guardian, he was willing to enter into an agreement with the County Board to pay $8 a week for the board and care of his ward. It was thereupon agreed between the Board and the guardian that the insane ward should be received into the county asylum for the poor, to be boarded and cared for under the supervision of the superintendent of the asylum at the price of $8 per week, and an order was made upon the Commissioners' record accordingly. The ward died in 1887, leaving an estate valued at $9,000. The Board of Commissioners thereupon filed a claim against his estate, in which they set out the foregoing order and agreement, and alleged that the Board had fully complied with its agreement, and that there remained due the County something over $400 on account of board and care furnished the decedent.

By way of inducement it is alleged that the insane ward was wholly incapable of taking care of himself; that he was dangerous and indecent in his habits; that the guardian had no suitable or safe place in which to confine him; that he had been unable, after repeated efforts, to procure anyone to take charge of and care for him, and that he therefore made application to the Board of Commissioners, as above, to have him admitted into the county asylum, where a suitable place had been prepared to keep and take care of such persons as he was.

The question is whether or not the Board of Commissioners was entitled to recover for what remained unpaid at the death of the ward, either upon the contract specially pleaded or for the value of the board and necessities furnished as upon an implied promise to pay.

The facts as presented make it apparent that the person against whose estate this claim is being prosecuted was insane and dangerous to community, within the meaning of the Statute. One whose insanity is of such a character as to lead him to make indecent exposure of his person in public, and who, on that account, becomes a constant menace to public morality and decency, is as certainly dangerous to community, if suffered to remain at large, as is one who threatens physical injury to others. The Statute, §§ 5142-5150, makes provision whereby such persons may be restrained, under the order of the circuit court, at the public expense. Provision is also made whereby the public treasury may be reimbursed out of the estate of a person dangerously insane, in case he is possessed of an estate. This Statute looks to the protection of the public from those whose insanity makes them dangerous to the community. It has in it no feature of charity to the individual, nor was it enacted with a view to benevolence. If proceedings had been taken under this Statute and the person adjudged insane and dangerous to community had become a charge upon the public treasury, it would have been within the power of the County Commissioners, by the very terms of the Statute, to collect the charges out of the estate of the insane person. Rev Stat. 1881, § 5147.

No regard was paid to the above Statute. The Constitution provides for the establishment and support of certain benevolent institutions, and confers power upon county boards "to provide farms as an asylum for those persons who, by reason of age, infirmity or other misfortune, have claims upon the sympathy and aid of society." Const. art. 9, § 8.

The Legislature, in devising a charitable scheme for the care and support of the poor, enacted that "every county should relieve and support all poor and indigent persons lawfully settled therein," and that it should be lawful for county commissioners to purchase a tract of land, and to build, establish and organize an asylum for the poor, and employ some humane and responsible person to take charge of them. Rev Stat. 1881, §§ 6060-6069.

The Statute provides that all poor persons who have become permanent charges on the county may be received into and supported in the county asylum, and the county commissioners are authorized to assess a tax for the support of the poor and for the establishment and maintenance of an asylum; but we find no authority for a county board to admit anyone into the county asylum by contract or to receive pay for the care and support of anyone admitted into the institution. The organizing and maintenance of county asylums for the poor, and the care and support of those who are admitted into them, is a part of a scheme of unmixed public charity and benevolence which was inaugurated under the express sanction of the Constitution.

An institution organized for the avowed purpose of bestowing or administering charity, unless specially authorized by its charter to do so, cannot contract to bestow what purports to be a benefaction for a price or to dispense charity for pay. The Statute nowhere authorizes county commissioners to enter into contracts for the care and support of persons in the asylums organized for the care and support of the poor, nor is there any implication that persons who are admitted into these asylums can be so admitted by contract with the county commissioners. In Wilder and County v. Hildebrand, 1 Ind. 655, it was held that the provision made by law for the support of the poor was purely charitable, and that a husband could not be held liable for board, lodging and support furnished to the county asylum to his wife. Again in Noble County v. Reynolds, 51 Ind. 416, it was held that a contract made by the husband of an insane wife with a board of commissioners for her support in the county asylum was invalid, and that no recovery could be had by the county, even though it had performed the contract. The case first cited was decided in 1840, before the adoption of the present Constitution. The doctrine distinctly enunciated in that case is that the county commissioners have no power to convert an institution that was intended as a public charity into a boarding house for such as wished accommodation for themselves, or for their relations, for pay.

A convention to revise our Constitution, and more than twenty successive Legislatures, have met and adjourned since that decision was promulgated, and all have accepted it as a correct exposition of the spirit and purpose of the Constitution and laws under which provision has been made for the relief of the poor. All the existing laws in relation to those asylums have either been enacted or re-enacted since the decisions above mentioned were promulgated, and yet there is nowhere, even by implication, any power conferred upon county boards to admit persons of any degree or station into a county asylum for pay or by contract. More than forty years ago this court declared, in effect, that these institutions were organized for purely charitable and benevolent purposes, that the work done in them was to be the part of the public in the great labor of love for the unfortunate, that was to be done without money and without price; and the Legislature, the immediate representative of the people, during all this time, has accepted the decisions of this court as correct interpretations of the spirit and purpose of the Constitution and laws. After this great lapse of time we are now asked to overturn the decisions thus acquiesced in, so as to authorize an institution that has all this time been regarded as a noble public charity, to be converted, in part at least, into a house of private entertainment by contract with the county commissioners. If county commissioners may make a contract with the guardian of an insane ward, or the husband of an insane wife, to care for and board the ward or wife, they may enter into contracts with guardians of minor children to have them boarded at the asylum for the poor at an agreed price, or they may enter into contracts with husbands whose wives are not insane for a like purpose. When it is thought advisable to change the policy of the State so as to authorize county asylums to be converted into places for confining and keeping insane persons by contract, or for boarding those who are not agreeable to other members of the family, the change ought to be made by the Legislature, and not by the courts. Our conclusion is that the contract relied on was unauthorized and beyond the power of the County Commissioners, and that no recovery can be had thereon. Nor can there be any recovery upon the quantum meruit as upon an implied contract or promise. It is a thoroughly settled proposition that where one is received into a charitable institution for support or treatment the law imposes no implied obligation to pay in the absence of a contract. When an individual is received into an institution established solely for benevolent purposes, the law refers his reception and the relief administered to him to motives of charity, unless the charter or by-laws of the society or institution provide that compensation may and shall be charged. An institution or society, no more than an individual, can assume to be dispensing charity and at the same time create a pecuniary obligation against one to whose necessities it ministers. The way-faring man who fell among thieves may have been as rich as Dives, but became under no implied obligation to reimburse the good Samaritan, who set an example of charity by pouring oil and wine into his wounds, and by lodging him at an inn at his own expense. Services which were intended to be gratuitous at the time they were rendered cannot afterwards be used as the basis of an implied promise to pay. Ramsey v. Ramsey, 121 Ind. 215-222.

In St. Joseph's Orphan Society v. Walpert, 80 Ky 86, it appears that a charitable institution organized for the purpose of educating and maintaining orphan children sought to recover from a guardian the value of raising and maintaining his wards, the children of a deceased soldier. The wards had been raised by the society, with the avowed purpose of bestowing upon them an education as a matter of charity. Learning afterwards that the guardian had in his hands a considerable sum of money which had been paid him by the United States government as pension money, the society brought suit. It was held that the society having been created for charitable and benevolent purposes, it could not recover for board, care and education of orphans, whose control it had taken with the avowed purpose of bestowing charity. County asylums having, as we have seen, been organized for purposes of charity and benevolence only, the commissioners having no power to admit persons by contract for pay, the law will not raise an implied obligation or promise on the part of one admitted to pay for the value of his board and support. The law will imply that he was admitted through motives of charity. We are aware that there are decisions in some of the States that seem to hold a contrary view. Courts in other States, however, hold to the views enunciated by this court in the cases cited. Our opinion is that the subject is not now open to the courts of this State for further examination, until the Legislature shall have intervened. Whether an overseer of the poor who has furnished temporary relief to a wife or child wrongfully deserted by a husband or parent, can recover from the person in default upon an implied or constructive promise we do not inquire. What we hold is that a person who is admitted into a county asylum organized for the support of the poor cannot be charged therefor either upon an express or implied contract.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

Berkshire, Ch. J., and Olds, J., dissenting:

We are compelled to dissent from the opinion of the court, and briefly state some of the reasons which lead us to a different conclusion.

Conceding that under the law the contract alleged in the appellant's complaint was one which it had no legal right to make, it does not follow that the appellant might not enforce it or recover upon a quantum meruit. The guardian of the decedent might, under the circumstances, enter into such a contract, and after his ward was taken into the county asylum and cared for pursuant to the contract, it did not lie in his mouth during the lifetime of the decendent, nor of his administrator thereafter, to deny the authority of the appellant to enter into the contract. It appears that the parties all acted in good faith, and in the light of the circumstances, that which was done was for the best, not only for the decendent, but for the public.

The decendent was an insane person and his condition was such that the public good as well as his own benefit required that he be confined. He had an ample estate to compensate those who might care for him, but no private person could be found prepared and willing to assume the burden and responsibility. The appellant was so situated that it could take the decendent to its poor asylum and give him proper care and attention without in any way abridging the rights and privileges of others supported at said institution. Under such circumstances we can imagine no satisfactory reason why the appellant should not be reimbursed. Every element of an estoppel is present.

The opinion of the court in the main rests upon two former cases decided by this court: Switzerland County v. Hildebrand, 1 Ind. 555; Noble County v. Schmoke, 51 Ind. 416.

The last of these cases was decided by a divided court, two out of three of the judges dissenting.

Not only are we of the opinion that these cases are not sound in principle, but we find them to be out of line with the great weight of authority. See Howard v. Whetstone Twp. 10 Ohio, 865; Springfield Twp. v. Denott, 18 Ohio, 104; Hanover v. Turner, 14 Mass. 227; Jasper County v. Osborn, 59 Iowa, 208; Templeton v. Stratton, 128 Mass. 187; Bangor v. Wiscasset, 71 Me. 535; Dakota v. Winneconne, 55 Wis. 522; Chester County v. Malany, 64 Pa. 144; Turner v. Hadden, 62 Barb. 480; *Werte v. In our opinion the judgment ought to be reversed.

Messrs. Foss & Fisher, for defendant in error:

The failure of the servant to do the business or perform a duty imposed on the master is the failure of the master, and if injury results the master is liable.

When it is said that the master is not responsible for the willful wrong of the servant the language is to be understood as referring to an act of positive and designed injury not done with a view to the master's service or the purpose of executing his orders.

Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 120.

This element is not in the case at bar; no injury resulted from the act of using the torpedoes.

Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby and Orabon v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra.

The court held in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Harmon, 47 Ill. 298, and in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dickson, 58 Ill. 151, that when the engineer used the whistle to frighten horses the company was liable for the injury resulting.

Cooley, Torts, pp. 537, 538.

The injury did not result from the direct and positive act of the servant in using the torpedoes, but from a failure on the part of the servant to do the master's business, with which he was intrusted.

Henrick v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 10 Sawy. 80, 20 Fed. Rep. 100, 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 450.

Minshall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit below was an action by Shields, a small boy, prosecuted by his next friend, against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company for an injury caused by the explosion of a torpedo, wantonly and negligently left on its track by one of its servants, at a point where the children and inhabitants living along the line of the track were daily in the habit of passing with the knowledge and acquiescence of the Company. The torpedo, a dangerous instrument, used by the Company as a signal in the operation of its road, was picked up by a companion of the plaintiff, carried some distance away and caused to explode by one of them hitting it. They were ignorant of its character, and at the time trying to satisfy their curiosity about it. The same accident caused the injury for which the original action in Harrison v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co., 45 Ohio St. 11, 9 West. Rep. 438, was brought, the judgment in which was reversed by this court, for error in sustaining a demurrer to the petition; and the petition in the Harrison Case is substantially the same as in this case.

After the decision in the Harrison Case, the defendant below filed an answer in this case, the second defense of which, and to which a demurrer was sustained, is as follows:

"The defendant, for its second defense, says that it carries upon its trains signal torpedoes to be used in addition to its regular signals, when, from fog or other cause, the other signals cannot be seen or relied upon, and that if said torpedo was placed upon the track as alleged in said amended petition, by the employees of this defendant (a fact which defendant wholly denies), that then said employees placed the same upon the track, at a time and place in broad daylight, when and where there was no necessity for the use thereof, or of any signals of any kind whatsoever, and that said use was without the knowledge or consent or authority, express or implied, of the defendant; was against and contrary to its rules and regulations, as said employees well knew, and that said torpedo was so used by them outside and beyond the scope of their employment, and in no wise connected with the control, management or operation of said train of cars or railroad, and was so placed for the accomplishment of an independent and wrongful purpose of their own, to wit: that said employees, or one of them, while said train was taking water at said water tank, for the purpose of having sport with some lady passengers who were upon said train, took torpedoes from the place where kept on said train, and without the knowledge of said lady passengers, with whom said employees were well acquainted, placed the same upon the iron rails of the track, in front of the wheels of the caboose in which said lady passengers were riding, with the intention to frighten them by the sudden and unexpected explosion of said torpedoes, which would result with a loud noise by the passage of the caboose over them: when said train started forward, one of said torpedoes failed to explode, and was found as stated in said amended petition."

The sustaining of the demurrer to this defense is assigned for error. There is also an exception to the ruling of the court in refusing to charge as requested. But this ruling need not be noticed, as it presents simply the same question as is presented by the demurrer to the answer.

It would seem that the question raised by this defense was presented by the demurrer to the petition in the Harrison Case, and determined by the decision of this court therein,—the fourth proposition of the syllabus being, in substance, that the Railroad Company was liable for the negligence of its servant, in placing and leaving the torpedoes on its track at a point where the public, including children, were permitted to pass, "notwithstanding such negligent acts of the servant were wanton, reckless and needless."

But the counsel for the plaintiff in error think that it was not, and claim that there is clear error in the case for the reason that the act of the conductor in placing the torpedoes on the track was a mere caprice of his own, outside of his employment as a servant, and contrary to the rules of the Company; and that therefore the Company is not liable.

We do not adopt this view, and shall show that the negligence of the conductor in this regard, though wanton and contrary to the rules of the Company, occurred within his employment, and is therefore imputable to the Company.

The law requires of persons having in their custody instruments of danger that they should keep them with the utmost care. 1 Hilliard, Torta, 3d ed. 127.

"Sometimes," says Pollock, "the term 'consummate care' is used to describe the amount of caution required, but" he says, "it is doubtful whether even this is strong enough. At least, we do not know any English case of this kind (not falling under some recognized head of exception) where unsuccessful diligence on the defendant's part was held to exonerate him." Pollock, Torta, 407. See also Wharton, Neg. § 351.

And it stands to reason that one charged with a duty of this kind cannot devolve it upon another, so as to exonerate himself from the consequences of injury being caused to others by the negligent manner in which the duty in regard to the custody of such an instrument may be performed. Speaking of the absolute duty imposed by statute in certain cases, or, also, the duties required by common law "of common carriers, of owners of dangerous animals or other things involving by their nature or position special risk or harm to neighbors," Pollock observes, "The question is not by whose hand an unsuccessful attempt was made, whether that of the party himself, or of his servant, or of an 'independent contractor,' but whether the duty has been adequately performed or not." Pollock, Torta, 64.

We in no way limit nor question the soundness of the general rule, which exonerates the master from liability for the acts of his servant done outside of his employment. What has been stated is strictly within the reason and principle of the rule, which is that whatever the servant is intrusted by the master to do for him must be done with the same care and prudence that would be required of the master, acting in that regard for himself; if it be the custody of dangerous instruments, he must observe the utmost care.

The inability of the master to shift the responsibility connected with the custody of dangerous instruments, employed in his business, from himself to his servants intrusted with their use, is analogous to, and may be said to rest upon the same principle as that which disallows him from shifting to an independent contractor liability for negligence in the performance of work that necessarily tends to expose others to danger, unless the work is carefully guarded. It seems by the great weight of authority and reason that this cannot be done. See Ohio Southern R. Co. v. Morley, 47 Ohio St. —, 7 L. R. A. 701, and cases there cited. Also see Lawrence v. Shipman, 30 Conn. 536, 539; Cooley, Torta, 2d ed. 644, 646.

And the relation of master and servant and that of employer and independent contractor are, in this regard, treated in one view by Pollock in his work on Torta, as will appear from consulting his work at page 64.

Now, in this case, it must be observed that the duty intrusted by the Railway Company to the conductor in regard to these torpedoes was, not only to use them as signals with the requisite care and caution, but to observe like care and caution in the custody of them, when not in use. The servant's custody of them when not in use was as much a part of his employment as was the use of them as signals when required. In taking them from the place where they were carried when not in use, and, in mere caprice, placing them on the track for the purpose of frightening the ladies, he was not, it is true, within his employment as to the use of them; but, in so doing, he violated the duties connected with his employment as the custodian of them, and thereby made his master liable for the consequences of his neglect, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if it had been done by the Company itself.

It is necessary in this and in all similar cases to distinguish between the departure of a servant from the employment of the master, and his departure from, or neglect of, a duty connected with that employment. A servant may depart from his employment without making his master liable for his negligence when outside the employment of the master; and he so departs whenever he goes beyond the scope of his employment and engages in affairs of his own. But he cannot depart from the duty intrusted to him, when that duty regards the rights of others in respect to the employment of dangerous instruments by the master in the prosecution of his business, without making the master liable for the consequences; for the first step in that direction is a breach of the duty intrusted to him by the master, and his negligence in this regard becomes at once the negligence of the master; otherwise the duty required of the master in respect to the custody of such instruments employed in his business may be shifted from the master to the servant, which cannot be done so as to exonerate the master from the consequences of a neglect of the duty.

To better illustrate the ground of this distinction, we may, for example, suppose a servant, with others under his control, employed with a construction train repairing the track of his master. He may, for a time, quit his employment, and, with his men, go off on affairs of his own. Whilst thus out of the master's employment, he may build a fire, which, through his negligence, may consume the property of another; and, in the meantime, loss of life and property may result from a collision with the train negligently left standing on the track. Now whilst, as has been held, the master would not be liable for the loss resulting from the fire, because the act was done outside the servant's employment (Morier v.

St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 81 Minn. 351), yet it is equally certain that, for the loss occasioned by the servant's negligence in leaving the train on the track, the master would be liable in damages, for the plain reason that, in abandoning the custody of the train, he was guilty of negligence in the employment of the master, whilst, in building the fire, he was not.

That what was done by the conductor contravened the purpose and instructions of the Company, in regard to the use of these torpedoes, does not vary its liability for the negligence of the conductor in the custody of them.

In discussing the master's liability for his servant, it is said by Professor Wharton: "It is not necessary, in order to make the master liable, that there should be specific directions as to the particular act. It is enough if the general relation of master and servant, within the range of such act, exists. The question is simply whether the wrong inflicted was incidental to the discharge of the servant's functions. It may have been capricious. It may have contravened the master's purposes or directions. But a master who puts in action a train of servants, subject to all the ordinary defects of human nature, can no more escape liability for injury caused by such defects than can a master, who puts machinery in motion, escape liability, on the ground of good intentions, for injury accruing from defects of machinery. Out of the servant's orbit, when he ceases to be a servant, his negligences are not imputable to the master. But within that orbit, they are so imputable, whatever the master may have meant." Wharton, Neg. § 100. See also Wood, Mast. and Serv. § 280; Cooley, Torts, 682 (589*).

The custody of these torpedoes was within the servant's orbit. Negligently leaving them on the track was a negligence within that orbit, and therefore imputable to the master. If a master has a duty to perform and intrusts it to a servant, who disregards it to the injury of another, it is immaterial, so far as the liability of the master is concerned, with what motive or for what purpose the servant neglects the duty. This is illustrated by the case of Wood v. Panama R. Co., 17 N.Y. 362, which was an action against the company for a failure to carry the plaintiff to her destination with reasonable dispatch. The delay was caused by the willful act of the conductor in wrongfully detaining the train at a station, and which the defendant claimed exonerated it from liability. But the court held otherwise, it being observed, among other things, in the opinion, that "the obligation to be performed was that of the master, and delay in performance, from intentional violation of duty by an agent, is the negligence of the master."

We do not see that this in any way conflicts with the decision in Little Miami R. Co. v. Watmore, 19 Ohio St. 110. There the plaintiff got into a quarrel with the baggage-master of the company about checking his baggage; and under the influence of anger, the latter struck the plaintiff with a hatchet, and it was held that the company was not liable for the injury. A hatchet is not an instrument of danger, within the rule above stated—it includes only such instruments as are such within themselves. The danger of a hatchet is in the hand and spirit of the man who may use it. If, in this case, the instrument left on the track had been a hatchet, the Company would not have been liable to a child who might afterwards have picked it up and been injured by it. For the Company would have been under no such duty, as to its custody, as it was under in regard to this dangerous explosive.

Judgment affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Julius BELOW, Rept.,

v.

T. H. ROBBINS, Appt.

(....Wm....)

1. A judgment for conversion of exempt property, including costs, is itself exempt.
2. The right to pay a debt to the sheriff, if he has an execution against the creditor for the amount due, under Rev. Stat., § 2008, does not extend to a judgment which is exempt because rendered for the value of exempt property.
3. Trever and replevin being concurrent remedies, the fact that a party could have replevied exempt property will not prevent him from claiming as exempt a judgment for the conversion thereof.
4. Costs on motion are regarded on appeal as in the discretion of the court below.
5. Orders entered after decision of motions will not be set aside to try issues then raised for the first time.

(April 29, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from certain orders of the Circuit Court for Langlade County.

S. L. R. A.

denying defendant's motion to quash an execution, granting plaintiff's motion to cancel the satisfaction of the judgment, and denying defendant's motion to re-open the first two orders, in an action to recover damages for a wrongful levy upon, and sale of, certain property exempt from execution sale. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Bloodgood, Bloodgood & Kemper, for appellant:

Section 2028, Rev. Stat., provides that "after the issuing of execution against property, any person indebted to the judgment debtor may pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to satisfy the execution, and the sheriff's receipt shall be a sufficient discharge for the amount so paid."

A judgment is the highest form of indebtedness, and if this Statute provides a valid release from a simple-contract obligation (Kibbes v. Howard, 7 Wis. 150; Judd v. Littlejohn, 11 Wis. 176), how much more must it apply to a debt the amount of which is judicially found and determined by a court of competent jurisdiction.

A judgment for the conversion of exempt property is not itself also exempt.

Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419; Mallery v. Norton, 31 Barb. 424; Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 808.

Granting that the value of the exempt property might still be held exempt, a part of the judgment is for damages and costs and does not in any way represent the exempt property.

Tillotson v. Wolcott, 48 N. Y. 190.

Mears, Lynch & Latta, for respondent:

The judgment debtor in this case had no right to pay the amount of the judgment to the sheriff in satisfaction of the execution issued upon the Mock judgment.

Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 804; Tillotson v. Wolcott, 48 N. Y. 188; Naumbury v. Hyatt, 34 Fed. Rep. 898, Montgomery County v. Riley, 75 N. C. 144; Gaster v. Hardie, 75 N. C. 460; Comstock v. Bechtel, 68 Wis. 656; Marcell v. Reed, 7 Wis. 593.

Articles exempted from sale on execution by § 2083, Rev. Stat., of chapter 78, are exempt absolutely to all persons.

Knapp v. Bartlett, 23 Wis. 68; Humphrey v. Taylor, 45 Wis. 251; Spikes v. Burman, 65 Wis. 426; Puett v. Beard, 88 Ind. 173, 44 Am. Rep. 390; Curlee v. Thomas, 74 N. C. 51; Wilson v. McBrey, 32 Pa. 62; Duff v. Wells, 7 Heisk. 17.

There are clear distinctions between the proceeds of exempt property, exempt from attachment, where said property has been voluntarily sold by a debtor, and where taken from him by proceedings against his will, and changed into money.

Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 748; Stebbins v. Packer, 20 Vt. 280; Kay v. Rines, 87 Vt. 260; Mitchell v. McHoon, 11 Kan. 617; Houghton v. Lee, 50 Cal. 101; Cooney v. Cooney, 65 Barb. 524; Tillotson v. Wolcott, 48 N. Y. 190; Watkins v. Blatchinabi, 40 Wis. 117.

Plaintiff was entitled to have the pretended satisfaction of the judgment set aside.

Manders v. Sherman, 18 Wis. 575; Andrews v. Rouse, 28 How. Pr. 126.

Cole, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not denied that the judgment against the defendant in this case was for the wrongful conversion of property exempt from sale upon execution. In other words, it was for the conversion of a stock of goods, selected and kept by the plaintiff for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, not exceeding $300 in value. The Statute expressly exempts that amount of stock. Subd. 8, § 2083.

The defendant, as sheriff, had wrongfully seized and sold the stock upon an execution issued on a prior judgment against the plaintiff in favor of S. T. and F. E. Mock, judgment creditors.

After the judgment for the conversion of the exempt property was rendered and docketed, the defendant therein attempted to discharge it by paying the amount thereof to the sheriff of Langlade County, taking a receipt for the same, who had in his hands an alias execution issued on the Mock judgment. This was done in pursuance of § 2028 Rev. Stat., which, it is claimed, authorizes such payment. Therefore the question presented is, Does that section of § L. R. A.

the Statute authorize such a payment and discharge of this judgment for the conversion of exempt property? The section reads: "After the issuing of execution against property, any person indebted to the judgment debtor may pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to satisfy the execution; and the sheriff's receipt shall be a sufficient discharge for the amount so paid." We are clearly of the opinion that this provision was not intended to include, and should not be applied to, a judgment for the value of exempt property. If such a judgment could be discharged by applying the amount on another judgment against the person claiming the exemption, the spirit and policy of the Statute would be defeated, in many cases. This court has uniformly held that the Exemption Laws must have a liberal construction, so as to secure their full benefit to the debtor. It would be useless to grant the privilege contained in these laws if it could be defeated or rendered of no possible value by allowing the judgment for the conversion of exempt property thus to be satisfied. Unless the judgment itself is held exempt, or enjoys the privileged position which the property had which it represents, the debtor is not protected. This is very obvious. Public policy requires such a construction of the above provision that it will not impair in any degree the beneficial intent of the Exemption Law.

In the language of Commissioner Leonard, when considering a kindred question in Tillotson v. Wolcott, 48 N. Y. 188: "Public policy requires such a construction of the Statute as will insure its full benefit to the debtor. It would be useless to grant the privilege contained in the Statute if it could be rendered of no effect by refusing an adequate remedy for the invasion of the exemption, or by permitting a recovery, when obtained for such invasion, to be wrested from the debtor by proceedings on behalf of creditors. The judgment, when recovered by the debtor for the wrongful invasion of his privilege of the exemption of his property from levy and sale, represents the property for the value of which it was recovered." Page 190.

In the case where this language was used, it was sought to reach by proceedings supplementary to execution a judgment recovered for the value of exempt property, and it was held that it could not be done. Montgomery County v. Riley, 75 N. C. 144.

It is said the party entitled to the exemption could in this case have fully protected himself by bringing his action of replevin, and have recovered the exempt property. But the counsel on the other side gives a complete answer to this position by saying that the action of trover and replevin are concurrent remedies, and that the plaintiff could pursue either remedy; and further, that, under the Statute of Replevin, the defendant could bond the property, in which case the plaintiff's judgment would be for the recovery of the property or its value. We do not think the plaintiff lost his exemption by bringing the action in the form he did. The judgment for the exempt property is exempt, we think, contrary to the intimation in Mallery v. Norton, 31 Barb. 424.

In Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419 (Gil. 806), the Supreme Court of Minnesota reached a different conclusion, and held that the exemption did not attach to the judgment which represented the value of the exempt property. But we must hold otherwise, because we think that the exemption of the Statute must attach to it, in order to give full effect to the intention of the legislation upon the subject.

In Watkins v. Blutschinski, 40 Wis. 847, it was decided that the money due a judgment debtor from the purchaser of his homestead as a part consideration therefor, and which the debtor intended in good faith to apply to the purchase of another homestead, was not liable to garnishment. It was said that the right given by the law to a debtor to sell and convey the homestead free from all liens would be a barren right, so far as the owner was concerned, if the proceeds of the sale could not be protected until they reached the hands of the vendor, or while in transition from one homestead sold to another purchased. So here it may be said the privilege of the exemption of the stock of goods would be a barren right if the judgment rendered for its value could be discharged by applying the amount on another judgment against the debtor.

The entire judgment, in this case, was exempt, including the costs taxed in the action brought to vindicate the right which the law secured the debtor.

It follows from these views that the orders entered on the 21st day of October, 1889,—one denying the defendant's motion to set aside and quash the execution in the action, and the other granting the plaintiff's motion to set aside and cancel the satisfaction of judgment, and declaring the judgment in full force,—must both be affirmed. The costs on the motion were in the discretion of the court, and we shall not disturb the action of the court on that point. Counsel says, on the motion to set aside the execution, there was not the slightest allusion in the motion papers to the matter of exemption. This position is not sustained by the record. Robbins says, in substance, in his affidavit, that he tendered the balance due on the judgment to the attorneys of the plaintiff, and that they refused the tender "upon the ground that the judgment herein was for exempt property belonging to the plaintiff."

We do not think there was any error in the ruling of the court denying the defendant's motion to re-open the first two orders. The court had already decided and entered these orders, and it would have been irregular to set them aside and try a new issue raised at that stage of the proceedings, as to whether or not the plaintiff had other exempt property.

The three orders appealed from are affirmed. Lyon, J., took no part.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Julien L. HERRESHOFF

v.
A. BOUTINEAU.

1. A contract restraining the exercise of one's calling for a certain time is not necessarily void upon grounds of public policy simply because the restraint extends throughout an entire State.

2. A contract not to teach the French or German language, or aid or advertise to teach them, or be connected in any way with any person, persons or institutions that teach them, in the State of Rhode Island during the year

NOTE.—Contracts in partial restraint of trade.

Contracts for a limited restraint of trade are valid if entered into for good reasons, such as to afford fair protection to the purchaser of a business. Chappel v. Brockway, 21 Wend. 157; Nobles v. Bates, 7 Cow. 307; Beitchew v. Hamilton, 8 G. Greene (Iowa), 503, 4 G. Greene, 317; Hedge v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 137; Smalley v. Greene, 52 Iowa, 241; Jenkins v. Temple, 30 Ga. 655; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223; Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206; Perkins v. Lyman, 8 Mass. 523; Pike v. Thomas, 4 Bibb, 486; Story, Eq. Jur. § 292; 1 Addison, Cont. §§ 272, 506; Powell, Cont. 102.

Where the restraint contracted for appears to have been for a just and honest purpose, for the protection of the legitimate interests of the party in whose favor it is imposed, reasonable as between the parties, and not specially injurious to the public, the restraint will be held valid. Hubbard v. Miller, 27 Mich. 16, 19; Guerand v. Dandelot, 32 Md. 502; Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490; Ewing v. Johnson, 24 How. Pr. 202; Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206; Hedge v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 137, 140.

An agreement between partners, that one of them alone shall conduct the business, is not void as in restraint of trade. Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 59 U. S. 18 How. 269 (15 L. ed. 385).

Secrets of art, not patented, are not within the scope of the law against restraint of trade. Thus, it has been decided that a trader may sell a secret to his trade, and restrain himself, personally, from the use of it. Bryson v. Whitehead, 1 Sim. & Stu. 74; Vickery v. Welch, 19 Pick. 523. See also Jones v. Lees, 1 Hurst. & N. 189; Metcalf, Co. L. 275.

Restrictions as to time.

It is no objection to a covenant in partial restraint of trade that it is unlimited as to time. Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 9 Cent. Rep. 151, 106 N. Y. 473.

A contract in restraint of the exercise of a profession, unlimited as to time, but in other respects reasonable, is valid. French v. Parker (R. L.) 6 New Eng. Rep. 494.

Whether a contract in restraint of trade, which is to endure during the life of the promisor or covenantor, is reasonable or not is an undecided question in this State, and such contract is not therefore enforceable by injunction. Mandeville v. Harman, 5 Cent. Rep. 625, 42 N. J. Eq. 185.

The presumption is that a contract in restraint of trade is void. Ibid.

A contract not to engage in a particular trade or business in a certain place within a specified time is valid. Arnold v. Kreutzer, 67 Iowa, 214; Hedge v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 137; Smalley v. Greene, 52 Iowa, 241; Baumgarten v. Broadway, 77 N. C. 8; Tallis v. Tallis, 1 EL. & BL. 391.

An agreement by a vendor of a mercantile business and its good will, as part consideration, that he will not for five years engage in the same business in the same village, is valid. Washburn v. Daesch, 66 Wis. 429.

after the end of a term of employment as teacher, is unreasonable because the restraint extends beyond any apparently necessary protection to the other party, unless it is shown that the latter would be seriously injured by such teaching in any part of the State.

(April 14, 1899.)

SUIT to enjoin the breach of a contract not to teach the French or German language for a certain time within the State of Rhode Island. On demurrer to bill. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Albert A. Baker for respondent, in support of the demurrer.

Mr. Amasa M. Eaton for complainant, contra.

Stinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The complainant, director of a school of languages in Providence, employed the respondent to teach French from January 7, 1889, to July 1, 1889.

The contract, in writing, provided that the respondent would not, during the year after the end of his service, "teach the French or German language, or any part thereof, nor aid to teach them, nor advertise to teach them, nor be in any way connected with any person or persons or institutions that teach them, in the said State of Rhode Island."

The respondent's service ended July 1, 1889, after which time he gave lessons in French, in Providence. This suit is brought to restrain him from so doing within the time covered by this contract. The respondent demurs to the bill, contending, first, that the contract is void on the ground of public policy, because it imposed a general restraint throughout the State; and, secondly, because it is unreasonable. Is the contract void? For a long time, beginning with the Year Books, contracts limiting the exercise of one's ordinary trade or calling met with much disfavor in the courts. Any limitation whatever was considered, in the first reported case (Year Book, 2 Hen. V., 5, pl. 26), so far contrary to law that a plaintiff suing thereon was sworn

In Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Nev. 552, an agreement by a solicitor, for valuable consideration, not to practice as a solicitor in any part of Great Britain for twenty years, was held valid. See also Davis v. Mason, 5 T. R. 119.

An agreement by a physician, in consideration of purchase of office and business, not to practice medicine or surgery in a given vicinity thereafter, was held to be valid and binding in Doty v. Martin, 22 Mich. 422.

In Holbrook v. Waters, 9 How. Pr. 522, it was held that an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, not to practice medicine, nor in any manner to do business as a physician in the County of Oswego, at any time from the first day of May, 1851, was valid.

In Mott v. Mott, 11 Barb. 187, a physician sold his interest in an office, furniture, etc., and an established practice, to his partner for a given consideration, and agreed not to practice medicine in the town where the office was located for five years; and the court held the restriction, as to extent of territory and length of time, reasonable for the protection of the party, and the contract binding, citing, in support of this position, Chappel v. Brookway, 21 Wend. 157; Ross v. Badgbeer, 21 Wend. 158; Fitchcock v. Coker, 4 Ad. & El. 428; Leighton v. Wales, 5 Mem. & W. 543; Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 143; *Mallan v. The test to be applied in determining whether a restraint is reasonable or not is to consider whether it is only such as is necessary to afford a fair protection to the interest of the party in whose favor it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interest of the public. Mandeville v. Harman, 5 Cent. Rep. 622, 49 N. J. Eq. 124.

Restriction as to locality.

A contract in restraint of trade as to a particular place is valid. Chappel v. Brookway, 21 Wend. 157; Jenkins v. Temple, 22 Ga. 625; Smalley v. Greene, 22 Iowa, 341; Hedge v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 187; Guerard v. Dandelot, 22 Md. 587; Deal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 400; Ewing v. Johnson, 24 How. Pr. 522; Pierce v. Woodward, 5 Pick. 304.

Where a contract is divisible, and is valid as to the place in which made, although void as to the stipulation not to do business "elsewhere," the consideration being sufficient, inquiry will not be made into its adequacy. Smith's App. 5 Cent. Rep. 304, 122 Pa. 572.

A contract restraining one of the parties thereto from the exercise of a trade within a limited locality, when there is reasonable ground for the restriction, is valid. Ibid.

In consideration that A would take B as an assistant in his business as a surgeon, for as long a time as should please A, B agreed not to practice on his own account for fourteen years within ten miles of the place where A resided; and the court held the contract valid. See Bunn v. Guy, 4 East, 102; Gale v. Reed, 5 East, 50.

In Smalley v. Greene, 22 Iowa, 341, 342, the defendant had, for a valuable consideration, agreed not to practice law in a specified town, and the contract was held to be valid.

In Bunn v. Guy, 4 East, 102, a contract entered into by a practicing attorney to relinquish his business and recommend his clients to two other attorneys, for a valuable consideration, and that he would not himself practice in such business within 100 miles of London, was held to be valid. See also Heleeb v. Hamilton, 2 G. Greene, 582, 4 G. Greene, 317.

If a physician, under a valid contract not to practice in a certain place, is visited at a neighboring place, without his solicitation, by patients from the former place, he has the right to treat them, but their solicitation is no excuse for doing so in the place prohibited. Haub v. Van Horn (Pa.) March 21, 1892.

On the sale of a business, a covenant not to engage in the same business anywhere in the United States, excepting Nevada and Montana, is a partial restraint of trade, and valid. Peckham, J., dissenting. Diamond Match Co. v. Eosher, 9 Cent. Rep. 121, 102 N. Y. 472.

The successor and assignee of the purchaser may enforce the covenant. Ibid.

A restraint of trade, embracing an entire State, is not necessarily general. Ibid.

Where a barber, without shop, patronage or good will to sell, forms a partnership of indefinite duration, and stipulates never to do any barbering in the town outside the shop of his partner, the stipulation is unreasonable and will not be enforced. See note to Carroll v. Giles (S. C.) 4 L. R. A. 154.

Contracts in partial restraint of trade may be valid, and if divisible they are not vitiated by one illegal provision. See note to Carroll v. Giles, supra.

at by the judge and threatened with a fine. But it was soon found that, to some extent at least, such contracts help, rather than harm, both public interests and private welfare; that they are necessary to trade itself, in order to secure the sale, at fair value, of an established business, by protecting it against the immediate competition of the seller, also to enable one to learn a trade or to get employment from another, free from the risk of having the knowledge and influence thus gained used to the employer's damage; to encourage investment in business enterprises under reasonable safeguards and for other equally evident reasons. Accordingly, exceptions to the early doctrine were recognized from time to time, until the leading case of Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, when the court established the rule that a contract in restraint of trade, upon consideration which shows it was reasonable for the parties to enter into it, is good, "that wherever a sufficient consideration appears to make it a proper and a useful contract, and such as cannot be set aside without injury to a fair contractor, it ought to be maintained; but with this constant diversity, viz., where the restraint is general not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom, and where it is limited to a particular place,—for the former of these must be void, being of no benefit to either party, and only oppressive."

It is to be observed that the contract in this case was limited in time to five years, the term of the lease of a bakehouse, which the plaintiff had bought of the defendant, and also limited in space to the Parish of St. Andrew's, Holborn. The case, therefore, did not call for decision upon a contract running throughout the kingdom. Nevertheless it has since been commonly assumed, as the settled rule of law, that such a restraint is contrary to public policy, and void. The principle upon which this rule is put is, that the public have the right to demand that every person should carry on his trade freely, both for the prevention of monopoly and of unprofitable idleness. The argument is, if the restraint is general throughout the realm, the public interest is interfered with, since the party restrained can only resort to his trade for a livelihood by expatriation. But, if the restraint be local and partial, the party and the public may still have the benefit of his services in his own land, in some other place. While this distinction has frequently been recognized, the cases in which it has had the sanction of a decision have been few.

In Rouillon v. Rouillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, Fry, J., mentions only two, and these, he says, seem to have been decided upon the ground of unreasonableness, rather than upon the ground of universality. In other words, the universality was held to be unreasonable. This case, following Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 355; Jones v. Lee, 1 Hurlst. & N. 120, and Leather Cloth Co. v. Lornant, L. R. 9 Eq. 345,—expressly holds that there is no absolute rule that a covenant in restraint of trade is void, if it is unlimited in regard to space.

The respondent urges that Rouillon v. Rouillon has been overruled by the recent case of Davies v. Davies, L. R. 36 Ch. Div. 355; but we do not think this is so. While Cotton, L. J., showing great willingness, if not anxiety, to overrule it, based his opinion upon the ground that the restriction was void, because unlimited in space, Bowen, L. J., did not put his decision on that ground, and Fry, L. J., adhered to his opinion in Rouillon v. Rouillon. That Davies v. Davies was not received in England as overruling the last-named case, see note to this case in Law Quarterly Review, vol. 4, 240. In view of these cases, we do not think it is now the rule in England that restraint throughout the kingdom is absolutely void.

In this country the cases have been quite similar to those in England. In the recent case of Diamond Match Co. v. Rosser, 100 N. Y. 473, 9 Cent. Rep. 181, Andrews J., says "It is worthy of notice that most, if not all, the English cases which assert the doctrine that all contracts in general restraint of trade are void, were cases where the contract before the court was limited or partial. The same is generally true of the American cases." In that case the defendant covenanted, for the period of ninety-nine years, not to engage in the manufacture or sale of friction matches, within any of the States or Territories of the United States, except Nevada and Montana. The complainant sought to restrain a breach of that covenant in New York, the respondent claiming that the covenant, being general as to New York, was void. But the court declared it to be valid, in a strong and thorough opinion, showing the history of litigation, and the tendency of recent judicial decisions upon this subject. Taking this case in connection with Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Wanser, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64 (30 L. ed. 315), we think it cannot be said here, any more than in England, that a restraint is absolutely void, upon grounds of public policy, because it extends throughout a State.

Public policy is a variable test. In the days of the early English cases, one who could not work at his trade could hardly work at all. The avenues to occupation were not as open nor as numerous as now, and one rarely got out of the path he started in. Contracting not to follow one's trade was about the same as contracting to be idle, or to go abroad for employment. But this is not so now. It is an every-day occurrence to see men busy and prosperous in other pursuits than those to which they were trained in youth, as well as to see them change places and occupations without depriving themselves of the means of livelihood, or the State of the benefit of their industry. It would therefore be absurd, in the light of this common experience now, to say that a man shuts himself up to idleness or to expatriation, and thus injures the public, when he agrees, for a sufficient consideration, not to follow some one calling within the limits of a particular State. There is no expatriation in moving from one State to another, and from such removals a State would be likely to gain as many as it would lose. We do not think public policy demands an agreement of the kind in question to be declared void, and we do not think such a rule is established upon authority. We therefore hold that the agreement set out in the bill is not void simply because it runs throughout the State.

Is the contract unreasonable? Courts should be slow to set aside as unreasonable a restriction which has formed a part of the consideration of a contract; yet, when it is a restriction upon individual and common rights, which only oppresses one party without benefiting the other, all courts agree that it should not be enforced. In determining the reasonableness of a contract, regard must be had to the nature and circumstances of the transaction. For example, if one has sold the good will of a mercantile enterprise, receiving pay for it, upon an agreement not to engage in the same business in the same State, for a certain time, such a stipulation would stand upon quite a different footing from a similar stipulation of a mere servant in an ordinary local business. In many undertakings, with modern methods of advertising and facilities for ordering by telegraph or mail, and sending goods by railroad or express, it would matter little whether one was located at Providence or Boston or some other place. In such cases a restriction embracing the State, or even a larger territory, could not be said on that account to be unreasonable; for without it the seller might immediately destroy the value of what he sold and was paid for. But it is unreasonable to ask courts to enforce a greater restriction than is needed. So it has been uniformly held that restrictions which go too far are void. As was said in the note of the Law Quarterly Review, above cited: "Covenantors desiring the maximum of protection have, no doubt, a difficult task. When they fail, it is commonly because, like the dog in the fable, they grasp at too much, and so lose all."

Besides the matter of protection, the hardship of the restriction upon the party and the public should also be considered. In the present case, we think the restriction is unreasonable,—not as a rule of law because it extends throughout the State, but because it extends beyond any apparently necessary protection which the complainant might reasonably require, and thus, without benefiting him, it oppresses the respondent, and deprives people in other places of the chance which might be offered them to learn the French and German languages of the respondent. The complainant urges that he has established a school in Providence, at great expense, to teach languages by a new method, where scholars come from all parts of the State, and that by reason of the small extent of the State, and the ease of passing to and fro within it, such a restriction is reasonable and necessary to keep teachers from setting up similar schools, and entailing away his scholars. All this may be true with reference to Providence and its vicinity. But while, as is averred, many pupils from all parts of the State may come to Providence, as a center, for the same reason few would go to other places. For example, a school in Westerly or Newport would not be likely to draw scholars from Providence, or places from which Providence is more easily reached. Indeed, the complainant says he offered after the contract was made, and now offers, to allow the respondent to teach in Newport, thereby admitting that the restriction is greater than the necessity. The people of Newport, Westerly and other places have the right to provide for education in languages without coming to Providence. It is hard to believe, and the bill does not aver, that losing the few, if any, from some such place who might leave the complainant, if the respondent were to teach there, would seriously affect the complainant's school. Teaching in Providence, or in any place from which the complainant receives a considerable number of pupils, might affect it, and a restriction limited accordingly might be reasonable; but we think it is unreasonable to go further. The complainant bought nothing of the respondent whose value he now seeks to destroy. He hired the latter as a teacher at no more than fair wages. He needs and has the right only to be secured against injury to his school, from teachers who may entice away his scholars, after leaving his employ. The contract clearly goes beyond this.

The demurrer must be sustained.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF the State of MICHIGAN

v.

Herman FOSS, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A strip of grass left to grow in a rural or country road on the side of the beaten track belongs to the owner of the fee, and he has the right to harvest it.

2. A person has no right from mere caprice or express malice to drive upon and destroy a strip of grass growing between the two ditches on the sides of a highway, in the space usually known as the wrought or traveled part of the road, but on the portion of which another person owns the fee.

3. Merely pushing off the horses of another from grass which one is entitled to cut in a highway, where the other is wantonly endeavoring to cut it, is not a trespass.

NOTE.—Easement; owner of soil right to use of highway.

By the common law, the fee in the soil remains in the original owner where a public road is made upon it; but the use of the road is in the public. Barclay v. Howell, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 498 (8 L. ed. 477).

If the road should be vacated by the public, the owner resumes the exclusive possession of the ground. Ibid.

Title remains in the owner of the soil, on its appropriation for a public highway. See note to Ill. 8 L. R. A.

note Cent. R. Co. v. Houghton (Ill.) 1 L. R. A. 213; New Jersey Z. & I. Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. (N. J.) 1 L. R. A. 122.

In Massachusetts, where a mere easement is taken for a public highway, the soil and freehold remain in the owner of the land; and upon the discontinuance of the highway, the soil and freehold revert to the owner of the land. Harris v. Elliott, 26 U. S. 10 Pet. 23 (9 L. ed. 228).

On the appropriation of land for an easement the owner retains every right in the soil not inconsistent with the use.

acting to spoil the grass, and then defending against the latter's attack, does not make one guilty of assault and battery.

(May 2, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Clair County convicting him of an assault and battery. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Avery, Jenks & Avery, for defendant, appellant:

Defendant, being the owner of the fee, was the owner of this grass, and being the owner of it and having property rights in it, he had all the rights incident to the ownership of property and among these the right to protect and preserve it; and for the purpose of harvesting it he had a right to go into the highway, and the complaining witness had no right to interfere with defendant in the exercise of this right.

It was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether it was necessary for the complaining witness to drive on this grass in order to have the usual rights of one of the public in the free and ordinary use of the public highway; he did not as a matter of law have the absolute right to go on this grass and destroy it and render it worthless merely because his fancy or caprice might lead him there.

The defendant and his father had a perfect right to protect their own property and prevent complainant from destroying it, which he was doing at the time the assault occurred.

Drew v. Comstock, 57 Mich. 181.

Mr. Seward L. Merriam, for the State, appellee:

The fact that grass was growing in the highway where intended and prepared for public travel, is simply the result of public caprice in selecting generally one track instead of many while exercising the continuous right, at all times, that each person enjoys of traveling such portion of the wrought highway as he sees fit so long as he does not interfere with the lawful public (not private) rights of others.

Daniel's v. Clegg, 25 Mich. 26; Pigott v. Engle, 60 Mich. 226.

A highway is a public way for the use of the public, and the restrictions on its use are only such as are calculated to secure to the general public the largest practical benefit from the enjoyment of the easement.

Any part of a highway may be used by the traveler, and in such direction as may suit his convenience or taste.

In Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 265, 49 Am. Dec. 244, it was held that grass in the highway was private property as against the right of another to graze or pasture it. This is as far as the court could be expected to go. Grazing and pasturing are not the public rights to which highways are dedicated, but on ent with the easement. Platt v. Pennsylvania Co. 1 West. Rep. 17, 43 Ohio St. 288.

the contrary are a hindrance and annoyance thereto.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was convicted of assault and battery upon one August Steiman in justice's court. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court for the County of St. Clair, he was again convicted by the verdict of a jury. He brings his case to this court upon exceptions before judgment.

The place of the alleged assault was in a public highway, and, as the defendant claims, upon that portion of the same within the half adjoining his father's lands. The farm of the complainant lies opposite his father's, and on the other side of this highway. There is a ditch running close to the fence on defendant's father's side of the road. Between this ditch and the usually traveled track of the highway there was a strip of grass land, from a rod to a rod and a half in width, extending the whole length of the father's premises. Grass had grown there many years, and, when in condition, had been cut, sometimes by defendant and his father, and occasionally by Steiman. There had been more or less controversy about this grass, which finally culminated in the affray causing this suit. The defendant lived with his father. On the 15th of June, 1899, Steiman was drawing rails from his fence, on the Smith side of the road, to his orchard, using the highway for that purpose. He was drawing the rails upon a crotch between three and four feet wide. Steiman, after loading, drove on the north side of the center of the road, outside of the beaten or traveled track, and upon the grass. Defendant was mowing. Steiman claims that he told defendant to get out of the way. The elder Foss was there with a bushel basket and rake, gathering the cut grass into the basket. They acted as if they did not hear Steiman, and he "told his horses to get up, and the boy then went on the north side of the road, and the old man stood on the south side of the road; . . . and as I went by the boy cut my horse on the back side with the scythe with which he had been mowing." They had some hard words, and Steiman testifies that as he was driving on defendant came up behind him, and struck him twice on the neck. Steiman was corroborated in his testimony by his son. Defendant testified that Steiman came across the road and drove his team upon him, that he threw his scythe into the fence corner, and shoved the horses back with his hands. Steiman dropped his lines "and hauled off," and said: "I will kill you." "When I see he was going to hit me, I pushed him back. I gave him two pushes,—one after the other; and, when he see I was pushing him, he went straight across the road and got a scythe, and came up to me, and hauled off three times, and says: 'I cut you in two.'" Defendant stepped back out of his way, and finally Steiman went away, with threats of future hurt to defendant. Defendant was supported in his testimony by the evidence of his father.

The record also states that other witnesses were produced by the prosecution who gave testimony in corroboration of the facts testified to by Steiman and his son; and the defendant produced other witnesses who gave evidence in corroboration of the facts sworn to by himself and his father. The excuse of Steiman for driving on the grass was that the road was muddy. He admitted that there was grass on his own side, but claimed that it was not wide enough to drive on. The testimony on the part of the defendant showed that the road was sandy, and, although it had rained two days before, the road was not muddy. The beaten track was somewhat nearer Steiman's fence than it was that of Foss; but it is clear that Steiman drove over the grass for the express purpose of damaging it, as there was room between the beaten track and the uncut grass to drive upon the sward where the grass had been cut. It is also evident upon the record that there was bad blood between the parties, growing out of their rights in the highway as claimed by each. It was claimed by Steiman that Foss had pastured his cattle in the road, and that he had forbid it, because they trespassed upon his side of the highway, but that he did not quarrel with Foss about the grass on Foss' side of the road. He admitted, however, that he cut it one year, and pastured it another. Foss and his son testified that Steiman told them that, if they would let him have one swath on their side of the road, he would make them no trouble, and that, when he drove upon the grass, he also purposely stamped it down with his feet.

The defendant's counsel requested that the following instruction be given to the jury, which was refused: "That the defendant had a legal right to cut the grass on his side of the highway; that the grass there growing belonged to him,—as much so as the grass growing on any other part of his farm,—and, for the purpose of harvesting the grass so growing on his side of the highway, he had a right to be there, in person, for that purpose, either of his own right or as the servant of his father, who appears to be the owner of the land, so long as he did not interfere with the free and ordinary use of the highway for public travel. And also that defendant had a right to protect the grass, and in so protecting it from being run over and destroyed by Steiman, he would be justified in using as much force as would be necessary to keep Steiman from destroying it; and, if the jury found that no more force was used than was necessary to protect it, their verdict should be for the defendant."

The court was also asked to charge, in substance, that Steiman was a trespasser on that side of the highway, and liable to be put off by the defendant, if no more force was used than was necessary to protect the grass, unless the jury found that it was necessary for Steiman to drive there in order to have the free and customary use of the highway for public travel. The circuit judge refused to so charge, and instructed the jury that, as to the question of the right of Steiman to travel where he did in the highway, as a matter of law, a person had a right to travel where he pleased upon any part of the wrought portion of the highway; that it was usual to dig ditches on each side, and throw the earth taken from that, and construct a road-bed; and that the travel is usually between these ditches; and that any person, in traveling along the highway about his business, has the right, absolutely, to go where he pleases, so long as he does not interfere with other persons traveling on the highway." I think the public, or any one of the public, has a right to go wherever their judgment might dictate, or their caprice may lead them to go; that, because it happens that the beaten track is in a certain locality, it need not always remain just there, and we know, as a matter of fact, it changes according to the caprice of the public or circumstances, of which I might enumerate many, and one person has a right to commence to change that track as well as another. There may be reasons why a person may desire to go upon grass ground instead of the beaten track, and, whatever the reason may be, I instruct you, as a matter of law, that a person has a right to go where he chooses along that wrought portion of the road. And, if it is a fact that the defendant in this case made an assault upon Mr. Steiman because he persisted in exercising that right, and in driving upon the grass, and struck him, then he is guilty of assault and battery as charged in the complaint."

The point in controversy is thus sharply defined by defendant's requests and the charge of the court above stated. It seems to me a novel and interesting question. It is undisputed that Steiman was driving upon growing grass within the wrought portion of the highway, but outside of the beaten or customary track of wagons, and within that portion of the highway the fee of which was in defendant's father. The defendant was under age, and working for his father. The father had the right to this grass not only as against Steiman, but all the world, unless it was necessary to destroy it for the needs of public track. If Steiman had cut the grass and carried it away, Fom could have sued him in trespass for so doing, and recovered from him in trover the value of the grass thus converted. This is certain, within all the authorities. The fee of the land was in Fom, subject only to the easement of the public to use it for the purpose of highway. He had the right to use it, and to enjoy the profits of it, in any way not incompatible with the public enjoyment of the right of way. Woodruff v. Neal, 26 Conn. 169; Suffield v. Hathaway, 44 Conn. 521, 527; Starkpole v. Fleety, 16 Mass. 28; Cooley, Torts, 816; Holladay v. Marsh, 3 Wend. 149; Campau v. Kenan, 80 Mich. 302, 305; Adams v. Emerson, 6 Pick. 57; Clark v. Dams, 24 Mich. 86; People v. O'Brien, 60 Mich. 8-13; Ellsworth v. Lord, 40 Minn. 287; Wolf v. Holton, 61 Mich. 550-558; Washb. Easem. 4th ed. 10; Coburn v. Ames, 59 Cal. 386.

It is plain enough from this record that the complaining witness Steiman drove where he did without necessity, and for the express purpose of destroying the grass.

The question arises whether he had the right, from mere caprice or express malice; to destroy this grass by driving upon it, and stamping it under his own and his horses' feet, because it happened to be between the two ditches, and in a space usually known as the wrought or traveled part of the road, when he would have no right to go and cut and carry it away for his own use, I think not. If the jury had found that Steiman drove on this grass, when it was not necessary, for the purpose of damaging or destroying it, and that all defendant did was to push the horses off from it, and, when attacked by Steiman for this, did no more than was necessary in order to push him away from him, it would have been their duty to have acquitted him. It may not be desirable that grass should grow and be harvested in the wrought portion of the highway, but when, upon a rural or country road, the travel has been in a uniform beaten track, leaving grass to grow and ripen undisturbed upon the sides of such track, no one but the abutting landowner, who owns the fee, has the right to harvest it; and he can not only maintain trespass or trover against any person cutting and taking it away against his will, but he has the right to protect it against wanton or malicious damage or destruction, whether it is attempted to be done under the guise of travel upon the highway or in some other way. In this case the complaining witness could not have destroyed this grass by turning his cattle upon it to pasture it. Neither, in my opinion, could he drive his horses and wagon upon it to trample it under foot, when it was not at all necessary to do so, and while he knew Fom and his son were at work gathering it. The law does not permit or encourage any "dog in the manger" business of this kind.

In Pfister v. Orr, 21 Ohio St. 340, the plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for the destruction of a hedge within the limits of a highway. The court held that, so long as the enjoyment of a right of way was unobstructed, there was no reason why the easement of a highway should afford a justification to an individual for the needless destruction of property belonging to the owner of the land merely because it happened to be within the bounds of the road as laid and established. And in People's Ice Co. v. The Excelsior, 44 Mich. 229-233, Judge Marston says: "Ordinarily, it may be said that the entire width of the highway may be used, yet the owner of the land over which it passes may, within the limits thereof, plant trees, set posts and do such other acts as will add to his convenience or assist in beautifying his premises. He is encouraged in doing this by public sentiment. . . . Public convenience may in time, in particular locations, require the removal of some of these things; and, whenever the necessity arises, and the public authorities request their removal, then the private must give way to the public or paramount right. But, while permitted to remain, no one traveling the highway could willfully injure or destroy them; and, should anyone do so, he would justly be held responsible notwithstanding his plea of a claim of right to travel over any part of the highway." And at page 234, 44 Mich., speaking of the relative rights of the steamer and the riparian proprietor, he says: "The right of navigation, while paramount, is not exclusive, and cannot be exercised to the unnecessary or wanton destruction of private rights or property, where both can be freely and fairly enjoyed."

So, in this case, while the right of travel upon the highway was paramount, Steiman could not exercise that right, in caprice or wantonly, to destroy the property—the grass—without any necessity of Fom, where both the right of travel and the harvesting and preservation of this grass could be freely and fairly enjoyed.

The Circuit Court was in error; and the verdict of the jury must be set aside, and a new trial granted the defendant.

The other Justices concurred.

v.

Henry U. LINZEY et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. If an innocent party has been defrauded into giving notes he is not obliged to contest them in the hands of a stranger on any information short of a certainty that the latter is not a bona fide holder before bringing an action against the party defrauding him.

2. If a person having no knowledge of the scheme of the Bohemian cat business, or of the corporate existence of the pretended company, or of the want of integrity of its purpose, and the honesty of its business, relies entirely upon and believes the statements of another that there is such a corporation, and that its business is honest, he is not precluded on the ground of guilty participation from maintaining an action for fraud against the person who induced him to give his notes in pursuance of such scheme, although it is fraudulent.

3. If a man, knowing that a scheme is fraudulent, and that the natural outcome of it will be to defraud some innocent person, goes into it solely for the purpose of making money out of it, though he may not be equally in fault with another, who is the moving party in the fraud and influences him by his persuasions and representations, a court will, on the ground of public policy, deny him any relief against the other party.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shiawassee County to review a judgment in favor of Note.—Relief from contract obtained by fraud.

The maker of a note given for Bohemian cats, induced to give it by persistent acts and misrepresentations, will not be denied relief on the ground that he is in part delicto. See notes to Hess v. Oulver (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 405; Evans v. Stuhberg (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 801.

The maker of negotiable paper may defend an action brought by a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity, upon the ground that he was induced to sign the paper by false representations as to its character. The burden of proving this, and his freedom from laches, rest upon him. National Exch. Bank v. Veneman, 48 Hun, 341.

It is against the policy of the law to enable either party to enforce an agreement in fraud of the law or which was made to injure another. Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 285 (17 L. ed. 289).

A defendant who seeks to share in the fruits of a contract cannot complain that it was fraudulently procured. Bisell v. Post, 114 U. S. 252 (29 L. ed. 125).

A party to a fraudulent contract may forfeit his right to treat it as void by his conduct in relation to it. Burton v. Stewart, 3 Wood, 228.

The general rule is, in cases of executed contracts, where both parties are guilty of actual fraud, a court of equity will not lend its aid to either. Anderson v. Merideth, 82 Ky. 584.

The exception to the general rule applies where the mind of one of the actors of the fraud exercises plaintiff in an action brought to recover from defendants the amount of certain notes alleged to have been procured by them through fraud and sold to third persons. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mrs. Watson & Chapman, for defendant Linzey, appellant:

Whenever a note, of the kind mentioned in this case, is obtained by fraud, the note is void between the parties, and the presumption of fraud follows the note all along its way, and cannot be recovered upon until evidence is introduced sufficient to overthrow such presumption of fraud, and satisfy a jury that the holder of the same is a bona fide owner, and an innocent purchaser.

Davis v. Sealey, 15 West. Rep. 412, 71 Mich. 309.

When a party, with full knowledge of all the facts, pays a demand unjustly made upon him, it is a voluntary payment, and cannot be recovered, and it makes no difference if the transaction out of which it grew was illegal and fraudulent; his payment is voluntary, and he cannot recover the amount paid.

Chitty, Cont. pp. 933, 934, and cases there cited.

A man who goes into a transaction of this kind, as the plaintiff testifies he did, knowing that it was a fraudulent scheme, should not be allowed by the courts to recover for the money paid out on account of it.

Story, Eq. Jur. 3d ed. p. 199; Etna Ins. Co. v. Reed, 33 Ohio St. 238; Slaughter v. Gerson, 60 U. S. 13 Wall 379 (20 L. ed. 627); Brown v. Leach, 107 Mass. 384; Long v. Warren, 63 N. When a man has full knowledge of a transaction and knows all about it, he cannot be allowed to shut his eyes to the facts and rely upon representations made to him by another an undue influence on the other. In this state of the case, although the grantor has been guilty of fraud, equity will adjudge resolution and adjust the equities between them, and will allow the grantor his expenses in managing the estate while it was in his hands. Ibid.

Where parties are concerned in illegal agreements or other transactions, whether they are mere prohibitions or made in a court of equity, following the rule of law as to participators in crime, will not grant relief in accordance with the maxim, in part delicto potior est conditio defendentis. Bromley v. Smith, 3 Hill, 317; Vandyck v. Hewitt, 1 East, 86; Howson v. Hancock, 6 T. R. 275; Browning v. Morris, Cowp. 790; Osborne v. Williams, 15 Ves. Jr. 576; Buller, N. P. 131; *Harrington v. The defense do not pretend the representations made by them were true. There was no corporation such as they claimed there was, and consequently no president, secretary, seal, agents or assets. This was fraudulent.

Holcomb v. Noble, 14 West. Rep. 56, 69 Mich. 396.

If this was a gambling contract the party who lost is entitled to recover back what he paid to defendant, which in this case was two notes of the value of $300 and interest.

Dibble v. Nash, 47 Mich. 592.

Mr. S. B. Miner, also for plaintiff, appellee:

This being a Bohemian oat scheme, the transaction was void on the grounds of public policy, and Knight had his action against Linzey and Davison for the fraud.

Hess v. Culver (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 498.

Linzey and Davison having transferred the notes before they were due, and a few days after they were given, and having received pay for them and appropriated the money to themselves, will not be heard to say that "Knight did not use sufficient diligence in trying to avoid payment of the note."

Doane v. Sturberg (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 301.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is another Bohemian oat case, and comes here from the Milwaukee Circuit Court, where the plaintiff recovered judgment. The declaration is framed upon the same theory as those in the cases of Hess v. Culver (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 498, and Pearl v. Walter, 45 N. W. Rep. 181 (present term). The plea was the general issue. The same objection was made to the introduction of proof under the declaration as we have recently noticed in the last case above mentioned, and will need no further attention.

The principal points raised in the case relate to the charge of the court. It was alleged in the declaration that the plaintiff was induced to make two notes, one for $100 and one for $200, and that these notes were sold before due, by the defendant Linzey, to an innocent purchaser for value. It appeared upon the trial that the $200 note was sold before due to one Edward Rose, and the $100 note to one Silas Frye, and that the plaintiff had paid them to these parties before bringing suit. Linzey sold the note to Rose, and Davison the note to Frye. Linzey testified that he told both Rose and Frye, before they purchased the notes, that they were given for Bohemian oats, and that he informed plaintiff of this fact before he paid the notes. Plaintiff, however, denies that Linzey told him anything of the kind, and Rose swears that he did not know the note was given for Bohemian oats until after he purchased it. Frye was not sworn. Reuben Johnson testified that he heard Linzey tell Rose that the note was given for Bohemian oats before Rose bought it; and two other witnesses swore that they heard Linzey tell plaintiff that, if he was in Knight's place, he would not be in a hurry about paying the notes, as Rose knew what they were given for before he purchased.

The counsel for the defendants insisted upon submitting to the jury the question whether or not Rose and Frye, or either of them, were innocent purchasers of the notes, and requested the court to instruct the jury that, if they found both of them not to be innocent purchasers, and plaintiff knew it, his payment of the notes to them was voluntary, and he could not recover, or, if either of them was not an innocent purchaser, and plaintiff knew it, he could not recover for the note held by such one, and also submitted the following request, in addition: "Ninth. The notes in question in this suit were void, and the purchasers thereof are supposed to know for what they are given, and could not recover upon the notes of plaintiff until they first proved, by a preponderance of evidence, that they were innocent purchasers of the same; and it became the plaintiff's duty to make a fair and diligent inquiry into the facts, and ascertain whether they were innocent purchasers before he paid the notes, and, if he paid them without making such inquiry, then he made the payment voluntarily, and cannot recover in this case; and, before he can recover, he must prove, by a preponderance of evidence, that said Rose and Frye were innocent purchasers of the notes."

The court gave these requests, but qualified the last or ninth by adding: "Unless the jury should find that there was fraud practiced on the plaintiff in obtaining the notes from him by Linzey and Davison, and of which fraud plaintiff had no knowledge or information at the time he gave said notes."

Counsel also requested a charge, as to each note, that, if they found the purchaser (Ross or Frye) not an innocent purchaser, and that he knew for what the note was given, then the plaintiff, if before payment he had been reliably informed of facts which showed that such purchaser was not a bona fide one for value, was not obliged to pay the same, and it became a voluntary payment, and he could not recover of Linzey the amount of such payment. This was given, with the qualification annexed to the ninth request.

These directions were, if anything, more favorable to the defendants than the law is. If the plaintiff, an innocent party, was defrauded into giving these notes, he was not obliged, upon information obtained from the party who had defrauded him, or any other information short of a certainty, to contest these notes in the hands of a stranger to the transaction of their inception, and who would be presumably an innocent holder of them. He was not compelled to take the chances of two lawsuits to obtain relief from, or redress for, the fraud committed upon him. The court charged the jury, substantially, as requested by the defendants, that, if the plaintiff entered into the transaction, knowing that in the end some person or persons must be defrauded, and knew how the notes were bought and sold, then plaintiff and defendants were engaged in a transaction against public policy, and therefore void; and the law would leave each of them, where they had left themselves, without redress, and the plaintiff could not recover if he knew of the common fraud. This charge was correct, but it is claimed that the circuit judge entirely neutralized the effect of it by stating subsequently in his charge as follows, it being the plaintiff's third request: "Knight had a perfect right to rely upon the statements of Linzey, and was not bound to seek information elsewhere, and Linzey was bound to make true statements to Knight; and, if he made false statements to Knight which were material, and Knight relied upon such statements, and believed them, and parted with his two promissory notes, and afterwards paid said notes, and Knight was not equally in fault with Linzey, then Knight would be entitled to recover."

The court further said in his general charge, in reference to this subject: "I charge you that if two men, of equal knowledge, enter into a contract, deliberately, for the purpose of doing an act which is fraudulent, and the tendency of which is to contravene the principles of the common law, or in violation of the Statute, then each would be equally in fault; and, so long as the contract remains unperformed, neither party would be aided at law or in equity to its enforcement. The law would leave them where they have placed themselves. But if they were not equally in fault,—and this doctrine applies where the action is brought upon the contract,—if one of them was influenced by the judgment of the other, did not act upon his own knowledge of the facts, and was ignorant of the facts until he was informed by the other party of their existence, and relied upon the judgment of the other party, and upon his statements of the facts communicated to him by the other party, and believed them to be true, and then relied upon the judgment of that other person, he at the time believing and relying upon that other person as to the existence of the facts communicated to him, as to the honesty of the subject matter of the contract entered into,—of its being lawful,—he would not in such case be a knowing and guilty participant in the violation of law, or in contravention of public policy. If the plaintiff in this case had no knowledge of the scheme of the Bohemian oat business,—had no knowledge or information of the corporate existence of the pretended company, or the want of integrity of its purpose, and the honesty of its business,—and relied entirely upon the defendant's statement, from his long acquaintance with him, and believed that the corporation was organized as stated, and believed that its business was an honest one, and his own judgment was subordinated to that of the defendant and the man Davison, or either of them, he could not be as equally to blame as those from whom he got his information, and on whose judgment he relied." This part of the general charge was certainly good law, well and clearly expressed.

But following this the court referred to the Legislative Act of 1887 as being aimed, not at the man who made the note, but at the one who procured it and put it in circulation. He said the Act did not apply to or govern the case in hand, as the notes were made long before it passed, but that he referred to it as illustrating the views of the prominent men who composed the Legislature. "It makes a man a criminal who procures a note by falsehood, and puts it in circulation, but does not say anything about the man who gives the note." He then closed his directions as follows: "I therefore charge you that if you find that Linzey, in the presence of Davison, made the representations stated in the declaration,—whether he knew them to be false or not would make no difference,—and the plaintiff was influenced thereby, and relied upon them, and believed them to be true, and acted upon them, then he would not be equally at fault; and if the plaintiff has been injured thereby, he will be entitled to recover the amount he actually paid, with interest at six per cent from the time of payment to date. But if he had knowledge, and he acted upon his own knowledge and judgment, knew that the scheme was fraudulent, and made a contract for gain, and was equally guilty of contravening public policy, then your verdict should be for the defendant. The action is brought for the fraud which he alleges was practiced upon him, and not upon the contract that was made, and the contract is referred to for the sole purpose of proving the extent of the injury sustained, in case of fraud practiced. The plaintiff must prove fraud by a preponderance of evidence that satisfies you of that fact, and you must find that the plaintiff did not knowingly participate in it. A man cannot very well be said to participate in an unlawful act when his mind is a blank so far as the facts are concerned; and where the facts are stated by another, and impressed upon his mind, his act is built upon the declarations and information conveyed by that other, and of which he has no independent knowledge. The conduct and representations of the defendants Linsey and Davison may be considered by you in determining the relations of this party to the fraud, if one was committed; and you may consider, also, what took place soon after between these two men, in the absence of the plaintiff, in disposing of the notes."

It is very plain to me that the jury must have been misled by the instructions of the circuit judge, taken as a whole. The third request of the plaintiff, as given, is not sound law. It must be conceded that Knight was not equally in fault with the defendant Linsey, as Linsey was the moving party in the fraud, and by his persuasion and representations influenced Knight more or less in the transaction. But if Knight knew it was a fraud, and went into it solely for the purpose of making money out of it, knowing that, if he made any money some innocent third party must be defrauded thereby, and that this was the natural outcome of the scheme, the law will not permit him to recover back from Linsey what he paid to him, as it would be money knowingly paid in furtherance of fraud; and a recovery, under such circumstances, would be against public policy. "The benefits and burdens growing out of the illegal business cannot be disturbed or equalized. The law will have nothing to do with the transaction in any way, except to declare it void." Ward v. Deane, 48 N. W. Rep. 983.

Under this third request the jury may well have inferred that Knight had a right to rely upon the statements of Linsey, independent of his own knowledge and belief, and, being not equally in fault, might recover back the money paid upon the notes, although he knew at the time he gave them that the whole scheme was a fraud, and that, if he won, it must be that someone else would lose by a like transaction, out of which he must obtain his profit. This is not the law. The latter part of the general charge was also misleading. When the court said: "But, if he had knowledge, and he acted upon his own knowledge and judgment,—knew that the scheme was fraudulent,—and made a contract for gain [and was equally guilty of contravening public policy], then your verdict should be for the defendant,"—the insertion of the clause which I have inclosed in brackets made that bad law which would have been good law without it; for, if he knew the scheme was a fraud, and acted upon his own knowledge and judgment, he could not well have been deceived by the defendants, and whether or not he was equally guilty with them of contravening public policy became of no moment. In such a case the plaintiff would take his chances, as does one upon the throw of a dice-box.

Unless the jury was misled by the charge of the court, it would naturally seem, from the plaintiff's own testimony, that they must have found against him. He testified on cross-examination as follows:

Q. You are a school-teacher, or was?

A. I taught school a few terms.

Q. Until you found you could make more money as a farmer than a teacher? Why did you go into the Bohemian oat business,—for what purpose? What was the object of it?

A. I supposed I would make a little money out of it according to their representation.

Q. You went into the Bohemian oat business, knowing it was a fraud and a swindle, for the purpose of making money,—thought you could, the way it was represented to you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You didn't go into it for any other purpose than to make money?

A. Not a bit; no, sir.

Q. You understood it to be a fraudulent, but a money-making, scheme, by which you were going to have sold forty bushels of oats at $15 per bushel—did you not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was the inducement that led you to get into it, believing that you could make that much money out of it, though you knew it was a fraud?

A. I thought I could make some money out of it.

Q. I asked you if you knew it was a fraud, and that to make money was the inducement that led you to go into it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You didn't expect the Bohemian oat business could run always, did you? You thought it would go down at some time?

A. I didn't know it would.

Q. I ask you, didn't you think that it would have to go down some time?

A. I didn't know but it might.

Q. Didn't you expect it was going down at some time?

A. I didn't know whether it would or not.

Q. Didn't you expect it was going down at some time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. But you didn't expect it was going down before your bond was raised?

A. I didn't know anything about that.

Q. You didn't think it was going down before your bond was raised, did you?

A. I didn't know that it would.

Q. You didn't think it would?

A. No, I did not.

Q. But finally you thought someone would get caught just as you have been caught now?

A. I didn't know they would.

Q. I am not asking you what you knew, but if you thought that.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time that you went into it?

A. No, sir; I did not know that anybody was going to get caught.

Q. I am not asking you what you knew about the scheme. Did you know how the business was done?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I ask you now, and you have told me you expected it was going down,—that thing could not run always. You expected it would go down,—that somebody would lose on it,—didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You knew they must lose, didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So you knew, if your contract was carried out, someone would, in the end, lose his money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you thought you would make some out of it?

A. Yes, sir; I thought I would make a little.

Q. You went into a speculation to make something for nothing, and got left, didn't you?

A. Yes, sir; a $300 note.

It is suggested that many of these questions were double, and therefore misleading; that the answers might have referred to the first part of these double questions, and not to the whole, and that plaintiff did not understand the full import and meaning either of the questions, or the questions and answers taken as a whole. But the testimony above quoted was the last evidence he gave as to the reasons that actuated him in going into this transaction, and remains unexplained in the record. It may be that he was led into these statements by the skill and ingenuity of the attorney who cross-examined him; but, if so, his attorney did not, for some reason, attempt to get him out of the trap into which he had fallen, if trap it was. But, unexplained, the logic of this testimony was that Knight well knew what the scheme was,—that it was a fraud and a swindle for the purpose of making, and the inducement for going into it was to make, money fraudulently; and he also knew that, if his contract was carried out, somebody, in the end, must lose money by his gain. He went into this fraud "expecting to get something for nothing, and got left." What matter is it to the courts, under this testimony, whether or not Linzey made false representations to the plaintiff? Upon this evidence, unexplained, the plaintiff plainly barred himself from recovery. While the Legislature has wisely shaped the law so as to punish criminally the men who are traveling about the country procuring notes like these, and as Linzey procured this one, there still is no redress for the plaintiff, under his own showing, against these defendants, until the Legislature shall see fit to provide him a remedy by statute. The unwritten law will give him no relief, and, in my opinion, very properly leaves him where he has put himself, because he went into it with full knowledge of what he was doing, and that the transaction was unlawful. His testimony does not show a case "where he was influenced by the judgment of other" or that he "did not act upon his own knowledge of the facts, and was ignorant of the facts until he was informed by the other party of their existence, and relied upon the judgment of the other party, and upon his statements of the facts, and believed them to be true, and then relied upon the judgment of that other person as to the existence of the facts communicated to him as to the honesty of the subject matter of the contract entered into," and believed it to be lawful. In view of his testimony above quoted, it cannot be said that the representations to plaintiff that the company was incorporated could have influenced him to believe the transaction lawful; for it is not to be presumed that, knowing what he says he did about the scheme, he would believe that such a fraud could be legalized by incorporation, or that such a swindle as the plaintiff admits that he knew this to be would be permitted, much less made lawful, by the State.

This is a different case from that shadowed forth in the declaration in Pearl v. Walter (present term), where the plaintiff was afraid there was "something wrong" in it at first, but had his fears overcome and his suspicions removed by the representations of those who seemed to know more than he did about the matter. Here the plaintiff says he knew it was a fraud, and that he could not gain unless some other person than defendants lost, and that, really, the only inducement that led him into it was his cupidity and greed. He was not actually deceived, and he was "consciously wrong." See Hess v. Oulser (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 490.

He knew what the fraud was, but thought he might get his money out of it, and the profit with it, before the scheme collapsed. He took the chances that the fraud might not be operated upon him, but upon someone else for his benefit.

The verdict should have been, as the record stands, for the defendants. It may be that on another trial the plaintiff may make a better showing as to his want of knowledge of the fraud, and his reasons for entering into it; but, as the case appears here a new trial must be granted to the defendants, with costs of this court, and the judgment of the lower court reversed.

The other Justices concurred.

NOTE.—Statute of Limitations; application to trusts.

The Statute of Limitations has no application to an express trust where there is no disclaimer. Baymour v. Freer, 75 U. S. 4 Wall, 213; 19 L. ed. 310.

It has no application until disavowal by the trustee. Horne v. Ingraham, 14 West. Rep. 497, 135 Ill. 102.

The Statute does not run against a trust until disavowed by the trustee. Reynolds v. Sumner, 19 West. Rep. 357, 136 Ill. 55; Thomas v. Merry, 12 West. Rep. 672, 118 Ind. 58; *Ward v. Where the relation of parties is that of trustee and children, all being cestui que trust, there being no trustee, is not saved, under Code, § 3724, by the pendency of a suit until within one year preceding against the woman and her husband and a person as trustee who was no longer such, which suit was dismissed because of the failure to make the children, who were remaindermen, as well as cestui que trust, parties to the proceeding.

5. A remedy at law on the bond of a trustee having proved inadequate by reason of the insolvency of the sureties, a remedy in equity to reach property not subject to execution is barred when delayed until the bond and also the decrees thereon are barred.

(February 27, 1890.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Williamson County in favor of defendants in a suit to enforce payment out of a trust estate, of a debt alleged to have been created by the trustee for the benefit of the trust. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Jesse G. Wallace for appellant.

Mr. H. N. Cox, for appellees.

Although the claim may be purely equitable, yet it is sought to raise an implied lien or equity as security for the debt. Such implied lien, although the creature of equity and enforceable only in equity, is barred in seven years.

Thompson v. Thompson, 8 Lea, 126; Flaker v. Flaker, 9 Baxt. 72; Armstrong v. Campbell, 3 Yerg. 231.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant's bill is filed for the purpose of enforcing out of the trust estate payment of a debt created by the trustee for the benefit of the trust. The property which he seeks to charge is a tract of land, with the improvements, held in trust for the support and maintenance of the defendant, Mrs. Virginia Brown, and her children, remainder at death of Mrs. Brown to her children then living and the representatives of such as are dead. In default of such issue, then the remainder is devised to the surviving sisters of Mrs. Brown, and on the death of such survivors to the issue of such. This land was purchased by the trustee at a chancery sale had for the purpose of enforcing a vendor's lien in favor of complainant as the executor of the will of Mrs. Brown's father. The bid of Davis, as trustee, was, upon application of Mrs. Brown, credited with what was then supposed to be the interest of Davis' cestui que trust under the will of complainant's testator. To protect complainant in event it should turn out that this credit was in excess of the share of his cestui que trust, Davis was required to execute a refunding bond, with two sureties, conditioned, upon final settlement of complainant's account as executor, to refund to him any sum in excess of the true share of the cestui que trust by reason of this credit. Upon execution of this bond, title was vested in T. H. Davis as trustee, no lien being retained by reason of the circumstances under which the purchase money was paid. Upon the final settlement of the executor's accounts in the chancery court, it was ascertained that the interest of Mrs. Brown had been largely overpaid, and on October 24, 1870, summary judgment was rendered on the refunding bond theretofore executed against Davis as trustee and his sureties on the bond, and execution was awarded. The children of Mrs. Brown were not parties to any of the consolidated causes in which the proceedings just recited were had, though their mother and the trustee cestui que trust, the Statute of Limitations does not commence to run until there has been an open denial and repudiation of the trust by the trustee, brought home by the cestui que trust in such manner as will require the latter to act as upon an asserted adverse title. Key v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 184.

Time begins to run against a trust only from the time when it is openly disavowed by the trustee, who insists upon an adverse right or interest which is fully and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hay, 7 West. Rep. 720, 119 Ill. 607; Spaidel v. Henriol, 120 U. S. 277 (30 L. ed. 718).

In the absence of open disavowal of the trust by the trustee, a bar to an action against him can only be created by the lapse of twenty years. De Bardeleben v. Stoudenmire, 22 Ala. 574.

The trusts to which the Statute does not apply are: (1) direct and continuing; (2) exclusively cognizable in equity; (3) arising between trustee and cestui que trust. Yorks' App. 1 Cent. Rep. 280, 110 Pa. 77.

As between trustee and cestui que trust, direct trusts are not reached by the Statute. Somerset County Bank v. Veghte, 4 Cent. Rep. 407, 43 N. J. Eq. 39. See Rucker v. Dalley, 65 Tex. 264.

It is only to pure or direct trusts that the equitable rule denying the validity of the defense of the Statute applies. It does not apply to implied trusts, where there is concurrent equity and law jurisdiction. Newson v. Bartholomew County, 1 West. Rep. 475, 108 Ind. 222; Rush County v. State, 1 West. Rep. 222, 108 Ind. 497.

3 L. R. A.

The Statute of Limitations runs in favor of a defendant chargeable as a trustee of an implied trust, and it is not necessary, in order to set the Statute in motion, that he should have denied or repudiated the trust. In such case the Statute begins to run when the wrong complained of is done, and the limitation is four years. Hecht v. Stanley, 73 Cal. 202.

In case of an implied or constructive trust, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action, lapse of time is as complete a bar in equity as at law. Spaidel v. Henriol, 120 U. S. 277 (30 L. ed. 718).

One who becomes a trustee merely by construction of law may plead the bar of the Statute. Matthews v. Simmons, 49 Ark. 222.

Application of Statute to equitable actions.

Application of the Statute in equity is by way of analogy. Yorks' App. 1 Cent. Rep. 284, 110 Pa. 68.

Where there is both a legal and equitable remedy for the same cause of action, if the legal remedy is barred by lapse of time, the equitable remedy will also be held to be barred. Smith v. Wood, 6 Cent. Rep. 214, 43 N. J. Eq. 602.

If a party has a legal title and a legal right of action, and, instead of proceeding at law, resorts to equity, the same period of time that would bar him at law will bar him in equity. Butler v. Johnson, 111 N. Y. 204.

See note to Dinwiddie v. Bush (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 222.

Davis were. A part of this decree of October, 1870, has been paid off. Davis, as trustee, received no fund whatever, and the entire trust fund is represented by the lands so purchased by him. He and his sureties are insolvent, so that nothing has been or can be made off of them. This bill is filed against all of the cestui que trustant for the purpose of collecting the balance due on the decree as a charge upon the trust estate.

The first defense to be considered is that the necessary parties are not before the court. Davis, the trustee, in 1874 passed his accounts in the original case in which he had been appointed, and tendered his resignation. This was accepted, and by the same decree B. F. Brown, the husband of Virginia Brown, was appointed in his room and place, and required to execute a bond as such. This it appears that he has never done. He is now sued as trustee. By answer, he now disclaims having accepted the appointment. After so long a lapse of time, even in the absence of proof indicating an acceptance, he might, but for this disclaimer, be presumed to have accepted. The disclaimer, however, must be taken to relate back to the time of the appointment. Goss v. Singleton, 3 Head, 79; Hill, Trustees, 206-219.

The objection that the legal title was not vested in him formally by decree would be unimportant if he had accepted the appointment, for by implication vestiture of title would have resulted from his appointment without formal words. Woodruff v. Planters Bank, 1 Sneed, 207.

The decree divesting Davis of his trust probably operated to divest him of the legal title, and the refusal of Brown to accept the trust leaves the title in abeyance. It is clearly a case of a vacancy in the trusteeship. The property is within the jurisdiction of the court, and all of the cestui que trustant are parties defendant. There being no trustee, the court has the power to make a decree binding the property. 3 Perry, Tr. § 373.

A much more serious defense is that of the Statute of Limitations. The decree on the refunding bond was rendered October 24, 1870. This bill was filed May 21, 1897, nearly seventeen years after the cause of action accrued. Manifestly, upon the facts stated, the complainant would have been entitled to the relief he seeks if the bill had been filed in time. To meet this defense the complainant first relies on the fact that in 1870, and within the time limited for action on judgments and decrees, he filed a bill in equity asking the same relief, and this case was a pending suit until December, 1896, when it was dismissed by this court without prejudice. Within one year thereafter this bill was filed, and he now insists that the case falls under section 2755 of the Code, which provides that when a suit is commenced in time, and a decree is rendered against the complainant on any ground not concluding his right of action, a new suit may be brought within one year. This is a good answer to the plea of the Statute, provided that suit and this are substantially for the same cause, and the parties in each suit are identical. The defendants to the former suit were Brown and wife and F. H. Davis. The remaindermen were not parties, and for this very reason that cause was dismissed. Davis was sued as trustee in the former case. He did not answer, and no pro confesso seems to have been taken against him. It now appears that when that suit was begun Davis was not the trustee. Though B. F. Brown was a defendant in that case, yet, as we have seen, he was not the trustee, and was not sued as such. Thus we have a case where it was sought to reach and fasten a charge upon that property, when only one of a number of cestui que trustant were before the court, and where there was no trustee. There are cases where the trustee may stand for and be treated as a representative of his cestui que trustant, but the general rule is that all the cestui que trustant, and the trustee, if there be one, should be made parties to a suit affecting the trust estate. 3 Perry, Tr. §§ 373, 374.

The fact that there was no trustee before the court, and only one of the cestui que trustant was a party, ought not to and cannot have the effect of suspending the Statute of Limitations. Neither can that suit have any effect, as against Mrs. Brown, for the reason that neither in that nor in this was it sought to reach and subject any particular interest that she had to the satisfaction of this debt. In that case and in this the effort is to subject the trust property as an entirety to the satisfaction of a demand against it, and not to subject the interest of Mrs. Brown to a debt for which she was personally bound. Neither has Mrs. Brown any such separate interest as can be distinguished from that of her children without injury to them and their interest. The trust is for the support of Mrs. Brown and her children, and so long as they constitute a part of her family their interest in the trust cannot be affected by assuming that the mother has a life estate, which can be taken from her without injury to them. Hix v. Gosling, 1 Lea, 503.

This suit is therefore not against the same parties who were defendants to the former suit, and the two suits cannot be so connected as to save the bar of the Statute.

The learned counsel for the complainant very earnestly insists that the Statutes of Limitation do not operate upon claims and demands purely equitable, and for which there is no adequate remedy at law, and the demand which he represents is one exclusively cognizable in a court of equity. This presents a question of great interest to the profession, for it is important to know whether there are cases other than express trusts which are unaffected by the legislation limiting the time within which suits may be brought. This question has been a matter of controversy from the earliest history of equity, and, while we have much dicta, there are no reported cases in this State which are controlling in the determination of the point. The earlier English and American Statutes of Limitations alike operated in terms on the form of action. Thus our Act of 1715, which continued in force in this State until the codification of our Statute Law in 1838, prescribed that all actions of trespass, detinue, trover and replevin, all actions of account and upon the case, all actions of debt for arrears of rent, actions of assault, menace and battery, should be brought within the time therein specified. These were actions at law, and hence it was said the Statute was not in terms applicable to bills in equity, that form of suit not being mentioned.

The conclusions to be drawn from the precedents of controlling influence as to the applicability of the Statutes of Limitations to courts of equity before the change made by the Code of 1868, whereby they were made to apply to the cause rather than to the form of action, are these:

1. That courts of equity, having at all times disavowed laches, did after the Legislature had prescribed a bar to legal actions, and upon the maxim, equitas aequat legem, adopt the time prescribed in such statutes as barring a suit in equity upon any cause of action on which an action at law might have been maintained. Kimendorf v. Taylor, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 105 (6 L. ed. 294); Smith v. Clay, 8 Bro. Ch. 640, note; Bowden v. Annandale, 2 Sch. & Lef. 603; Porter v. Costa, Peck (Tenn.) 42; Shelby v. Shelby, Cooke, 184; Armstrong v. Campbell, 8 Yerg. 202; Hickman v. Gaither, 9 Yerg. 200.

2. The application of the Statutes in equity was determined by the cause of action, rather than the nature of the equitable relief sought. The fact that the legal action was inadequate to obtain the relief which a court of equity could administer did not take the case out of the bar prescribed for the legal action on the same cause. "In all cases," said Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay, "when the legal right has been barred by Parliament, the equitable right to the same thing has been concluded by the same bar." Or, as stated by Chancellor Kent: "When the same subject matter of the demand in equity can also be made the subject of an action at law, the rule of analogy applies in all its force, as Lord Redensdale observed in Bond v. Hopkins, 1 Sch. & Lef. 412. . . . the Statute of Limitations does not apply in terms to proceedings in courts of equity, but equitable titles are affected by analogy to it. If the equitable title be not sued upon within the time within which a legal title of the same nature ought to be sued upon to prevent the bar of the Statute, the court, acting by analogy to the Statute, will not relieve." Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 190, 9 N. Y. (h. L. ed. 241).

So the court, speaking through Overton, J., said that it had been argued that the Statute did not apply "unless the relief sought in this court is of the same nature of that which would be obtained at law. This position is not supported by any of the books. Compensation in damages would have been the relief administered at law, but in this court a decree in specie may be obtained. This difference in the mode of redress has no effect upon the Statute of Limitations; it is pleadable in this court as well as at law. . . . In every case where an action could have been sustained at law, and to which the Statute might have been made to apply, so it would apply in equity if relief were sought there. Nor is it material whether that relief be of one kind or another. It is the nature of the cause of action that must determine the application of the Statute, and not the nature of the relief which can be afforded." Shelby v. Shelby, Cooke, 184.

3. The Statute does not operate as between the trustee and cuius que trust in that class of direct and peculiar trusts cognizable alone in courts of equity. This is so for the reason that the possession of one is the possession of the other, and, until the trust relation has ceased by repudiation with notice, there can be no such thing as an adverse holding. The principle upon which the doctrine rests is precisely the same as that which prevents the Statute from running at common law as between tenants in common and landlord and tenant. The legal rule in regard to legal relations, so like the relations between trustee and cuius que trust in equity, is the very foundation of what is so often mistaken for an exception peculiar to courts of equity concerning the application of the Statute. To quote the observation of Lord Redensdale, which very clearly states this principle: "In the case of a strict trustee, it was his duty to take care of the interest of his cuius que trust, and he was not permitted to do anything adverse to it. A tenant also had a duty to preserve the interests of his landlord, and many acts, therefore, of a trustee and a tenant, which, if done by a stranger, would be acts of adverse possession, would not be so in them from its being their duty to abstain from them." Chelmondeley v. Clinton, 9 Jac. & W. 1,100, Armstrong v. Campbell, 8 Yerg. 201.

4. But when the trust was not a direct technical trust, springing out of contract, but was imposed on the conscience of the party by operation of equitable principles, and, as some of the judges put it, dependent upon evidence, then, in all such cases, the Statute did operate as a bar, notwithstanding such constructive and implied trusts were creations of a court of equity, and the remedy for their enforcement exclusively equitable. Coste v. McGinnis, Mart. & Y. 361, and other authorities.

The reason for the distinction between the effect of the Statute upon express and implied trusts lies in the fact that in the latter kind of trust the element of trust and confidence is absent.

The relation of trustee and cuius que trust does not in fact exist, and the holding of an implied or constructive trustee is for himself, and therefore as all times adverse. Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. Jr. 98; Hickman v. Gaither, 9 Yerg. 200.

From the foregoing principles it manifestly follows that, in all that large class of express trusts where the remedy at law is concurrent, the Statute which operates to bar the concurrent legal remedy will likewise bar equitable suit. It would be intolerable that equity should maintain a suit when the legal right was barred.

In the early and well-considered case of Coste v. McGinnis, Judge Catron for this court said: "The history of English jurisprudence, it is believed, furnishes not an instance where it was held that the relation of cuius que trust and trustee prevents the Statute from creating a bar in a case where an action at law can be sustained. In every case where an action of assumpsit will lie, there even courts of chancery, having concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, will apply the Statute. This has been the settled rule of decision in the English courts for a century."

We very lately had occasion to review our own decisions on this question, and to repeat and apply the rule so clearly announced in the case last cited to the suit of the distributees against an administrator for an account, and to recover their distributive shares. The action at law being barred, the equitable suit was held likewise barred. Alford v. Oplandy, 87 Tenn. 172, and other cases.

Now, in view of the well-settled principles concerning the operation of the Statute upon bills in equity, is there any foundation for the proposition that because the remedy of complainant, as against this trust estate, is purely equitable, therefore his suit is not subject to the bar of the Statute? The rule which we deduce from a consideration of the English and Tennessee cases is that, with the exception of suits between trustees and cestui que trustent, concerning those direct technical trusts cognizable alone in equity, the Statute which would bar the demand, if it were the subject of a legal action, will likewise bar the equitable remedy. There is no more reason for holding that a bill to charge the payment of an equitable claim upon a trust estate should be taken out of the Statute which bars all suits upon contracts within six years, than there was for holding that a suit upon an equitable title, or to declare and enforce a constructive or implied trust, was without the Statute. In both the cases last put the remedies were purely equitable, and yet it was held that the Statute applied. Cases cited.

The cases cited by complainant's counsel to support his proposition are not in point. They are all cases of suits between trustees and cestui que trust, and upon demands at that time cognizable only in equity. Cases cited.

The only authority to which we have been referred that seems to support the proposition that a purely equitable demand is not within the bar of the Statute is the statement of Mr. Perry that suits against the separate estate of a married woman, "the remedy being wholly equitable," are not barred by the Statute. Perry, Tr. § 663.

To support this brief statement he cites two Irish chancery cases, and the case of Norton v. Trevill, 2 P. Wms. 144. The first two cases are not accessible, and would not, at best, be of any controlling effect. The case of Norton v. Trevill was a decision by the Master of the Rolls, who, in reply to the defense of the Statute, said: "But in this case all the separate estate of the seine court was a trust estate for payment of debts, and a trust is not within the Statute of Limitations."

Now, if it be conceded that the separate estate was a separate estate for the payment of debts, and complainant was one of the creditors thereby provided for, then the decision that the Statute did not apply was right. A separate estate may be, however, as between the seine court and her trustee, a trust estate, and the Statute have no application, as between the cestui que trust and the trustee, but precisely how the creditor of the married woman becomes a cestui que trust is not explained by the decision. As to strangers to the trust, the Statute manifestly must apply. The exception is in favor of the cestui que trustent and upon the ground that the possession of the trustee is their possession. A married woman's contract does not bind her personally, and only operates to charge her separate estate. This charge may have been regarded as constituting the separate estate a trust estate for the payment of such engagements. However that may be as to a separate estate, the doctrine is not applicable to a trust of the character of that before us. It was not a trust for the payment of debts. Whatever doubt might have existed as to the application of the Statute to a purely equitable demand would seem to be removed by the change made in our statutes by the Code. These statutes no longer apply to legal actions in terms, or address themselves to the form of suit. They apply directly to all civil actions, and to the cause of action, and not the form of the remedy. The cause of action here is a contract between the trustee and complainant. All actions upon contract are barred in six years. This contract was put in judgment. Actions upon judgments and decrees are barred in ten years. Assuming that the implied lien of complainant as a vendor was not lost by his taking bond with personal security, then his implied lien was barred in seven years. Sherratt v. Nicodemus, 7 Yerg. 12.

But upon another ground the suit of complainant is barred. To secure himself against overpaying the legacy to Mrs. Brown and her children, he took a refunding bond, with two personal sureties. His remedy upon this bond against the trustee and the sureties at law was clear. Indeed, he obtained a summary judgment thereon and was awarded the legal writ of scire facias. The insolvency of the sureties alone defeated its satisfaction. The remedy at law proving inadequate, he now resorts to a court of equity to reach property not subject to execution. If he had filed his bill in time, his relief was easy. He has delayed until his bond is barred, and the decree thereon is barred likewise. That the remedy in equity is in kind different from that afforded at law is no reason why the Statute which barred his legal remedy shall not likewise bar the equitable relief.

Affirm the decree, with costs.

CITY OF NEWPORT, Appt.,

v.

NEWPORT & CINCINNATI BRIDGE CO.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A penal ordinance to enforce a contract with a city is void, where it does not relate to the morals, health or safety of the people.
 2. An ordinance to compel a bridge company to sell one hundred tickets for $1 according to its contract with a city is not an exercise of police power, but relates merely to a contract in respect to a financial matter.

3. Issuing five cards each good for twenty crossings is a substantial compliance by a bridge company with a contract to sell one hundred tickets for $1.

May 10, 1894

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Campbell County enjoining it from enforcing a certain ordinance affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Hawkins for appellant.

Messrs. Ramsey, Maxwell & Ramsey for appellee.

Meltz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Newport & Cincinnati Bridge Company, was incorporated in 1866. Its charter authorized it to charge reasonable tolls, the maximum rate, however, not to exceed that charged by the Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Company. Desiring the use of a portion of one of the streets of the appellant the City of Newport, for the purpose of constructing its bridge, or the approach to it, the city council, on May 12, 1866, passed "an ordinance granting the Newport & Cincinnati Bridge Company the use of a portion of a street for the purpose of a bridge," the fourth section of which provides: "In consideration of the foregoing grant, the rates of toll over said bridge shall be as follows, viz.: Packages of one hundred tickets to foot passengers for $1 to all persons applying for the same; one horse and dray, ten cents for a single crossing; one horse and express wagon, ten cents; one horse and buggy, fifteen cents." The Bridge Company accepted the terms of this ordinance in the construction of its bridge. There is nothing in it relating to tolls for foot passengers, save the provision relating to the sale of packages of one hundred tickets for $1. The other rates for a foot passenger charged by the Company are three cents for a single crossing, two and a half cents each way to go and return; or he can purchase what are termed seven and twenty coupon crossings, entitling him to cross, the one seven, and the other twenty, times, for ten and twenty-five cents respectively.

In and perhaps prior to 1882 the Bridge Company, instead of furnishing packages of one hundred tickets for $1, began issuing packages of five cards for that price, each card being good for twenty crossings, and one perforation being made in it upon each crossing. The city council in the year last named passed an ordinance subjecting any officer or agent of the Bridge Company to a fine for failing or refusing to sell packages of one hundred tickets for $1; and one of the Company's agents having been arrested, charged with its violation, and the City threatening to have arrested and to prosecute all of the Company's agents until it should furnish and sell packages of one hundred tickets for a dollar, it brought this action, enjoining the City from enforcing the ordinance. The lower court perpetuated the injunction.

If the ordinance was invalid, then the Company had the right, in order to prevent irreparable injury and a multiplicity of prosecutions, to go into a court of equity for relief. The chancellor often interferes to prevent an illegal use of power by municipal authorities, and where such consequences follow the enforcement of an ordinance as will result in this instance, a proper case is presented for equitable relief, if the ordinance be invalid. Brown v. Cellottery, 11 Bush, 485.

The passage of the ordinance of May 12, 1866, was the tender of a grant by the City to the Bridge Company, upon the condition that the tolls should be as therein fixed. Upon its acceptance by the Company, a contract arose between it and the City, and such a contract must be enforced by the judicial department of the government. It stands upon the same footing as one between individuals. It would be exceedingly dangerous to individual rights and liberty, which the common law so highly regards, to permit municipalities to enforce their own construction of their contracts by pains and penalties. Whether the Legislature could confer such a power we need not inquire, inasmuch as it is not pretended that it has been attempted in this instance. Where an ordinance is penal in character, the right of the municipality to enact it must clearly appear.

The enforcement of this ordinance would not be an exercise of the police power. While it is difficult, if not impossible, to concisely define the extent of this power, yet it certainly should not be extended so far as to permit a city to enforce its view of its contracts by penal ordinances, in cases involving neither the morals, health nor safety of its people. It may by ordinance limit the speed of railroad trains or street-cars through its streets, and in the same manner regulate any matter which is conducive to the health or safety or morality of its citizens. The public welfare demands the existence of such a power, and, when properly directed, the municipality should not be restricted to a narrow limit in its exercise. But where it is a matter of contract, affecting merely the pockets of its citizens, or its financially, it must resort to the courts for relief in the same manner as individuals.

A construction of the contract between the parties was not necessary in order to afford the appellee proper relief. This was given by enjoining the enforcement of the ordinance. Its petition, however, asks that the issue of the five card packages be adjudged a compliance with the clause in the ordinance relative to the one hundred ticket packages, while the answer of the appellant not only asks a dissolution of the injunction, but in counterclaim form requests the court to order the appellee to furnish and sell packages of one hundred tickets for a dollar. The lower court determined this question, holding that the issue of the five cards was a compliance with the spirit of the contract; and, as this judgment would be binding upon the City in any case where it would have the right to sue the Company, it is proper to consider it.

The law looks to the spirit of a contract, and not the letter of it. The question therefore is not whether a party has literally complied with it, but whether he has substantially done so. The ordinance in question was not designed to enable persons to purchase tickets for resale at an advanced price. The Statute prohibited any such traffic. Its object was a commutation of fare to those who desired to cross the bridge frequently. The mere form of the ticket is immaterial. The purpose was to regulate the price for one hundred crossings, and the issue of the five cards, each good for twenty crossings, for $1, was a substantial compliance with the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

GOODYEAR DENTAL VULCANITE CO.

Thomas H. BACON.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A surety is not liable on a bond signed by him alone, but purporting to be signed by the principal also, where he did not consent to a delivery of the bond without the principal's signature.

2. The burden of proof to show that a surety consented to the delivery of a bond, purporting to be signed by the principal, without the latter's signature, is on the obligee.

(May 12, 1893.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as surety upon the official bond of plaintiff's treasurer. Overruled.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Blackmar & Sheldon for plaintiff.

Mr. J. R. Bullard for defendant.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The instrument in suit purports to be the bond of Caduc as principal, and of the defendant and others as sureties, in different sums, respectively, for the faithful performance by Caduc of his duties as treasurer of the plaintiff Company. It was held at a former hearing that a demurrer to the declaration thereon, based upon the reason that it did not appear thereby that the principal had ever signed the bond upon which it was sought to hold the defendant as surety, could not be sustained. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Bacon, 148 Mass. 542.

"If the defendant," it was said, "knowing that Caduc had not signed it as principal, but intending, nevertheless, to be himself bound as surety, executed the bond, and delivered it as it is, . . . he may be held liable upon it. Caduc was liable without a bond." At the subsequent trial the defendant testified, without contradiction, that "he had not consented to the principal not signing, nor to the delivery without such signature; that he signed at the request of the proposed principal and relied on his signing; that nothing was said on the subject." He also added, the plaintiff objecting,

"that he did not understand he was to be bound unless the principal signed." Upon this evidence the plaintiff asked the court to rule that it was entitled to judgment; but the court held that upon this evidence it was not bound to find for the plaintiff, and found for the defendant.

When the so-called bond was delivered to the plaintiff, it was in an imperfect condition. While purporting to be signed by the principal, it was not so signed, and while purporting to be under seal, no seals had been affixed. The plaintiff had possession of and produced the instrument, which is evidence of a delivery to it, but not necessarily of any delivery by the defendant, who, without contradiction, denied any delivery by himself, or any authority from him to deliver the same in its then condition. Even if the testimony, as the plaintiff contends, shows simply that the defendant signed the bond, and left it with the principal, "without imposing any restriction upon its delivery, or making any condition that it should not be delivered until signed by the principal or somebody else," it was still competent for the judge to find from the facts stated by the defendant, in connection with the usual habits of business, and the obviously unfinished condition of the instrument itself, that no intention was shown that it should be delivered to the obligee except after it was completed, and thus that the signature of the defendant was provisional only. An instrument like that in suit ordinarily is and should be executed by all the intended parties. It was for the plaintiff to show that, although not thus executed, the defendant had consented to its delivery under such circumstances that it would bind him even if it were inoperative and invalid as against the principal. Russell v. Annable, 100 Mass. 73; Wood v. Washburn, 9 Pick. 24; Bean v. Parker, 17 Mass. 591; Adams v. Bean, 12 Mass. 187.

The case at bar is readily distinguishable from those cases where the bond has been delivered in a perfect condition to the obligee, and where he has had no notice that it contemplated that it should have signatures and seals which it did not bear. Wills v. Duggan, 140 Mass. 18; Wild Cat Branch v. Ball, 45 Ind. 213.

The view we have taken of the question discussed renders it unnecessary to consider whether the instrument could properly be declared on as a bond, no seals having been affixed thereto.

Exceptions overruled.

NOTE.—Bond; what essential to bind surety.

It is essence of a bond to have an obligee as well as an obligor. Garrett v. Shova, 4 New Eng. Rep. 747, 15 R. I. 538.

The signing, sealing and delivery of a bond are prima facie evidence of its acceptance and approval by the obligee. Coggeshall v. Pollitt, 1 New Eng. Rep. 806, 15 R. I. 108.

Delivery is an indispensable requisite to the validity of a voluntary bond. Harris v. Regester, 70 Md. 109.

As actual or implied acceptance of a bond is essential to constitute a delivery. Authorities cited in Bell v. Pierce, 5 New Eng. Rep. 847, 148 Mass. 61. 3 L. R. A.

Delivery, by the maker, of a bond payable to the holder, is presumed from the fact of possession. State v. Suwannee County Comm. 21 Fla. 1.

A surety may make any conditions he chooses in signing a bond, before its delivery; and where it is not signed by a party whose signature was required as a condition to his signing, the surety will not be bound. Hessell v. Johnson, 8 West. Rep. 382, 68 Mich. 623.

A bond signed only by the sureties is insufficient to bind them. State v. Austin, 23 Minn. 51.

Liability of surety on penal bond. See note to Trink v. Southern Exp. Co. (Ga.) 3 L. R. A. 623.

OPINION OF THE JUSTICES.

AS MANUFACTURE OF GAS AND ELECTRIC LIGHT BY MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

(100 Mass. 382.)

1. Power to manufacture and distribute gas and electricity for public use in lighting streets and public buildings may lawfully be conferred by the Legislature on cities and towns together with the power to raise money by taxation for the construction and maintenance of the necessary works, as such service is a public one.

2. Such power may also be lawfully conferred to enable the cities and towns to produce gas and electricity to be sold to their own citizens for the lighting of their private property if the Legislature is of opinion that the common convenience and welfare of such citizens will be promoted thereby, at least where all inhabitants of a city or town are given the same, or similar, rights to be supplied so far as is reasonably practicable, and are compelled to pay therefor a sum sufficient to reimburse to the cities and towns the reasonable cost of what is furnished.

(May 27, 1888.)

SUBMISSION by the House of Representatives of the question whether or not the Legislature has the constitutional right to enact laws conferring on cities and towns the power to manufacture gas and electric light for public use and also for sale to their own citizens. Answered in the affirmative.

Per Curiam:

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

We received on the 24th inst. your order of the 23d inst., a copy of which is annexed, and we respectfully submit the following opinion:

In considering the questions asked we assumed that the power to be conferred is not merely a power to receive and use property given in trust for the purposes named, but is a NOTE.—Municipal authority to light streets.

A municipal corporation having the power by legislative grant to erect and maintain gas works for the purpose of lighting its public streets, and to furnish its inhabitants with the means of obtaining gas at their own expense, has the implied power to contract with others to furnish it in like manner, and may, by contract, grant to a corporation the exclusive right to the use of its streets for that purpose for a term of years. Newport v. Newport Light Co. 24 Ky. 169.

A city has the right to make and enforce ordinances, and to make and apply any conditions precedent which it may choose relative to the carrying on of the business of furnishing residents with gas, in the same manner that any private corporation may do. Com. v. Philadelphia (Pa.) Feb. 17, 1880.

A city ordinance providing that the use of gas may be refused until all arrears for gas consumed on the premises have been paid is reasonable. Ibid.

Power conferred by charter upon the city council, by ordinance, "to erect lamps and to provide for lighting the city, and to create, alter and extend lamp districts," requires the exercise of judgment and discretion, and cannot be delegated to a committee of the council. Minneapolis Gas-Light Co. v. Minneapolis, 23 Minn. 129.

A city given power by its charter to make, amend or repeal ordinances for lighting streets, but not given exclusive power over them, cannot grant the exclusive use of the streets for fifteen years for wires and poles for electric lights. Grand Rapids R. L. & P. Co. v. Grand Rapids R. L. & P. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 699.

The power of a city or village, under Ohio Rev. Stat., § 2401, to erect or purchase gas works whenever deemed expedient and for the public good, is not limited by §§ 2402 and 2403, authorizing such action where a gas company has refused or neglected to furnish gas. State v. Hamilton, 47 Ohio St. —, 22 Ohio L. J. 100.

A gas company having no exclusive franchise has no vested rights which are interfered with by the construction of gas works by a city in which the company has for many years had the entire business of furnishing gas. Ibid.

Manufacture and distribution of gas a public franchise.

The manufacture of gas and its distribution by means of pipes laid, under legislative authority, in the streets and ways of a city, is not an ordinary business in which everyone may engage as of common law. See also 3 L. R. A. 606; 15 L. R. A. 240; 27 L. R. A. 514.

mon right, upon terms of equality, but is a franchise relating to matters of which the public may assume control, and when not forbidden by the Organic Law of the State, may be granted by the Legislature, as a means of accomplishing public objects, to whomsoever, and upon what terms, it pleases. New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 688 (20 L. ed. 515); Louisville Gas Co. v. Citizens Gas Light Co. 115 U. S. 695 (20 L. ed. 520).

The grant of an exclusive privilege is none the less a contract because the manufacture and distribution of gas, when not subjected to proper supervision, may work injury to the public; for such a grant does not restrict the power of the State to establish and enforce regulations not inconsistent with the essential right given to the company by its charter. New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat P. & Mfg. Co. supra.

The right to use the streets and other public thoroughfares of a city for the purpose of placing therein or thereon pipes, mains, wires and poles for the distribution of gas, water or electric lights for public and private use is not the ordinary business in which anyone may engage, but is a franchise belonging to the government, the privilege of exercising which can only be granted by the State or the municipal government of the city acting under legislative authority. Grand Rapids R. L. & P. Co. v. Grand Rapids R. L. & P. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 699; Newport v. Newport Light Co. 24 Ky. 169.

A company incorporated under the General Laws of Ohio in 1855, authorized to lay its mains and pipes in the streets and alleys of a city, to provide the city with gas at a price not to exceed a maximum figure, to be fixed by the council, does not have an exclusive right to the use of the streets for laying pipe for the conveyance of gas. Hamilton Gas-Light & Coke Co. v. Hamilton, 21 Ohio L. J. 94.

A gas company incorporated under the Pennsylvania General Incorporation Act of 1874, having, prior to the Act of May 29, 1895, laid a pipe and supplied with gas one mill in a city, and having since become incorporated under the latter Act, may lay other pipes in the city without first obtaining the consent. Allegheny v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 391.

While a grant of an exclusive privilege to lay and maintain gas pipes in a city for fifty years, with a provision for a sale of the plant to the city at the end of twenty-five years if the city wishes to buy, will not bind the city to maintain such exclusive privilege where a sale of the plant on application is refused; yet the city must elect whether or not it power to raise money by taxation and by means of it to construct and maintain works for the manufacture and distribution of gas or electricity to be used by the municipalities for lighting the public streets and buildings, and by the inhabitants for lighting the land and buildings which are their private property.

We also assume that the gas or electricity to be furnished to the inhabitants for their private use is to be paid for by them at rates to be established, which shall be deemed sufficient to reimburse to the cities and towns the reasonable cost of what is furnished and that all the inhabitants of a city or town are to have the same, or similar, rights to be supplied with gas or electricity so far as is reasonably practicable, and the capacity and extent of the works which it is deemed expedient to maintain will permit.

Whether cities and towns can be authorized to give gas and electricity to their inhabitants, or to sell either to them at varying and disproportionate prices, selecting their customers, selling to some and arbitrarily refusing to sell to others, are questions which it is not necessary to consider.

By the Constitution full power and authority are given to the General Court to make "all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances" not repugnant to the Constitution, which "they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth," etc., and "to impose and levy proportional and reasonable assessments, rates and taxes upon all the inhabitants of and persons resident, and the estates lying within the said Commonwealth. . . . for the public service, in the necessary defense and support of the government of the said Commonwealth, and the protection and preservation of the subjects thereof," etc. Part 2, chap. 1, § 4.

The extent of the right of taxation is not necessarily to be measured by that of the right of eminent domain, but the rights are analogous.

will purchase at the price fixed by referees before they are chosen; and it is not a breach of contract for the gas company to refuse to appoint its referees until the city has so agreed. Montgomery Gas-Light Co. v. Montgomery, 87 Ala. 345.

A council exceeds its powers in agreeing to grant to a gas company an exclusive privilege. Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Co. v. Avondale, 1 West. Rep. 84, 48 Ohio St. 337.

Courts of common pleas may hear disputes between municipal authorities and natural-gas companies as to the manner of laying such pipes. Pittsburgh's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 225, 115 Pa. 4.

Right to lay pipes in streets.

A right granted by charter to a gas company to lay gas pipes in the streets of a city is an easement, and not a mere license. Providence Gas Co. v. Thurber, 2 R. I. 12.

A natural-gas company duly incorporated, with power to lay pipes, has the power of eminent domain, and the grant of a right to exercise this power is constitutional. McDevitt v. People's Natural Gas Co. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 885; Johnston v. People's Natural Gas Co. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 564.

It is invested with the right to enter on any public street to lay down pipes, but cannot lay them down in the street of a city without the assent of its council. Pittsburgh's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 225, 115 Pa. 4.

It has, however, no right to lay pipes without first making or securing payment of damages to the land owner. Sterling's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 51, 111 Pa. 25.

Such councils are only authorized to give or withhold their assent, and cannot couple their assent with any condition or restriction not imposed by the Act, unless the company agrees thereto; and they may adopt reasonable regulations as to the manner, etc., of laying such pipes, with respect to safety and public convenience. Pittsburgh's App. supra.

An ordinance granting a right to lay pipes in a street is valid; but such a grant is a franchise to be strictly construed, and in a certain sense is a contract with the public, and becomes void by force of the legislative declaration contained in the grant, if the conditions are not complied with. State v. Boyce, 1 West. Rep. 85, 43 Ohio St. 46.

Under a city ordinance giving a light company for twenty-five years the exclusive privilege of using any or all of the streets of the city for the purpose of laying pipes to convey and supply gas to the city, a grant of the streets for any other use should not be implied, and in case of introduction of a light other than gas, requiring a different use of the streets, consent of the city is necessary. Newport v. Newport Light Co. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 340.

If, after permission is granted to lay pipes in a street upon condition that a bond be given and work commenced within one year, a suit is brought to enjoin action under the ordinance, the pendency of such action and proceedings may excuse the delay of the grantee, and prevent a forfeiture, and may be regarded as postponing the beginning of the time prescribed for forfeiture until the date of such final judgment, from which date the time given by ordinance begins to run. State v. Boyce, supra.

A bond duly presented within one year from the date of such judgment should be acted on, and, upon refusal to act, the board may be compelled by mandamus. Ibid.

Injunction will not lie to restrain laying of pipes.

Under the Public Statutes the mayor, aldermen or selectmen have authority to regulate, restrict and control the laying of gas pipes in streets, and an owner of private property cannot ask an injunction to restrain the acts of a company in laying gas pipes until after he has made application to the public officers to restrain such acts and they have refused to act. Kenney v. Consumers Gas Co. 2 New Eng. Rep. 516, 148 Mass. 417.

Nor can one gas company restrain by injunction a second company authorized by the city to lay its pipes in the streets. Meadville Fuel Gas Co. v. Meadville Natural Gas Co. (Pa.) 3 Cent. Rep. 821; Jersey City Gaslight Co. v. Consumers Gas Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 380, 40 N. J. Eq. 427.

A municipal corporation cannot sustain a bill for perpetual injunction against a natural gas fuel company on the ground that the corporation has laid its pipes in the borough without permission, and that such pipes are defective, where the averments of the bill are denied, and the court upon examination finds the matter complained of is not a public nuisance. Borough of Butler v. Butler Gas Co. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 882.

When gas furnished by gas companies becomes a nuisance, by reason of defective pipes, the municipality can prohibit its continuance; and an injunction restraining abatement of the nuisance by the municipality will be dissolved. Ibid.

Private property can be taken without the consent of the owner only for public uses, and the owner must be paid full compensation therefor, otherwise he would contribute more than his proportionate share toward the public expense.

By taxation the inhabitants are compelled to part with their property, but the taxation must be proportional and reasonable and for public purposes.

Taxes may be imposed upon all the inhabitants of the State for general public purposes, or upon the inhabitants of defined localities for local purposes, and when distinct private benefits are received from public works special assessments may be laid upon individuals.

We have no doubt that, if the furnishing of gas and electricity for illuminating purposes is a public service, the performance of this service can be delegated by the Legislature to cities and towns for the benefit of themselves and their inhabitants, and that such cities and towns can be authorized to impose taxes for this purpose upon their inhabitants, and to establish reasonable rates which the inhabitants who use the gas and electricity can be compelled to pay. The fundamental question is whether the manufacture and distribution of gas or electricity to be used by cities and towns for illuminating purposes is a public service.

The maintenance of public streets and buildings is a public service, and it may be reasonably necessary to light them in order that the greatest public benefit may be obtained from using them.

To say nothing of the usefulness of lighting streets as a means of promoting order and of affording protection to persons and property, the common convenience of the inhabitants may require that they be lighted.

Cities and thickly settled towns have for a long time been accustomed to light their public buildings and some of their streets at the public expense. If the streets and public buildings are to be lighted, the means are a matter of expediency. If the Legislature can authorize cities and towns to light their streets and public buildings, it can authorize them to do this by any appropriate means which it may deem expedient.

As a question of constitutional power, we cannot distinguish the right to authorize cities and towns to buy gas or electricity for their use, from the right to authorize them to manufacture it for their use.

We therefore answer the first question in the affirmative.

The second question is one of more difficulty.

It is impossible to define with entire accuracy all the characteristics which distinguish a public service and a public use from services and uses which are private. The subject has been considered many times in the opinions of the court of which we are now the justices, and Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, is a leading case. It is there said that "an appropriation of money raised by taxation or of property taken by the right of eminent domain by way of gift to an individual for his own private uses exclusively would clearly be an excess of legislative power;" that "the promotion of the interests of individuals, either in respect of property or business, although it may result incidentally in the advancement of the public welfare, is in its essential character a private, and not a public, object;" and that the appropriation of property for turnpikes and railroads "can only be justified by the public service thereby secured in the increased facilities for transportation of freight and passengers of which the whole community may rightfully avail itself." It is said that the essential point is that a public service or use affects the inhabitants "as a community, and not merely as individuals."

It was early decided that "the prevention of damage by fire is one of the objects affecting the interests of the inhabitants generally, and clearly within the scope of municipal authority." Allen v. Taunton, 19 Pick. 485.

Although the property to be protected is private property, the need of protection is felt by every owner in the city or town; the property of one may be endangered by the burning of that of another, efficient means of protecting his property cannot well be furnished by every inhabitant, and there is a necessity of common action which makes the expenditure of money for the purpose properly a municipal expense.

The maintenance of sewers and drains is a public service. One object is the preservation of the public health; but apart from this they are of great convenience to the inhabitants whose estates can be drained by them. It is impracticable for every owner of land in cities and towns to construct and maintain sewers and drains, exclusively on his own account. They cannot ordinarily be constructed over any considerable territory without using the public ways or exercising the right of eminent domain; they are therefore regarded as of common convenience and are constructed at the public expense.

The furnishing of water for cities and towns for domestic use affords, perhaps, the nearest analogy to the subject we are considering. It was long ago declared that "the supply of a large number of inhabitants with pure water is a public purpose." Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 60.

The statutes are well known which authorize cities and towns to maintain water-works for supplying their inhabitants with water, and the constitutionality of these statutes has not been doubted.

Water cannot ordinarily be supplied to a large city or town from ponds or streams without the exercise of the right of eminent domain and the use of the public ways.

Every inhabitant needs water, and often the only practicable method of obtaining it is by the agency of corporations or of the municipality. The land for the public ways having been taken for a public use, it may be subjected to other public uses, but it cannot be subjected to strictly private uses without the consent of the owners of the fee when the fee remains in the abutters.

There is therefore often a necessity of having water common to the inhabitants of a community, which cannot well be met except by the exercise of public rights, and therefore the furnishing of water has been considered a public service.

In the case of water, as in that of sewers and drains, a portion of the service is exclusively public, and the benefit to individuals cannot be separately estimated from that of the community; but a part of the service is rendered to individuals, and the benefit of this can be separately estimated. The inhabitants are therefore required to pay for the water furnished for their private use, and special assessments for the use of sewers and drains are laid upon estates specially benefited; and, for the same reasons, while in laying out highways the expense is public betterment, assessments may be laid upon the owners of lands specially benefited.

Artificial light is not perhaps so absolutely necessary as water, but it is necessary for the comfortable living of every person. Although artificial light can be supplied in other ways than by the use of gas or electricity, yet the use of one or both for lighting cities and thickly settled towns is common, and has been found to be of great convenience, and it is practically impossible for every individual to manufacture gas or electricity himself.

If gas or electricity is to be generally used in a city or town, it must be furnished by private companies or by the municipality, and it cannot be distributed without the use of the public streets or the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

It is not necessarily an objection to a public work maintained by a city or town that it incidentally benefits some individuals more than others, or that from the place of residence, or for other reasons, every inhabitant of the city or town cannot use it, if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants.

It must often be a question of kind and degree whether the promotion of the interests of many individuals in the same community constitutes a public service or not. But in general it may be said that matters which concern the welfare and convenience of all the inhabitants of a city or town and cannot be successfully dealt with without the aid of powers derived from the Legislature, may be subjected to municipal control when the benefits received are such that each inhabitant needs them and may participate in them, and it is for the interest of each inhabitant that others as well as himself should possess and enjoy them.

If the Legislature is of opinion that the common convenience and welfare of the inhabitants of cities or towns will be promoted by conferring upon the municipalities the power of manufacturing and distributing gas or electricity for the purpose of furnishing light to their inhabitants, we think that the Legislature can confer the power.

We therefore answer the second question in the affirmative.

We notice that the bill, a copy of which was inclosed with your order, relates to the manufacture and distribution of gas or electricity, not only for furnishing light, but also for furnishing heat and power.

We have not considered whether the furnishing of gas or electricity for supplying either heat or power can be regarded as a public service. We have confined our opinion to the questions asked, which, as we understand them, relate to the manufacture and distribution of gas or electricity solely for the purpose of furnishing light.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

HINCKLEY, Appt.,

v.

HORAZDOWSKI

(... Ill....)

1. A boy twelve years old employed to take lumber away from a flooring machine and load it on a wagon who is injured in attempting, under orders of the foreman of the mill, to oil dangerous machinery while in motion, which service was disconnected from that for which he was employed, may recover damages from his employer.

2. A statement by the court to the jury, made in open court without objection by either

NOTE.—Master and servant; duty of master to instruct and caution minor employees.

A person who employs children to work with or about dangerous machinery, or in dangerous places, should so instruct them concerning the dangers that they may, by the exercise of such care as ought reasonably to be expected of them, guard against and avoid injuries arising therefrom. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan, 8 L. R. A. 285, 46 Ohio St. 283.

He must give proper instructions to make him understand and appreciate the danger attending his employment. Glover v. Dwight Mfg. Co. 148 Mass. 22.

the person employed must be brought to an actual understanding of the dangers, and be made to appreciate them and the consequence of want of care. Ogley v. Miles, 28 N. Y. S. R. 808.

But it is not necessary to instruct a boy twelve years old, on his going to work at a machine, that the cog, which are open to view, are dangerous, because the danger is obvious. Buckley v. Gutta Percha & R. Mfg. Co. 118 N. Y. 530.

Where a young boy is inexperienced in the use of or in working about machinery, it is incumbent on the experienced master to caution him when he puts him in a place of danger. Nelson v. Marinette & M. Paper Co. 75 Wis. 572.

The rule that a servant cannot recover for the party, that certain facts stated are admitted, is not in any sense an instruction to the jury, and therefore the fact that it was not made in writing, as instructions are required to be, is not error, especially where it was immaterial in the case.

3. It is not conclusive against the right of a child to recover against his employer for negligence in giving him dangerous work, that he had done it for some time before he was injured.
4. The rule that the common master is not liable for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant does not apply where the injured servant is a child incapable of comprehending the risk of the employment arising from the possibility of such negligence.
5. An instruction that a master is not liable for injuries to one servant resulting from the negligence of his fellow servant is properly refused if it is not limited to cases in which the master used due care in selecting him.

(January 21, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirm-negligence of fellow servants applies to infant servants. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams, 8 West. Rep. 387, 105 Ind. 161.

The contributory negligence of a fellow servant will not prevent recovery for injury to a servant, where the master was negligent. Runn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. (Mich.) 7 L. R. A. 800.

A master is liable for the negligence of a foreman in requiring a minor employé to clean machinery while in motion, although such work was within the scope of his employment. Robertson v. Cornelson, 34 Fed. Rep. 718.

But he is not liable where a minor is injured while acting in disobedience to an order of his foreman. Ibid.

Minor employé takes risks of employment.

The fact that an employé is a minor does not vary the law as to his assumption of risk, if he has sufficient intelligence to comprehend the dangers incident to his service. Goff v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 299; Buckley v. Gutta Porcha & H. Mfg. Co. 113 N. Y. 530.

A boy fourteen or fifteen years old cannot recover of his employer for injuries received in consequence of allowing his hand to be caught under a stamping machine at which he was employed, as the danger was as obvious to him as to an adult. O'Keefe v. Thorn (Pa.) 34 W. N. C. 373.

Contributory negligence defeats recovery.

A master is not liable for injuries to a boy thirteen years old who voluntarily undertook to do something not within the scope of the work to which he was assigned, and which was neither difficult nor dangerous if he had used ordinary care. Giles v. Rowley (Pa.) April 14, 1890; Rock v. Indian Orchard Mills, 3 New Eng. Rep. 69, 143 Mass. 522.

A boy fourteen years old who had received necessary instructions from the master to qualify him to work on a machine in a spinning-mill, which was not dangerous in itself if he had used ordinary care, cannot recover from the master where his arm and hand were caught by a band and injured. Burn v. Tellow (Pa.) April 14, 1890.

In an action for damages for the death of a minor employé, evidence that, when shoving a car from a side to a main track, he was looking towards the engine, when he should have been looking ahead at the car before him, demands a verdict for defendant. Littlejohn v. Central Railroad Co. 74 Ga. 392.

ing a judgment of the Superior Court of Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. McKensie & Wood for appellant. Messrs. Jones & Lusk for appellee.

Magrader, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of case, brought in the Superior Court of Cook County by the appellee, a minor, by his next friend, against the appellant and two others, to recover damages for a personal injury. The present appellant was the only one of the three defendants named in the declaration who was served with process. In the trial court the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff below, which judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, and is brought here for review by appeal.

At the time of the accident, the defendants

A boy seventeen years old working at a stamping-press, with which he was familiar, cannot recover for the crushing of his hand because the upper die accidentally fell, on the ground that the machine was defective, where, in placing his hand between the dies, he violated a well-known printed rule posted on the press, and also the instructions of the superintendent and of the foreman of the establishment, especially when he had been recently warned, by a prior fall of the die, of the danger of putting his fingers between the dies. Cullen v. National Sheet Metal Roofing Co. 114 N. Y. 45.

For an injury sustained thereby after proper precautions and instructions, the master will not be liable. Hayes v. Bush & Denslow Mfg. Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 573, 102 N. Y. 643.

Where a boy employed to keep coils in motion down a chute in a coal-breaker enters the chute elsewhere than at the regular place, contrary to instructions, the master is not liable for injuries; but it is otherwise if he is not forbidden to use such place. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. New (Pa.) 13 Cent. Rep. 324.

Where a boy employed in a boiler shop to work in a tool-room, being out of work, was directed by the boss of the tool-room to go into the adjoining boiler-room for work, where he sustained the injuries sued for, the boss of the tool-room, being merely authorized to direct the work in that room, had no authority to direct plaintiff to seek employment in the boiler-room, and the master was not liable. Flak v. Central Pac. R. Co. 73 Cal. 33.

A boy's capacity is the measure of his responsibility; and if he has not the ability to foresee and avoid the danger to which he may be exposed, negligence will not be imputed to him if he unwittingly exposes himself to the danger. Strawbridge v. Bradford, 135 Pa. 300.

A child who has not been properly instructed as to dangers of the employment, and who, while in the discharge of his duty as he understands it, suffers an injury in consequence of his employer's negligence, may maintain an action against the employer therefor, notwithstanding that, by reason of his youth and inexperience and the failure of the employer to properly instruct him, he did some act in the performance of his duty, according to the judgment and knowledge he possessed, which contributed to the injury, but which he did not know, and was not advised, would be likely to injure him. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan, 3 L. R. A. 395, 45 Ohio St. 322.

below owned and controlled a planing-mill in the lumber district near the corner of Robey Street and Blue Island Avenue, in the City of Chicago. Certain machines were used in the mill for planing wood. The plaintiff, then a boy twelve years old, was employed at the mill to take the lumber away from a flooring-machine, and load it on a wagon back of the machine. When the accident occurred, he had been instructed by the foreman in charge of the mill to oil one of the machines, and, in doing so, while the machine was in motion, he received the injuries for which the suit is brought. His arm was caught in the machinery, and, after being treated a considerable length of time, failed to heal, and was finally amputated. All the facts are settled by the judgment of the appellate court.

Appellant objects to an instruction given by the trial court because it predicated the finding of the jury upon their believing from the evidence, among other things, "that the defendant was guilty of negligence as charged," and because it said to the jury: "In determining whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence as charged, you will likewise consider the age, apparent intelligence and experience of the plaintiff at the time of the accident; also, the nature of the work he was required to do,—that is, whether dangerous or otherwise,—and whether or not he fully understood its character; and, if he did not, then whether or not the defendant should, under all the circumstances proven in this case, have known the fact."

The portion of the declaration referred to as charging negligence is as follows: "Plaintiff, then a minor of the age of, to wit, twelve years, was then and there employed and engaged by said defendant in and about his said business, and, while so employed and engaged, the plaintiff was then and there, by said defendant, negligently and improperly ordered and directed to attend to and oil one of the machines then and there used and operated, and being used and operated, by said defendant, which said direction and order of said defendant was then and there dangerous and hazardous to this plaintiff, because of his tender age, as aforesaid, and well known so to be by said defendant."

The evidence tends to show that, under the original contract of employment, the plaintiff was not required to oil machinery, but to take lumber away, and put it on a wagon; that, in so taking away lumber, he "was four to six feet away, and didn't have to go about the machinery;" that he was directed by the foreman of the defendant to go outside of the regular work embraced in his contract, and oil revolving machinery; that the work of oiling such machinery was hazardous and dangerous, especially to a boy only twelve years old, and without experience in such work; that there was another employé, called a "feeder," with an experience of several years, whose business it was to oil the machinery. With evidence of this character before them, the instruction given to the jury as above stated was not erroneous.

If it should be conceded that the foreman of the mill and the plaintiff, who was under his control and direction, were fellow servants of the defendant, yet the rule that an employer is not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of co-employés in the same line of duty has no application to this case. The reason of the rule is that the employé, in entering upon the service of the employer, takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks and perils incident to the service, among which is the carelessness of his fellow servants. But the reason fails where the risk is not within the contract of service, and the servant, in making the contract, has no reason to believe that he will encounter such a risk. The injury did not occur while the boy was taking away lumber, and loading it upon a wagon, but while he was engaged in a service outside of his contract, and disconnected from it. He was too immature to form a correct idea of the danger of the task assigned to him, and relied entirely upon the judgment of the foreman. It was certainly an act of negligence on the part of the foreman to order a little boy to oil such dangerous machinery while it was in motion. Having intrusted the foreman with the management of his mill, the defendant is responsible for his conduct. This case is on all fours with the case of Union Pac. R. Co. v. Fort, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 558 (21 L. ed. 789), and is governed by the principles there announced.

In Garland v. Toledo W. & W. R. Co., 67 Ill. 498, it does not appear that the minor, whose age is not given, was engaged in work not embraced within his contract of service. It would appear from the statement of facts in that case that the operating of the cars, which caused the injury, was directly within the scope of the minor's regular contract of employment.

It is claimed that the trial court gave the jury an oral instruction in violation of the Statute requiring instructions to be in writing. This claim is not sustained by the record. The defendant at the close of the trial admitted that the premises where the accident occurred were owned and controlled by him. The court merely repeated, in the hearing of the jury and of the counsel on both sides, the admission so made, so that the jury could understand what it was. We perceive no error in the record.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

The case was subsequently rearrued and on May 14, 1890, Wilkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case by appellee against appellant, and other defendants not served, to recover for a personal injury alleged to have been received by him through their negligence. The declaration is of one count only, and avers that defendant was on the 4th of July, 1886, the owner of and operating a planing-mill in the City of Chicago, wherein he used and employed certain machines for planing wood; and said plaintiff, then a minor, of the age, to wit, twelve years, was then and there employed and engaged by said defendant in and about his said business, and while so employed and engaged the plaintiff was then and there, by said defendant, negligently and improperly ordered and directed to attend to and oil one of the machines then and there used and operated, and being used and operated by said defendant, which said direction and order of said defendant was then and there dangerous and hazardous to this plaintiff, because of his tender age, as aforesaid, and well known so to be by said defendant; and while said plaintiff was engaged in attending to and oiling said machine, in obedience to said order and direction of said defendant, and using all due care and diligence, the arm of said plaintiff was caught, crushed and mangled in and by said machine, so that plaintiff is and will be a cripple for life because thereof, and deprived of the use of said arm. The plea was the general issue. Plaintiff below recovered a judgment for $3,000, and costs, which the appellate court has affirmed.

It must be admitted, we think, that the declaration is rather an unusual one, and somewhat loosely drawn. It does not proceed upon the theory that the injury was received while plaintiff was performing labor outside of his contract of employment, although his counsel so treat it in their argument. The negligence complained of in the declaration is that the defendant wrongfully ordered the plaintiff, he being a child without experience in such matters, to oil a piece of machinery, the doing of which exposed him to great peril of life and limb. It is not the case merely of a minor being set at dangerous work, for in such cases the master is not liable for the risk, if the servant has sufficient capacity to take care of himself, and knows and can properly appreciate the risk. 1 Shearn & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 218.

It belongs to the other class of cases mentioned by the authors, in the same section, of which it is said: "But, while the mere fact of minority is deemed immaterial, it is well settled, in America at least, that any actual incapacity of a minor to understand and appreciate the perils to which he is exposed is to be fully considered, and that he can recover from his master for injuries suffered from any peril the nature of which he did not know, or could not properly appreciate, if he did nominally know, and to which a prudent and right-minded master would not have allowed him to be exposed."

And says Wharton, in his work on Negligence, § 216: "Hence we may hold that where a child is employed the employer must look out for the child, and must see that it is not exposed to danger arising from the structure of building or machinery which an operative of ordinary intelligence and experience would perceive. Notice of danger is not enough. The child must have sufficient instructions to enable him to avoid danger."

Many cases are cited by both these authors in support of the text.

The rule is so just and humane, when applied to a case clearly falling within its principles, that no court would hesitate to enforce it, as of first impression. Children of tender years are often employed about factories in which are used pieces of complicated and dangerous machinery. If one of these is sent by the master or his superintendent, with or without instructions, where he will be exposed to revolving wheels, belts and pulleys, anyone may know that, by reason of his inexperience and immature judgment, he is liable to be killed or maimed, and, if he is injured while using due care for one of his capacity, it would seem too clear for argument that the master should be held liable. To say that such a child takes the risk of his employment,—that if he is not willing to take the hazard of obeying the command he must refuse,—is idle, if not cruel. By his inexperience he is unable to comprehend the risk. By his childish instincts he implicitly obeys. Of the existence of the rule, and its pre-eminent justice, there can be no doubt. Does this case fall within it? This question with us is not, Does the evidence bring plaintiff clearly and satisfactorily within the rule? for, unless we can say there is no evidence tending to support a material element of the case, we must accept the judgment of affirmance in the appellate court as having settled the facts necessary to make out plaintiff's case in his favor. It is contended, however, that the evidence wholly fails to show that the foreman of defendant ordered the plaintiff to oil the machine by which he was hurt, but that the boy's own testimony proves the contrary. We do not so construe it. It certainly tends to prove that he was attempting to oil the machine, because he had been told to do so by Joseph Knourek, the foreman. True, the foreman did not, at that moment, command him to do so, but he testified that he had general instructions from the foreman to attend to that duty when the machine needed oil, and his evidence, at least, tends to show that he was, at the time he received his injury, attempting to obey those instructions.

It does not very clearly appear from the evidence how the injury was incurred. The knee, as we understand the evidence, was first caught by a revolving plate, and then the hand was drawn between the rollers, but just how the knee came in contact with the plate, or how the hand was brought between or within the rollers, does not appear. It is, however, shown by the boy's testimony that, in oiling the machine while in motion, he was exposed to a running belt, and compelled to extend his arm over it. In other words, the effect of his evidence is that to oil that machine while running was attended with danger. It is doubtless true that the foreman, or other experienced person, with mature judgment, could do so with comparative safety; but it is clear from the evidence, especially from the painful results, that it was hazardous for a child to attempt it. The fact that appellee had done that work for some time prior to the accident, and the number of times he had done so, were very proper facts to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not it was negligence in the foreman to require him to continue to do so, and also for the purpose of determining whether or not the injury resulted from inexperience and want of judgment, or from his own negligence; but such proof cannot be held to be conclusive against his right to recover. A child exposed to danger may escape for a time, but sooner or later an injury will in all probability occur.

The case of Gartland v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co., 67 Ill. 498, strenuously insisted upon as governing this case, is not in point. There the question was whether a minor employé should be held bound by the rule which prevents a recovery from the common master for an injury resulting through the negligence of a fellow servant. It was held that the mere fact that the plaintiff in that case was under twenty-one years of age did not relieve him from the risk of negligence on the part of co-employés. Here it was a question of fact for the jury whether or not appellee was a child within the rule stated.

It appears from an amended bill of exceptions that on the trial the court stated to the jury: "It is admitted, by and between counsel, that this defendant was owning and controlling the planing-mill when the injury occurred, and that this foreman was his foreman." It is said this statement amounted to an oral instruction as to the law of the case, and was therefore erroneous. It is not denied that the statement as to the ownership of the planing-mill was authorized by a stipulation of counsel, but it is insisted that the further statement, that the foreman was defendant's foreman, was a conclusion which, if properly drawn from the stipulation, could only have been properly given to the jury in writing. In the first place, the statement was not in any sense an instruction to the jury; again, it was made in open court, and no objection was made to it, either as a statement of the agreement or as an oral instruction; and, finally, it was immaterial. It was not denied on the trial that the foreman who gave the order complained of to appellee was the foreman of appellant. His own testimony shows it.

It is also insisted that the court below improperly refused the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by following the direction, or obeying the orders, or through the carelessness or by the fault of his fellow servant, Willie Knourek, then the plaintiff cannot recover." The reason why the common master is not held liable for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant is because that is one of the ordinary risks of the employment. But if the injured employé is a child, incapable of comprehending that risk, the rule ought not to apply. However, this instruction does not announce the rule correctly, as applied to fellow servants generally. It not only assumes that Willie Knourek was a fellow servant of appellee, but that the master had used due care in the selection and employment of him. The instruction attempts to set up an affirmative defense, and, to make it available, it was not only necessary to show that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, but also that the master had used ordinary care and prudence in employing such fellow servant. In the foregoing view of the law applicable to the facts of this case, the instructions given to the jury are not subject to the criticism made upon them, and, in our opinion, they are free from substantial error. We repeat, this is not the case merely of a minor under twenty-one years of age, suing for an injury, but of a child to whom the employer owed a special duty. After a careful re-examination of this case we have reached the conclusion that our former judgment of affirmance was right.

1. The negligent omission of duty by the parent, in permitting a child to go at large unattended, is not to be imputed to the child in a suit by it to recover damages for personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of a third person.
2. Instructions that a child about seven years of age cannot be guilty of negligence are erroneous. That is a question for the jury.
3. Erroneous instructions are not cured by others contradicting them.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. C. M. Hardy for appellant. Messrs. Charles E. Pope and E. F. Masterson for appellee.

Wilkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

Action on the case begun in the Circuit Court of Cook County, to the September Term, 1897. The declaration charges that appellant was on the 24th day of June, 1897, running a line of street "grip-cars" on Wabash Avenue, in the City of Chicago, and that plaintiff, in crossing its track on Harmon Court, using due care, was, by the negligence of defendant's employé in charge of one of its cars, run over, and one of his legs so bruised and wounded that it became necessary to amputate it. He

The contributory negligence of the husband in the purchase of the drug to be used by the wife is not imputable to her, the doctrine of imputable negligence not prevailing in Ohio. Ibid.

The rule that the negligence of the driver of a wagon is not imputable to one riding with him when an accident occurs at a railroad crossing, is applicable only to cases where the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, does not exist, or where the passenger is seated away from the driver, or is separated from him by an inclosure, and is without opportunity to discover danger and to inform the driver of it. Brickell v. New York, C. & H. R. Co. 30 N. Y. & R. 382.

The rule as to imputed negligence as asserted in Thorogood v. Bryan, 5 C. B. 114, the leading case, has recovered a judgment for $15,000, which was affirmed by the appellate court. At the time of the injury, plaintiff was but six years of age, living with his parents near the place of his injury.

On the trial the court gave to the jury the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury for the plaintiff that if they, from the evidence, believe that the parents are working people, and that the father was not present at the time of the accident, and that the mother was attending to her usual occupation, in attending their little store on Harmon Court, in such event the law does not require that persons in their station in life shall keep constant watch over their children, nor can the want of such care be imputed to them as negligent conduct; nor can negligence be imputed to the child on account of its age,—he being seven years of age, or about that, at that time." This, appellant insists, was error. No other question of law is presented for our decision. We need only direct our attention to the propositions of law announced in it.

The first part of this instruction assumes that, in an action by a child so young, negligence cannot be imputed to it, to recover for a personal injury received through the negligence of another, want of proper care by its parent, guardian or other custodian, in suffering it to go at large unattended, cannot be charged to the child as contributory negligence, so as to defeat the action. If this hypothesis is incorrect, that part of the instruction could only have operated to the plaintiff's prejudice, and the defendant cannot complain of its inaccuracy. The instruction also lays it down as a rule of law that a child of seven years of age cannot in such case be chargeable with personal negligence. Thus two legal questions are presented for decision, upon either of which there is to be found a conflict of authorities. On the first, two well-defined lines of decisions appear, each in direct conflict with the other. In Sherman & Redfield on Negligence the rule established by one line of these decisions is denominated the "New York rule," the other the "Vermont rule." Sections 74, 78. The first is based upon Hartfield v. Reper, 21 Wend. 615, in which it is said: "An infant is not sui juris. He belongs to another, to whom discretion in the care of his person is exclusively confided. That person is keeper and agent for this purpose, and, in respect to third persons, his act must be deemed that of the infant. His neglect is the infant's neglect." The other or Vermont rule "holds that the contributory negligence of a parent, guardian or other person having control of the child is not to be imputed to the child itself," so as to defeat an action by it for an injury caused by the negligence of another. Robinson v. Conn, 23 Vt. 215.

It is insisted by counsel for the appellant that we are committed to the first-named rule. Messrs. Shearman and Redfield seem to have so understood some of our former decisions, and so cite them in their valuable work on the Law of Negligence, 4th ed. vol. 1, § 74, note 6.

It will be found upon examination that the cases cited do not bear that construction. Hand v. Geler, 73 Ill. 308, was a suit by a father for an injury to his infant son. Tuldo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Grable, 88 Ill. 441; Chicago v. Hennig, 88 Ill. 204; Chicago v. Starr, 43 Ill. 174; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Becker, 70 Ill. 25, and the same case in 84 Ill. 430,—in each of which cases the action was by an administrator for the benefit of the parents as next of kin. These cases are so clearly distinguishable from those in which the child himself sues that they must have been cited by mistake. See Id. § 71.

The two remaining cases cited in note 6 were here criticized in England (The Miles, Lush. 508, and has been pronounced unsound by many of the American courts. See Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 306 (20 L. ed. 622); *Wabash, St. L. & P. R. suits by the child in its own name, but neither of them holds that negligence on the part of the parents would have defeated the action.

In Gavin v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 66, Gavin recovered a judgment in the Circuit Court of Cook County against the City of Chicago for an injury to his person alleged to have been occasioned by the city in negligently maintaining a swing bridge. That judgment was reversed by the appellate court of the first district, and Gavin prosecuted a writ of error to this court. The judgment of the appellate court was affirmed on the broad ground that the evidence showed no negligence on the part of the city. It appeared, however, that on the trial the care bestowed upon the plaintiff by his parents, he being a child but four years of age, was submitted to the jury; and Justice Scott, rendering the opinion of the court, said: "Under the circumstances proven, the jury found there was no negligence on the part of the mother touching the care she bestowed upon her child."

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Gregory, 56 Ill. 226, the defendants offered proof of the negligence of the plaintiff's mother in permitting him to go unattended in a place of danger. The competency of such evidence was not raised either on the trial below or in this court. In affirming the judgment of the circuit court, it was said the evidence failed to establish such negligence; but that fact in no way controlled in the decision of the case. All that can be fairly said in regard to these cases is that the question now under discussion might have been raised in them, but counsel did not see fit to do so; and, as its decision did not become necessary to a proper determination of the cases, the court was not called upon to express any opinion upon it, and did not.

In Wharton on Negligence, Ross v. Janis, 26 Ill. 260; Chicago v. Starr, supra, and Pittsburg, Ft. W. & O. R. Co. v. Bumstead, 48 Ill. 221,—are cited, in a note to section 211, as holding "that, when a child is negligently permitted by its parents or guardians to stray on a thoroughfare or railroad track, this negligence may be regarded, even when the child brings suit through a guardian or prochein ami, as the contributory negligence of the child."

The citation of Ross v. Janis is evidently a mistake, as the case has no relation whatever to this question.

Chicago v. Starr, as already stated, was an action by an administrator for the benefit of the next of kin.

Pittsburg, Ft. W. & O. R. Co. v. Bumstead, supra, like Hund v. Geier, supra, was an action by the father to recover for an injury to his minor son. It is also to be borne in mind that there is a distinction between cases in which a parent having the immediate custody and control of a child negligently contributes to its injury, as in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stratton, 78 Ill. 88, and those in which the negligence consists in merely permitting it to stray beyond such immediate custody and control into a place of danger. If these distinctions are observed, it will be found that the question now raised has never been decided by this court. So treating it, we are clearly of opinion that the weight of authority and better reasoning is in support of the doctrine that in a case like this the child is not chargeable with a negligent omission of duty by its parent. There was therefore no reversible error in giving the first part of the third instruction. Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, §§ 551-553; Wharton, Neg. §§ 210, 214; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 78.

The question as to whether, as a matter of law, personal negligence can be attributable to a child seven years of age, as before stated, is also one upon which the authorities are not harmonious. In 1 Shearm. & Redf. on Negligence, § 78, it is said: "In analogy to the rule which holds a child under seven years of age incapable of crime, some courts have considered them also incapable of negligence; but we think that this is not to be conclusively presumed. Juries may be depended upon not to overrule this presumption except in perfectly clear cases."

In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Becker, supra, the first branch of one of the instructions given on behalf of the plaintiff told the jury "that the law does not require that a boy six or seven years of age should exercise that degree of diligence that would be required of a grown person." This was held to be error, and Justice McAllister, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The age, capacity and discretion of the deceased to observe and avoid danger were questions of fact to be determined by the jury; and his responsibility was to be measured by the degree of capacity he was found to possess. The first branch of the instruction was erroneous in assuming facts and drawing conclusions of law from them. When taken in connection with what followed in the second branch, the jury would be likely to infer that only slight negligence could be imputed on account of his being a boy six or seven years of age."

That decision is in conformity with the well-recognized rule that a child can only be chargeable with want of care for his personal safety in proportion to his age and intelligence. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 78; Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, § 586; Wharton, Neg. § 200; Kerr v. Pogue, 54 Ill. 432; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Binsager, 114 Ill. 79.

When the case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Becker came up on a second appeal (84 Ill. 481), a reversal was insisted upon on the sole ground that the evidence did not sustain the verdict; and it was then said, in commenting upon the evidence: "While the deceased was no doubt possessed of ordinary intelligence, and was as capable of using as much caution for his safety as other boys of his age, yet it is not to be expected of a boy between six and seven years of age that the same caution and care will be used for personal safety as will be exercised by a person of mature age; and the law will not impute negligence to an infant of such tender years."

The appellate court seems to have understood this case to hold that negligence cannot, as a matter of law, be imputed to a child of the age of six or seven years. Such is not the purport of the decision. In the very same case, it has been expressly held that the question of the child's negligence was one of fact to be determined by the jury.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Murray, 63 Ill. 226, it was held that a little girl about seven and a half years of age was guilty of contributory negligence, and a judgment in her favor reversed because instructions given on her behalf did not tell the jury to consider whether she had not been guilty of a high degree of negligence even for a person of her age. We think the true rule is that a child is to be held to the exercise of care for its personal safety according to its age, experience and intelligence, and the circumstances by which it was surrounded at the time of the alleged injury; that it cannot be arbitrarily said that negligence may be imputed to a child seven and a half years of age, but not to one of six or seven. Many children of six years of age, by their intelligence and experience, are far more capable of taking care of themselves and avoiding danger than others much older. Certainly no great degree of care for its personal safety is to be expected of a child six or even eight years of age; but we think it safe in each case to submit the question as to whether negligence shall be imputed to a child to the jury, as one of fact, to be determined from the particular circumstances in evidence.

The third instruction took from the jury all question of the plaintiff's negligence,—in fact, told them that, as a matter of law, he could not be guilty of any negligence,—and for that reason was erroneous. Other instructions given on behalf of defendant are directly contradictory to this one, but they do not cure the error contained in it. It is impossible for us to say which direction the jury followed. For the error indicated the judgment of the Circuit and Appellate Courts must be reversed.

CHICAGO GAS TRUST CO.

(120 Ill. 383.)

1. Permission to purchase the "capital stock" of other corporations, found in a corpo-

NOTE.—Contracts against public policy are void.

The common law will not permit individuals to oblige themselves by contract either to do or not to do a particular thing when the thing to be done or omitted is in any degree injurious to the public. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 22 W. Va. 417; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Am. U. Tel. Co. 46 Ga. 162; Hazlehurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 43 Ga. 12; Raymond v. Leavitt, 46 Mich. 447; Colles v. Trow City D. Co. 11 Hun, 397; Watson v. Harlem & N. Y. Nav. Co. 33 How. Pr. 348; Faulds v. Yates, 57 Ill. 418; Falle's App. 91 Pa. 434.

All contracts prejudicial to the interests of the public, such as a contract tending to prevent free competition, are void. See note to Chippewa, V. & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Wis.) 8 L. R. A. 301.

The manufacture and distribution of gas by means of pipes placed in the streets of a city is business of a public character. Chicago Gaslight & Coke Co. v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. 11 West. Rep. 61, 121 Ill. 630.

A contract tending to create and perpetuate a monopoly in furnishing gas to a city is void as against public policy. Ibid.

rate charter, will, if properly conferred, enable its recipient to purchase shares of such stock, although there exists under certain circumstances a distinction between "capital stock" and "shares of stock."

2. Plans to an information charging a corporation with purchasing and holding a majority of the shares of stock of other corporations, which admit the holding of capital stock without setting out whether such stock is a majority or less than a majority of the shares, are demurrable.

3. Since incidental powers of a corporation must be directly and immediately appropriate to the execution of the specific power granted to it, and power to purchase stock in other gas companies is not necessary to accomplish the power to make and sell gas and operate gas works, the former power cannot exist as incidental to the latter, but express legislative authority is necessary to warrant its exercise.

4. The provisions of the law enter into and form a part of the charter of a corporation formed under a General Incorporation Act.

5. Merely naming a power in the statement filed with the secretary of state is not sufficient to warrant its exercise by a corporation organized under a General Incorporation Act, if it is not essential to the accomplishment of the object for which the corporation is formed, and is not expressly permitted by the terms of the Act; the law, and not the statement or the license or the certificate, must determine what incidental powers can be exercised.

6. Power to purchase, hold and sell stock in other gas companies cannot be exercised by a corporation organized under the General Incorporation Act for the purpose of erecting or operating gas works and manufacturing and selling gas, although such power is specified in its articles of incorporation.

7. The purpose of purchasing and holding all the shares of the capital stock of companies engaged in a certain kind of business of a public character in a city or State is not a "lawful purpose" for which a corporation can be organized under the General Incorporation Act (Rev. Stat. chap. 28, as it tends to the creation of a monopoly.

8. Although the determination of questions of public policy is ordinarily a legislative function, yet it is the duty of the judiciary to

The supplying of illuminating gas is a business of a public nature, to meet a public necessity; and where such business cannot be restrained without prejudice to the public interest, contracts imposing such restraints, however partial, will not be enforced or sustained, because in contravention of public policy. Gibbs v. Baltimore City Consol. Gas Co. 120 U. S. 398 (23 L. ed. 979).

The rule that contracts in partial restraint of trade are not invalid does not apply to a corporation engaged in furnishing that which is a matter of public concern to the inhabitants of a city. Chicago Gas Light & Coke Co. v. People's Gas Light & Coke Co. supra.

It is against the general policy of the law to destroy or interfere with free competition, or to permit such destruction or interference. Stewart v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 17 Minn. 395; Wright v. Ryder, 26 Cal. 342.

If the object of a contract is to prevent or impede free and fair competition in trade, and it may in fact have that tendency, it is void as against public policy. Anderson v. Jett (Ky.) 8 L. R. A. 390.

Where a contract belongs to a class which is reprobated by public policy, it will be declared void, although in that particular instance no injury to refuse to sustain that which is against the public policy of the State when such policy is manifested by its legislation or fundamental law.

- 9. The business of manufacturing and distributing illuminating gas by means of pipes laid in the streets of a city is a business of a public character and any unreasonable restraint upon the performance of their duty to the public by companies engaged therein is prejudicial to the public interest and in contravention of public policy.

(November 28, 1893.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto to determine by what warrant it exercises certain powers, privileges and franchises. Reversed.

The case fully appears in the opinion.

Mrs. George Hunt, Atty-Gen., and James K. Edsall, for appellant:

The capital stock of a corporation is the fund or property of the corporation; while the shares of stock in the corporation are the property of its individual stockholders. The two are not identical. Power to purchase one is not, therefore, power to purchase the other.

(18 L. ed. 235); Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 9, note 2.

One corporation cannot become a stockholder in another, unless that power has been specially granted by statute.

A corporation formed under the general law cannot acquire corporate powers not granted by statute, by the insertion of such powers in its "statement" filed with its secretary of state.

Rev. Stat. chap. 32, §§ 1, 2; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. 180 U. S. 1, 25 (23 L. ed. 837, 841).

The power to purchase and hold a majority and controlling interest in the shares of stock of four competing corporations, engaged in a public employment, is not a "lawful purpose" for which a corporation may be organized under the laws of this State. What constitutes a "lawful purpose" for which to form a corporation, within the meaning of these terms as used the public may have resulted. Firemen's Charitable Assn. v. Berghaus, 23 La. Ann. 383.

Corporate franchises are public grants.

The sovereign authority is vested in Congress and the Legislatures of the various States, each having its proper and limited sphere of action. Hence corporate franchises must be secured by either an Act of Congress or of the Legislature of the State where the corporation is to be created. Franklin Bridge Co. v. Wood, 14 Ga. 60; Falconer v. Campbell, 2 McLean, 103.

In this country corporate rights can only be conferred by legislative Acts. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 17; 3 Kent, Com. 277; United States Trust Co. of N. Y. v. Brady, 20 Barb. 119; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Canal Comrs. 21 Pa. 9; Field, Corp. 30.

Corporate franchises, whether resulting from general or special laws, are grants from the sovereignty of the people. Benefit to the country at large, from the objects for which the corporations are created, constitute the consideration, and in most cases the sole consideration, of the grant. Marshall, Ch. J., in Dartmouth College Case, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 513, 627 (4 L. ed. 629, 639).

It is the general rule that corporate franchises are granted upon a trust or condition that the corporate privileges shall not be abused; that the corporation undertakes and agrees, upon condition of forfeiture, that it will so manage and conduct its affairs that it shall not become dangerous or hazardous to the safety of the State or community in and with which it transacts business (Ward v. Farwell, 67 Ill. 302; and that the franchise may be forfeited and the corporation dissolved for acts ultra vires, or for breach of the trust condition and perversion of the objects of the grant. Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 674 (23 L. ed. 1034); People v. Dispensary & H. Society of the Women's Inst. Y. Linn. 3 L. R. A.

302; People v. Bristol & R. Turnp. Road, 23 Wend. 386; People v. Fahlhill & R. Pl. Road Co. 27 Barb. 446; State v. Milwaukee, L. E. & W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 600; Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 1, 106; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 2 L. R. A. 83, and note, 54 Bus. 353.

Grants by the public are to be strictly construed, and an intention to grant an exclusive privilege or monopoly is not to be implied. State v. Hamilton, 47 Ohio St. —, 23 Ohio L. J. 120.

The principle that, as between the State and its grantees of a franchise, the grant must be construed most strongly against the grantees, is not to be invoked in support of the forfeiture of the franchise. People v. Broadway H. Co. (Sup. Ct.) 29 N. Y. S. R. 361.

Corporations, being mere creatures of the law, possess those powers only which are given to them by their charters. See note to Chewachia Lime Works v. Dismukes (Ala.) 5 L. R. A. 101.

The grantee of a public grant can take nothing but what his grant plainly gives. See note to Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Woods (Ala.) 7 L. R. A. 385.

Forfeiture and dissolution for misuse of franchise.

In the creation of every corporation there is a tacit condition that the franchise may be forfeited for wilful misuse or misuse in regard to matters which go to the essence of the contract between it and the State. Darnell v. State, 48 Ark. 321.

Corporate franchises cannot be forfeited except in clear cases of violation of the Statute. People v. O'Brien, 2 L. R. A. 223, 111 N. Y. 1; Crawfordsville & S. W. Turnp. Co. v. Fletcher, 1 West. Rep. 247, 104 Ind. 97.

A corporation which has entered into an illegal combination, creating a monopoly, is by reason thereof liable to forfeiture and dissolution, at the suit of the people, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., in the Statute, is a judicial question, to be determined by the courts in each case as it shall arise.

Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 83, §§ 1, 2; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. supra.

To permit a corporation or trust company to be formed for the purpose of concentrating in its hands a controlling interest in the shares of stock of other competing corporations exercising a public employment like these gas companies, would necessarily so combine and blend their interest as to prevent competition between them, and thus injuriously affect the public interest.

New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra*; Gibbs v. Baltimore City Canal Gas Co. 180 U. S. 396, 408 (23 L. ed. 979, 984).

Whatever tends to prevent competition among those engaged in a public employment, or business impressed with a public character, is opposed to public policy, and is therefore unlawful, ipso facto, without proof of evil intention, or actual injury to the public.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Chicago Gas Trust Company, appellee herein, was organized under the General Incorporation Law of this State. The statement filed by the original incorporation with the secretary of state sets forth that the Trust Company was formed for two objects, or for one object of a two-fold character. The object named in the first clause of the second specification of the "statement" is, in brief, the erection and operation of works in Chicago, and other places in Illinois, for the manufacture, sale and distribution of gas and electricity. The object named in the second clause of the second specification of the statement is, in brief, "to purchase and hold or sell the capital stock" of any gas or electric company or companies in Chicago, or elsewhere in Illinois.

In this proceeding no attack is made upon the validity of the organization of the Gas Trust Company as a corporation. That it was formed in strict conformity with the requirements of the General Incorporation Law is not denied by the People. Nor does the State here question the right of the appellee Company to acquire and operate works for the manufacture and sale of gas and electricity, in pursuance of the object designated in the first clause above mentioned. Hence the controversy arising upon the demurrer to the plea in this case is not as to the right of appellee to exist as a corporation, nor as to its right to exercise the first one of the powers sought to be conferred upon it by its charter. The controversy presented by the record relates solely to the authority of the appellee to carry out the object designated in the second to State v. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co. (Neb.) 2 L. R. A. 384.

It can only be effected through the express sanction of law. See note to Botts v. Simpsonville R. Co. Turnp. Co. (Ky.) 2 L. R. A. 394.

A trust which is in effect the uniting of several corporations into a practical consolidation or partnership not authorized by their charters or effected under the statutes in reference to consolidation of corporations, is ultra vires, and warrants the forfeiture of corporate existence. Monopolies in trade or business, against public policy, are illegal.

Public policy encourages fair dealing, honest thrift and enterprise, and is opposed to monopolies and combinations, because unfriendly to such thrift and enterprise; and it declares all combinations whose object is to destroy or impede free competition in business as utterly void. Bennett, J., in Anderson v. Jett (Ky.) 6 L. R. A. 390.

Monopoly in trade or in any kind of business in this country is odious to our form of government. It is sometimes permitted to aid the government in carrying on a great public enterprise, or public work, under governmental control, in the interest of the public. Its tendency is, however, destructive of free institutions, and repugnant to the instincts of a free people, and contrary to the whole scope and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and is not allowed to exist under express provision in several of our state constitutions. It is alike destructive of both individual enterprise and individual prosperity, whether conferred upon corporations or individuals, and therefore public policy is, and ought to be, as well as public sentiment, against it. All combinations among persons or corporations for the purpose of raising or controlling the prices of merchandise, or any of the necessities of life, are monopolies, and are intolerable, and ought to receive the condemnation of all courts. Shaw clause above mentioned. It is claimed on the part of the People that the charter or articles of association of the Gas Trust Company did not and could not confer upon it the power "to purchase and hold . . . the capital stock" of other gas companies. It is averred in the information, and admitted in eight of the eleven pleas, that appellee has purchased, and now holds, a majority of the shares of the capital stock of four gas companies, to wit, the Chicago Gas-Light & Coke Company, the People's Gas-Light & Coke Company, the Equitable Gas-Light & Fuel Company and the Consumer's Gas Company; and it is admitted in three of the pleas that the appellee has purchased, and now holds, some portion of the capital stock of said four companies. The information charges that, by so purchasing and holding a majority of the shares of the capital stock of each of the four companies, the appellee usurps and exercises "powers, liberties, privileges and franchises not conferred by law." The appellee pleads, in justification, that the power so to purchase and hold the stock is granted by the terms of its charter.

Can the Chicago Gas Trust Company lawfully purchase and hold the stock of other gas companies? A distinction is sought to be drawn between "capital stock" and "shares of stock." It is said that capital stock means the entire property owned by the corporation, while a share in the stock is the right to partake, according to the amount put into the fund, of the surplus profit obtained from the use and disposal of the capital stock of the Company to those purposes for which the Company is constituted. It is therefore insisted by the appellant that, even if the charter of the appellee can be held to confer the power to purchase and hold the general property or funds of other gas companies, it does not for that reason confer the power to purchase and hold shares of stock in such other companies.

The distinction contended for undoubtedly exists under certain circumstances, and for certain purposes; but we think that, in the present case, the words, "the capital stock of any gas company or companies," are broad enough to include shares of stock. In the General Incorporation Act, under which the appellee and Consumers' Gas Company and the Equitable Gas-Light & Fuel Company are all organized, the statement is required to set forth "the name of the proposed corporation, the object for which it is to be formed, its capital stock, the number of shares of which such stock shall consist," etc. The original charter of the Chicago Gas-Light & Coke Company provides that "the capital stock of said company shall not exceed $300,000, to be divided into shares of $25," etc. The charter of the People's Gas-Light & Coke Company, as amended in 1895, also provides that its capital stock may be divided into shares. The terms thus used designate the capital stock of a corporation as that which consists of, or may be divided into, shares. Hence, for the purpose of the present discussion, "the capital stock of any gas company" may be regarded as the aggregate of all the shares of such stock.

The first, third and seventh pleas aver that the defendant uses and exercises "the power, liberty, privilege and franchise of purchasing and holding the capital stock of gas companies in the State of Illinois," and that in such use and exercise thereof "it has purchased, and still holds, capital stock of four companies," etc., without stating how much capital stock it holds. The demurrer to these pleas might well have been sustained, on the ground that they do not answer the information. The information charges that the defendant has purchased and holds a majority of the shares of stock in each of the four companies, while the pleas answer by saying that defendant holds "capital stock," and do not set forth whether the stock so held is a majority, or less than a majority, of the shares. If it be conceded, however, that the three pleas are not defective for the reason thus specified, they present the question whether appellee can lawfully purchase and hold shares of stock in other gas companies, the number of such shares being less than a majority, and therefore too small to give a controlling interest in such other companies.

There are two views which may be taken of the power to purchase and hold the capital stock of other gas companies, as designated in said second clause: Must it be regarded as an original, independent power, intended to exist exclusively and in addition to the power named in the first clause, or may it be considered as merely ancillary to the other power of maintaining and operating works for the manufacture and sale of gas? If the latter view be correct, the main object for which the Gas Trust Company was formed would be that it might itself maintain and operate works for the manufacture and sale of gas, while the purchase of shares of stock in other companies would be merely a subordinate object, incidental only to the main purpose of the corporate formation. An illustration of this idea may be found in the general law of this State in regard to life insurance companies, which makes it lawful for a life insurance company, organized in the State, to "invest its funds or accumulations in the stocks of the United States, . . . or in such other stocks or securities as may be approved by the auditor." The main object of forming such a company is to engage in the business of life insurance, but the power to invest surplus funds in certain stocks is given as an incident to such business.

Can the power to purchase and hold the stock of other gas companies be lawfully exercised by the appellee, as incidental to the main purpose of maintaining and operating works for the manufacture and sale of gas? Corporations can only exercise such powers as may be conferred by the legislative body creating them, either in express terms or by necessary implication; and the implied powers are presumed to exist to enable such bodies to carry out the express powers granted, and to accomplish the purposes of their creation. Chicago, P. & S. W. R. Co. v. Marcellus, 84 Ill. 643; Chicago Gas-Light & Coke Co. v. People's Gas-Light & Coke Co. 121 Ill. 530, 11 West. Rep. 83.

An incidental power is one that is directly and immediately appropriate to the execution of the specific power granted, and not one that has a slight or remote relation to it. Hood v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 23 Conn. 1; Franklin Co. v. Lewiston Sav. Inst. 68 Me. 48.

Where a charter, in express terms, confers upon a corporation the power to maintain and operate works for the manufacture and sale of gas, it is not a necessary implication therefrom that the power to purchase stock in other gas companies should also exist. There is no necessary connection between manufacturing gas and buying stocks. If the purpose for which a gas company has been created is to make and sell gas and operate gas-works, the purchase of stock in other gas companies is not necessary to accomplish such purpose. "The right of a corporation to invest in shares of another company cannot be implied, because both companies are engaged in a similar kind of business." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 481.

It is true that a gas company might take the stock of another corporation in payment of a debt, or perhaps as security for a debt; but the actual purchase of such stock is not directly and immediately appropriate to the execution of a specifically granted power to operate gas-works and manufacture gas. Some corporations, like insurance companies, may find it necessary to keep funds on hand for the payment of losses by death or fire, or to meet other necessary demands; but it is questionable whether even these can invest their surplus funds in the stocks of other corporations without special legislative authority. But there is nothing in the nature of a gas company which renders it proper for such a company to accumulate funds for outside investment. Its surplus profits belong to the stockholders, and, when distributed among them, can be used by them as they see fit.

If, then, the power to purchase outside stocks cannot be implied from the power to operate gas-works, and make and sell gas, a company to whom the latter power has been expressly granted cannot exercise the former without legislative authority to do so. This is the law, as settled by the great weight of authority. Boone, on the Law of Corporations, says: "Without a power specifically granted or necessarily implied a corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation, and especially where the object is to obtain the control or affect the management of the latter." § 107.

In Green's Brier's Ultra Vires (p. 91, note b) it is said: "In the United States a corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless by power specifically granted by its charter, or necessarily implied in it."

So, also, 1 Morawetz on Private Corporations (§§ 481, 483) says: "A corporation has no implied right to purchase shares in another company for the purpose of controlling its management. . . . A corporation cannot, in the absence of express statutory authority, become an incorporator by subscribing for shares in a new corporation, nor can it do this indirectly, through persons acting as its agents or tools."

The authorities referred to by these text-writers sustain the conclusions announced by them. It has been held in many cases that "in the United States corporations cannot purchase or hold or deal in the stocks of other corporations, unless expressly authorized to do so by law;" and that "one corporation cannot become the owner of any portion of the capital stock of another corporation, unless authority to become such is clearly conferred by statute." Franklin Co. v. Levison Sea, Inst. supra, Franklin Bank v. Commercial Bank, 36 Ohio St. 330, Milbank v. New York, L. R. & W. R. 16, 84 How. Pr. 20; Sumner v. Mercy, 2 Woodb. & M. 103, New Haven M. & W. M. Mut. Gas Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Meriden Agency Co. 24 Conn. 159, Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 889, Hasthurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 43 Ga. 18, Berry v. Yates, 34 Barb. 100.

The special charters of the Chicago Gas Light & Coke Company and of the People's Gas Light & Coke Company, which are set out in full in the information, and not called in question in any of the pleas, confer, by express grant, the power to erect gas-works, and manufacture and sell gas, etc., but do not confer the power to buy shares of stock in other companies. Upon the latter subject they are silent. It will not be denied that, under the authorities already cited, these two companies cannot buy and hold stock in other gas companies. The same would undoubtedly be admitted to be true of the Chicago Gas Trust Company, if it held under a special charter of like tenor and effect, granted before the adoption of the Constitution of 1870. Does it make any difference that the appellee was organized under the General Incorporation Act? The General Incorporation Act of this State does not, in express terms, confer upon the corporations organized under it the power to purchase and hold shares of stock in other corporations. It is silent upon that subject. The only powers granted by it are the ordinary corporate powers, such as the rights to be bodies corporate and politic, to sue and to be sued, to have a common seal, etc. The charter of a corporation formed under such a general law does not consist of the articles of association alone, but of such articles taken in connection with the law under which the organization takes place. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 318. The provisions of the law enter into and form a part of the charter. It certainly cannot be true that a corporation formed under the General Incorporation Act, for a purpose other than that of dealing in stocks, can exercise the power of purchasing and holding stock in other corporations, where such power cannot be necessarily implied from the nature of the power specifically granted, and is not necessary to carry the latter into effect. The power to purchase and hold stock in other companies must be the subject of legislative grant, if not in all cases, at least in cases where it cannot be implied from the powers expressly granted. The General Incorporation Law contains no grant of such power by the Legislature. Can a corporation organized under that Law be clothed with such a power by merely naming it in the statement filed with the secretary of state? We think not. The action of the secretary of state in issuing the license and the certificate of organization is necessarily, to a large extent, merely ministerial. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. 130 U. S. 1 (23 L. ed. 897), 4 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, title Corporations, p. 100, note 1.

Whether the articles of association, consisting of the statement, the license, the report of the commissioners, the certificate of organization, etc., do or do not confer such rights and powers as are authorized by the law is a matter for judicial determination. Counsel for appellee says. "We do not claim, of course, that the action of the secretary of state is conclusive, and not subject to review by this court," etc.

The question whether or not the power to purchase stock is a lawful purpose, under section 1 of the Incorporation Act, which provides that "corporations may be formed in the manner provided by this Act, for any lawful purpose" (Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 32, § 1), does not arise under this branch of the discussion. It will be pertinent, when we come to consider the right to buy and hold stock, as an original and independent power or object of formation. It is not denied by the appellant that the organization of appellee for the purpose of erecting gas works and making and selling gas is an organization for a lawful purpose. Viewing that as the main purpose for which appellee was formed, the incorporators could not tack on and connect with such main purpose the power to buy and hold stock in other gas companies, by merely describing such power in the statement. To hold that they could confer such power by writing it down in the statement would be to hold that the General Assembly could clothe them with a part of its legislative functions. When a corporation is formed under the General Incorporation Act, for the purpose of carrying on a lawful business, the Law, and not the statement or the license or the certificate, must determine what powers can be exercised as incidents of such business. Even if shares of stock be regarded as personal property, as claimed by counsel for appellee, section 5 of the General Law provides that corporations formed under it "may own . . . as much . . . personal estate as shall be necessary for the transaction of their business, and may sell and dispose of the same when not required for the uses of the corporation, . . . and may have and exercise all the powers necessary and requisite to carry into effect the objects for which they may be formed." (Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 32, § 5.)

This language negatives the idea that a corporation formed under the General Law can exercise the power of buying and holding the stock of other companies. A company engaged on its own account in manufacturing and selling gas does not need the stock of other gas companies in order to transact its business. Hence it is forbidden to own such stock, the same being "personal estate."

The language of the Act, as thus quoted, expressly restricts the powers of a corporation organized under it to such powers as are necessary and requisite to carry into effect the object for which it was formed. We have already seen that, where the object of forming a gas company is to engage in the business of making and selling gas, the purchase of stock in other companies is not necessary to carry such object into effect. Therefore the General Incorporation Act not only does not expressly authorize the purchase of such stock, but impliedly forbids it in cases where the main purpose of the corporate creation is other than the purchase and sale of stocks. It has been held that the powers obtained by the corporations organized under general laws are necessarily restricted to those mentioned in the Act (Philadelphia National College Case, 3 Whart. 445), that in such cases the charter is void as to all powers and privileges granted beyond the provisions of the Statute (Hack v. McKern, 12 Lea, 97), that, if unauthorized provisions are added to the articles of incorporation, all acts done pursuant to such provisions will be void (Eastern Pl. & Co. v. Vaughan, 14 N. Y. 548); that anything in such articles not warranted by the Statutes authorizing the formation of corporate bodies is void for want of authority (Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. supra), and that such articles must be construed strictly and against the grantee, and in favor of the government or the general public. Ibid.

Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that, if the Chicago Gas Trust Company be regarded as a corporation formed for the purpose of erecting or operating gas-works and manufacturing and selling gas, it has no power to purchase and hold or sell shares of stock in other gas companies as an incident to such purpose of its formation, even though such power is specified in its articles of incorporation.

We come, now, to the second view of the right to purchase and hold the stock of other companies, which is involved in the issue presented by demurrers to all of the eleven pleas, including the first, third and seventh. The language of the statement imports an intention to create the Chicago Gas Trust Company for two independent objects. The clauses describing these objects are connected by the conjunction "and." Both were designed to be of equal importance, and to be carried out independently of each other. According to the plain meaning of terms in which they are set forth, neither was to be regarded as secondary or incidental. The first of these objects is stated as follows: "To build, erect, purchase, lease, establish, maintain, enlarge, extend and operate or demise works in . . . Chicago, . . . and in such other place or places in . . . Illinois as said corporation may, by the vote of the majority of its stockholders, elect, for the manufacture, supply, sale and distribution of gas and electricity, or either, for the furnishing of light, heat, fuel and power," etc. There is nothing in this record to show that appellee has ever done anything towards the accomplishment of this first object. The second of the two objects is stated as follows: "And to purchase and hold or sell the capital stock, or purchase or lease or operate the property, plant, good will, rights and franchises, of any gas-works, or gas company or companies, or any electric company or electric companies, in . . . Chicago, . . . or elsewhere, in . . . Illinois, as said corporation may, by vote of the majority of the stockholders, elect," etc.

Manufacturing and selling gas is one kind of business; dealing in stocks is another and different kind of business. If it appeared that the appellee was engaged in both, under its present charter, a serious question might arise as to the power to organize one corporation for two distinct purposes, under the General Incorporation Act of this State. This record, however, only shows that the appellee is exercising the power designated by the declaration of the second object of its formation. What is the power which it is now exercising? If appellee can "purchase and hold the capital stock" of other gas companies, it can hold all the capital stock of such companies. "The capital stock" does not mean a part, but the whole. We have already seen that the "capital stock," as those words are here used, includes all the shares of stock. This view is strengthened by the use of the words, "or purchase or lease or operate the property, plant, good will, rights and franchises" of any gas company. If "capital stock" meant nothing but property, the right to purchase property would not be mentioned in separate words.

Counsel for appellee say in their brief: "It is a pretty nice distinction to say that the power to buy capital stock of a corporation does not include the power to purchase certain of the shares of that stock." If power to purchase "capital stock" includes the power to purchase "certain of the shares of the stock," then power to purchase "the capital stock" includes the power to purchase all the shares of such stock. The power sought to be conferred by these articles of association is something more than the mere right of purchasing certain shares of stock of other gas companies as an investment. An attempt has been made to vest the Chicago Gas Trust Company with the tremendous power of purchasing and holding all the shares of stock, and purchasing and operating all the property, rights and franchises, of every gas company, not only in Chicago, but in the State of Illinois. What has been done under the power thus claimed to have been lawfully granted?

There were four gas companies in the City of Chicago, whose names have already been mentioned. One of them, under an old charter of 1849, had the right to lay its mains and pipes in the streets without permission of the city. The other three had permission to do so under ordinances passed by the city council. All of them laid their pipes and mains, and were engaged in making gas and furnishing it to the inhabitants. They were the only gas companies who were so engaged, and who had undertaken to make such use of the public streets. The Chicago Gas Trust Company has purchased and now holds a majority of all the shares of stock of these four companies. It was itself organized with a capital stock of $25,000,000. The capital stock of the four companies was $14,984,200. How great a majority of such stock is held by the appellee does not appear from the record. What results must necessarily follow from such ownership of a majority of the shares of stock of these four companies? One result is that the Chicago Gas Trust Company can control the four other companies. The question is not whether it has attempted to exercise such control, the law looks to the general tendency of the power conferred. Greenwood, Pub. Pul. & Richardson v. Crandall, 48 N. Y. 545, Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio St. 606.

The 6th section of the General Incorporation Act provides that the corporate powers shall be exercised by a board of directors or managers, and that the number of such directors or managers, and their terms of office, shall depend upon "the consent of the owners of a majority of the shares of stock." It cannot be denied that the appellee, as owner of the majority of the shares of stock of these four companies, can control them, in the exercise of all their corporate powers, through a board of managers of its own selection.

In Weidinger v. Spruance, 101 Ill. 279, this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Scholfield, said: "The stockholders elect the directors, and, through them, carry into effect the corporate functions. Presumably, the directors act in obedience to the aggregate wishes of the stockholders," etc. Mudash v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 64 How. Pr. 20.

The control of the four companies by the appellee—as outside and independent corporation—suppresses competition between them, and destroys their diversity of interest, and all motive for competition. There is thus built up a virtual monopoly in the manufacture and sale of gas. The fact that the appellee, almost immediately after its organization, bought up a majority of the shares of stock of each of these companies shows that it was not making a mere investment of surplus funds, but that it designed and intended to bring the four companies under its control, and, by crushing out competition, to monopolize the gas business in Chicago. The General Incorporation Act provides "that corporations may be formed, in the manner provided in this Act, for any lawful purpose, except banking, insurance, real estate, brokerage, the operation of railroads and the business of loaning money." Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 24, § 1.

The purpose for which a corporation is formed, under the Act, must be a lawful purpose. So far as appellee was organized with the object of purchasing and holding all the shares of the capital stock of any gas company in Chicago or Illinois, it was not organized for a lawful purpose, and all acts done by it towards the accomplishment of such object are illegal and void. The word "unlawful," as applied to corporations, is not used exclusively in the sense of malum in se or malum prohibitum. It is also used to designate powers which corporations are not authorized to exercise, or contracts which they are not authorized to make, or acts which they are not authorized to do; or, in other words, such acts, powers and contracts as are ultra vires. Franklin Co. v. Lexington Sav. Inst. and Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. supra.

The business of manufacturing and distributing illuminating gas, by means of pipes laid in the streets of a city, is a business of a public character. It is the exercise of a franchise belonging to the State. The services rendered and to be rendered for such a grant are of a public nature. Companies engaged in such business owe a duty to the public. Any unreasonable restraint upon the performance of such duty is prejudicial to the public interest, and in contravention of public policy. Chicago Gas Light & Coke Co. v. People's Gas Light & Coke Co. 121 Ill. 630, 11 West. Rep. 68; Griggs v. Baltimore City Council Gas Co. 100 U. S. 200 [101 L. ed. 979].

Whatever tends to prevent competition between those engaged in a public employment or business impressed with a public character is opposed to public policy, and therefore unlawful. Whatever tends to create a monopoly is unlawful, as being contrary to public policy. 2 Addison, Cont. 742; Greenhood, Pub. Pol. 180, 842, 854, 855, 870; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 63 Pa. 178; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 340, Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 583; Hatchurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 42 Ga. 18, West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 23 W. Va. 600.

In Craft v. McConoughy, supra, where the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Craig, we said: "We understand it to be a well-settled rule of law that an agreement in general restraint of trade is contrary to public policy, illegal and void. . . . Whatever is injurious to the interest of the public is void on the ground of public policy."

In Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, supra, the Supreme Court of Ohio said: "Public policy unquestionably favors competition in trade, to the end that its commodities may be afforded to the consumer as cheaply as possible, and is opposed to monopolies, which tend to advance market prices to the injury of the general public."

We are reminded by counsel that the application by the courts of public policy to the law is a usurpation of legislative functions. And undoubtedly some courts have gone so far as to deserve the charge of such usurpation. But it is the duty of the judiciary to refuse to sustain that which is against the public policy of the State, when such public policy is manifested by the legislation or fundamental law of the State. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Sullivan, 116 Ill. 875, 4 West. Rep. 114.

By chapter 26 of our Revised Statutes, it is provided that "the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, . . . shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered of full force until repealed by legislative authority." Public policy is that principle of law which holds that no subject or citizen can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public, or against the public good. This principle owes its existence to the very sources from which the common law is supplied. Greenhood, Pub. Pol. 2, 3.

The common law will not permit individuals to oblige themselves by a contract either to do or not to do anything, when the thing to be done or omitted is in any degree clearly injurious to the public. Chappel v. Broome, 21 Wend. 159, West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 23 W. Va. 600.

In Stanton v. Allen, & Deale, 434, an agreement, whose tendency was to prevent competition, was held to be void by the principles of the common law, because it was against public policy, and injurious to the interests of the State. "Contracts creating monopolies are null and void as being contrary to public policy." 3 Addison, Cont. 742.

All grants creating monopolies are made void by the common law. 7 Bacon, Abr. 28.

In the case of the Monopolies, 11 Coke, 84, it was decided, as long ago as the forty-fourth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that a "grant to the plaintiff of the sole making of cards within the realm was utterly void, and that for two reasons: (1) that it is a monopoly, and against the common law; (2) that it is against divers Acts of Parliament," etc. Dell v. Leggett, 7 N. Y. 176, Purke v. Child, 88 U. S. 91 Wall. 441 [22 L. ed. 423].

If contracts and grants whose tendency is to create monopolies are void at common law, then, where a corporation is organized under a general statute, a provision in the declaration of its corporate purposes, the necessary effect of which is the creation of a monopoly, will also be void. Speaking of the articles of association of corporations formed under general laws, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "We have to consider, when such articles become the subject of construction, that they are, in a sense, ex parte. Their formation and execution—what shall be put into them, as well as what shall be left out—do not take place under the supervision of any official authority whatever. They are the production of private citizens, gotten up in the interest of the parties who propose to become corporators, and stimulated by their zeal for the personal advantage of the parties concerned rather than the general good. . . . These articles, which necessarily assume by the sole action of the corporators enormous powers, many of which have been heretofore considered of a public character, sometimes affecting the interests of the public very largely and very seriously, do not commend themselves to the judicial mind as a class of instruments requiring or justifying any very liberal construction. Where the question is whether they conform to the authority given by statute in regard to corporate organizations, it is always to be determined upon just construction of the powers granted therein, with a due regard for all the other laws of the State upon that subject. . . . The manner in which these powers shall be exercised, and their subjection to the restraint of the general laws of the State, and its general principles of public policy, are not in any sense enlarged by inserting in the articles of association the authority to depart therefrom." Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. supra.

In the Oregon Railway Case, supra, a railroad corporation had been organized under a general law of the State of Oregon which contained the following provision: "Whenever three or more persons shall desire to incorporate themselves for the purpose of engaging in any lawful enterprise, business, pursuit or occupation, they may do so in the manner provided in this Act;" and it was declared in the articles of association that the company might exercise the power to lease the railroad. The court there held that the power to lease its road, and turn over the use of its franchises to another company, was not authorized by the General Incorporation Act of the State, nor by the course of legislation therein, and that therefore such power could not be conferred by the declaration contained in the articles of association. The leasing of the road, in the absence of statutory authority therefor, was not sanctioned as being a "lawful enterprise," within the meaning of the language above quoted.

The public policy of a State may be indicated by the provisions of its Constitution as related to past and present legislation.

In New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat P. & Mfg. Co., 115 U. S. 650 [29 L. ed. 516], a gas company had been given, in 1836, the exclusive privilege of making and selling gas in New Orleans for some fifty years, and the question was whether such exclusive privilege was abrogated by the new Constitution of 1870, which contained a provision abolishing the monopoly features in all existing charters. The United States Supreme Court said in that case: "The monopoly clause only evinces a purpose to reverse the policy, previously pursued, of granting to private corporations franchises, accompanied by exclusive privileges, as a means of accomplishing public objects." We have been referred to more than fifty special charters granted by the Legislature of this State, in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, 1857, 1859, 1861, 1865, 1867 and 1868, to gas companies in various cities and towns in the State, each one of which confers the exclusive privilege of laying gas pipes in the streets for a number of years. But when the Constitution of 1870 was adopted, it provided in section 22, art. 4, that the General Assembly should pass no local or special law for "granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever;" and in section 1 of article 11, that "no corporation shall be created by special laws, . . . but the General Assembly shall provide, by general laws, for the organization of all corporations hereafter to be created." Manifestly the Constitution of 1870 reversed the old policy of granting exclusive privileges to gas companies. After 1870 the public policy of the State was against the granting of exclusive privileges to corporations of any kind. The General Incorporation Act of 1872 was passed in pursuance of section 1, art. 11. The prohibition of special charters granting exclusive privileges, and the authorization of incorporations under a general law, followed by the passage of such a law, put the people of this State on record as being opposed to the creation of monopolies of all kinds.

But of what avail is it that any number of gas companies may be formed under the General Incorporation Law, if a giant trust company can be clothed with the power of buying up and holding the stock and property of such companies, and, through the control thereby attained, can direct all their operations, and weld them into one huge combination? The several privileges or franchises intended to be exercised by a number of companies are thus vested exclusively in a single corporation. To create one corporation for the express purpose of enabling it to control all the corporations engaged in a certain kind of business, and particularly a business of a public character, is not only opposed to the public policy of the State, but is in contravention of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. That the exercise of the power attempted to be conferred upon the appellee Company must result in the creation of a monopoly results from the very nature of the power itself. If the privilege of purchasing and holding all the shares of stock in all the gas companies of Chicago can be lawfully conferred upon appellee under the General Incorporation Act, it can be lawfully conferred upon any other corporation formed for the purpose of buying and holding all the shares of stock of said gas companies. The design of that Act was that any number of corporations might be organized to engage in the same business, if it should be deemed desirable. But the business now under consideration could hardly be exercised by two or three corporations. Suppose that, after appellee had purchased and become the holder of the majority of shares of stock of the four companies in Chicago, another corporation had been organized with the same object in view; that is to say, for the purpose of purchasing and holding a majority of the shares of stock of the gas companies in Chicago, there being only four of such companies. What would there be for the corporation last formed to do? It could not carry out the object of its creation, because the stock it was formed to buy was already owned by an existing corporation. Hence to grant to the appellee the privilege of purchasing and holding the capital stock of any gas company in Chicago is to grant to it a privilege which is exclusive in its character. It is making use of the General Incorporation Law to secure a special "privilege, immunity or franchise," it is obtaining a special charter under the cover and through the machinery of that Law, for a purpose forbidden by the Constitution. To create one corporation that it may destroy the energies of all other corporations of a given kind, and suck their life-blood out of them, is not a "lawful purpose."

It may be here stated, as showing the policy of the State to be against the purchase by one gas company of stock in other corporations, that the power to purchase such stock is not granted in any of the more than fifty special charters above named. On the contrary, in each of these charters the power of the gas company to acquire and hold personal property is limited to such personal estate "as may be necessary and proper for the construction, extension and usefulness of the works of said company, and for the management and good government of the same." The power of purchasing and holding the capital stock of the four gas companies in question tends to relieve appellee of a proper share of its legal obligations, and to enable it to carry on a gas business without subjecting itself to the restrictions imposed by the Statute. To this extent the exercise of such power is not lawful.

The successful operation of a gas company in any city requires the use of the public streets for the purpose of laying pipes and mains. Section 1, art. 5, of the General Act for the Incorporation of Cities and Villages confers upon the city council the power to regulate the use of the streets, to provide for the lighting of the same, and to regulate the openings therein for the laying of gas pipes and mains, and erecting gas-lights. By the same section it is also provided that any company "organized for the purpose of manufacturing illuminating gas to supply cities or villages, or the inhabitants thereof, with the same, shall have the right, by consent of the common council (subject to existing rights), to erect gas factories, and lay down pipes in the streets or alleys of any city or village in this State, subject to such regulations as any such city or village may by ordinance impose." The General Act for the Formation of Corporations, considered with reference to the powers conferred by it upon gas companies organized under it, must be construed in connection with the City Incorporation Act. The provisions of the latter Act, as above quoted, are to be considered as a part of every charter granted to a gas company under the former Act. The charter, or, speaking more accurately, the articles of association, of every such gas company can only be issued or accepted subject to the foregoing provisions. Hence the appellee Company could not exercise the power of operating works for the manufacture and sale of gas in Chicago without submitting to such regulations as the common council of the city might by ordinance impose, nor could it erect a gas factory and lay its pipes in the streets without the consent of the common council. It accepted its certificate of organization subject to the condition that it would obtain such consent and submit to such regulations, if it engaged in the business of making and selling gas in that city. As between it and the State, it was bound to fulfill this condition in its capacity as a separate and independent organization, and not as the governing influence in the directories of other organizations. But it either does or may engage in the business of making and selling gas in Chicago without obtaining the consent of the council, and without submitting to the regulations of the city, by operating through the four companies, a majority of whose stock it owns, and whose business it can therefore control. It thus indirectly makes use of privileges granted to the four companies, but never granted directly to itself. The regulations which the common council might have deemed it necessary to make, with reference to the use of the streets by appellee, may not have been the same as those which the four companies were required to submit to. But this is not all. By the terms of the provision above quoted, appellee could only obtain the consent of the council to erect gas factories and lay pipes in the streets of the city "subject to existing rights." What were "existing rights?" The rights already secured by the four companies to use the streets and alleys, and make and sell gas. But the appellee, through the controlling interest which it owns in the stock of the four companies, can use the streets, and make and sell gas, independently of the existing rights of the four companies; and not only so, but it either does or may absorb, combine and use the rights of said companies, and subordinate them to its own purposes. In the mode thus indicated, the appellee, in the exercise of the extraordinary power sought to be conferred upon it, may avoid the wholesome restrictions of the law applicable to the circumstances under which gas companies are permitted to use the public streets. By the use of the words "subject to existing rights" in the City Incorporation Act the Legislature plainly indicated its intention that there should be no combination between gas companies, but that each should separately pursue its business of furnishing gas to the inhabitants. If every new company seeking the consent of the council to its use of the streets for laying gas-pipes is required to accept such consent, "subject to existing rights," the companies already existing, and already exercising the rights of using the streets and furnishing light, must be allowed to continue to do so, and to do so independently of the new company, and as separate organizations under their respective charters. Gas companies, being engaged in a business of a public character, are charged with the performance of public duties. Their use of the streets whose fee is held by the municipal corporation, in trust for the benefit of the public, has been likened to the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Chicago Gas Light & Coke Co. v. People's Gas Light & Coke Co. supra.

In Gibbs v. Baltimore City Council Gas Co., supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, in an able opinion delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, uses these words: "These gas companies entered the streets of Baltimore under their charters, in the exercise of the equivalent of the power of eminent domain, and are to be held as having assumed an obligation to fulfill the public purposes to subserve which they were incorporated."

The privileges awarded to the four gas companies under their respective charters were given them in return for and in consideration of services to be rendered by them to the public. When they entered the streets of Chicago, they assumed the performance of the public duty of furnishing light to the inhabitants. That they should be permitted or required or forced to abandon the performance of such public duty is against the policy of the law. The public duty is imposed upon each company separately, and not upon the four when combined together. Each for itself, when it accepted the articles of association, assumed an obligation to perform the objects of its incorporation. But the appellee, through the control which it does or may exercise over the four companies by reason of its ownership of a majority of their stock, renders it impossible for them to discharge their public duties, except at the dictation of an outside force, and in the manner prescribed by a corporation operating independently of them. They are thus virtually forced to abandon the performance of their duty to the public. The freedom and effectiveness of their action in carrying out the purposes of their creation are seriously interfered with, if not actually destroyed. A power whose exercise leads to such a result cannot be lawfully intrusted to any corporate body.

We held in Chicago Gas Light & Coke Co. v. People's Gas Light & Coke Co., supra, that for the reasons there stated a contract between two of these four companies, the effect of which was to stifle competition between them, and necessitate an abandonment of their public duties, was against public policy, and could not be enforced. The attempt to consolidate the two companies by placing the majority of their stock in the hands of the appellee would accomplish the same unlawful result which was sought to be obtained by the forbidden contract. In ordinances passed by the common council of the City of Chicago, granting permission to the other two of the four companies, to wit, the Equitable Gas Light & Fuel Company and the Consumers' Gas Company (or its predecessor), to lay pipes in the streets for the purpose of supplying gas to the inhabitants of the city, it was provided that such permission should not take effect until the two last-named companies had given bond not to "sell, lease or transfer their franchises and privileges to any other gas company," and not to "enter into any combination with any other company concerning the rate (or price) to be charged for gas." But the Chicago Gas Trust Company, by reason of its ownership of the majority of the shares of stock of the Consumers' Company and the Equitable Company, can effect a virtual transfer of their franchises and privileges to itself, in spite of the condition imposed by the ordinance, and in utter disregard of the public interests.

We concur in the following views expressed by the Supreme Court of Georgia in the case of Central R. Co. v. Collins, supra: "All experience has shown that large accumulations of property in hands likely to keep it intact for a long period are dangerous to the public weal. Having perpetual succession, any kind of a corporation has peculiar facilities for such accumulation, and most governments have found it necessary to exercise great caution in their grants of corporate powers. Even religious corporations, professing, and in the main, truly, nothing but the general good, have proven obnoxious to this objection, so that in England it was long ago found necessary to restrict them in their powers of acquiring real estate. Freed, as such bodies are, from the sure bound to the schemes of individuals,—the grave,—they are able to add field to field, and power to power, until they become entirely too strong for that society which is made up of those whose plans are limited by a single life."

We are of the opinion that the court below erred in overruling the demurrers to the plea.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the plea, and for further proceedings in accordance with the views here expressed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

1. A common carrier cannot, even by express contract, exempt itself from liability for losses resulting from its gross negligence or willful misconduct.
2. An amount named in a bill of lading as the limit of liability will not restrict recovery for a loss due to gross negligence, where the amount was inserted by the carrier's agent without making any questions as to the value of the property, and without notice to the shipper of any difference in rates in case of such limitation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Second District, af-

NOTE.—Carrier may limit or restrict his liability by contract. See notes to Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Payne (Va.) 8 L. R. A. 849; Hull v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Minn.) 8 L. R. firming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kane County in favor of plaintiff for $3,200 in an action to recover damages for the loss of plaintiff's horse while in defendant's possession for purposes of transportation under a contract limiting defendant's liability in case of loss to $100. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. W. C. Gandy, with Messrs W. B. Keop and R. W. Bettsford, for appellant.

Mr. A. H. Barry, with Messrs Sherwood & Jones, for appellee.

Shoep, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case by appellee against appellant, as a common carrier, to recover damages for the loss of the plaintiff's horse while being shipped over appellant's railroad. There is little dispute as to the facts of the case. There was ample evidence to show gross negligence on the part of the servants of the defendant from which the injury to the horse resulted. By the ruling of the trial court in giving an instruction for the plaintiff, and in the modification of one asked by the defendant, the question of law is presented whether it is competent for a railway carrier to limit or restrict by contract its liability for an injury to property, during its transportation, against the gross negligence of the carrier or its servants. The Act in respect of common carriers, approved March 27, 1874, provides "that, whenever any property is received by a common carrier to be transported from one place to another within or without this State, it shall not be lawful for such carrier to limit his common-law liability solely to deliver such property at the place to which the same is to be transported, by any stipulation or limitation expressed in the receipt given for such property." This is substantially re-enacted in § 82, chap. 114, relating to railroads. Rev. Stat. 18-9, chap. 114, § 82.

These statutes do not in terms prohibit common carriers from limiting their common-law liabilities by contract with the owner of property delivered for transportation. Formerly the restriction of a carrier's liability, when expressed in a mere receipt, often gave rise to the question as to whether the shipper had knowingly assented thereto, and this enactment was doubtless intended to obviate the difficulty growing out of that condition. In many respects a railway carrier may, by express contract, limit its strict common-law liability. It may by special contract limit the liability to such damage or loss as may occur on its own line of carriage. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 88; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Montfort, 80 Ill. 173; Hild v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 71 Ill. 438; Brie R. Co. v. Wilson, 84 Ill. 229; Wadash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Jaggerman, 115 Ill. 407, 2 West. Rep. 863.

The carrier may limit its liabilities against loss by fire without his fault (Van Schaack v. Northern Transp. Co. 3 Biss. 394); and the liability may thus be limited as an insurer, and against other loss, not attributable to its negligence or that of its servants, and may require the value of goods offered for transportation to be fixed by the shipper, to protect itself against fraud in case of loss.

The courts of this State have never held that the carrier may limit or restrict its liability for loss or damage resulting from its own gross negligence, or the gross negligence of its servants. On the contrary, it has been repeatedly and uniformly held that it cannot do so, even by express contract with the shipper. The question first arose in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Morrison, 19 Ill. 180, and it was there said: "We think the rule a good one, as established in England and in this country, that railroad companies have the right to restrict their liability as common carriers by such contracts as may be agreed upon specially, they still remaining liable for gross negligence or willful misfeasance, against which good morals and public policy forbid that they should be permitted to stipulate." And substantially the same language is used in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read, 27 Ill. 484, and in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Adams, 49 Ill. 474.

In Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smyer, 88 Ill. 854, it was held that a railroad company may restrict its liabilities for loss or injury occurring during the transportation of property, the carrier being still held liable for gross negligence or willful misfeasance.

So in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Adams, supra, it is said "that, although a railroad company might protect itself by contract against certain risks assumed by common carriers and belonging to their vocation, it was contrary to good morals and public policy that they should be allowed to stipulate against their own gross negligence, or that of their employes, or their willful default."

In Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co., 69 Ill. 62, the court holds that the contract exempting carriers from liabilities is not to be construed as providing against loss or injury occasioned by actual negligence on their part.

In the subsequent case of Arnold v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 88 Ill. 273, it was said: "The doctrine is settled in this court that railroad companies may by contract exempt themselves from liability on account of the negligence of their servants, other than that which is gross or willful."

In the Read Case, supra, the question arose where the plaintiff was riding on a free ticket, on the back of which was an indorsement to the effect that the person accepting the same assumes all risks of accident and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable under any circumstances for injury to the person or property of the passenger while using the ticket. It was held that the acceptance and use of the ticket made the indorsement thereon a special contract, but that the contract did not exempt the company from liability for injury caused by gross negligence.

In Brie R. Co. v. Wilson, supra, we said: "The law has wisely, and for reasons that concern the public welfare, inhibited a common carrier of passengers or freight from contracting against its own negligence, or that of its servants and employes." See also Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Briggs, 85 Ill. 80.

In Adams Exp. Co. v. Stettinners, 61 Ill. 184, goods were shipped from Chicago to New York, worth in fact $400, for which the company gave the shipper a receipt, limiting its liability to $50 in case of loss, of which the shipper had notice. It was there said that "even if it should be conceded that the shipper in this case must be considered as having assented to the terms of the bill of lading, we cannot hold the carrier excused from the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care. Courts have often had occasion to express their regret that common carriers have been permitted, even by contract, to discharge themselves from the obligations imposed by the salutary rules of the common law. . . . It is very unreasonable in the carrier to say that it will in no event be liable beyond the sum of $50, in the absence of a special contract, though it may have received much more than that sum merely in the way of freight. . . . It would be very easy for them to require the shipper to specify the value of the merchandise, . . . making their charges in proportion to their liability. If the shipper should falsely state the value, he could not complain of being held to his own valuation. In order to prevent the carrier from releasing himself by contract from all liability, courts have laid down the rule above stated, that he cannot, even by contract, exempt himself from the exercise of reasonable care."

And the same rule was laid down in Beeswicks v. Adams Exp. Co., 83 Ill. 523, and it was there held that the defendant was liable for the full value of the goods, if the loss was owing to negligence on the part of the railway company, who was the servant of the express company in the transportation of the goods.

We have thus given an epitome of cases decided by this court, to which others might be added, for the purpose of showing that we are committed to the doctrine that a common carrier cannot, even by express contract, exempt itself from liability resulting from gross negligence or willful misconduct, committed by itself, or by its servants or employees. Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, in this State the common carrier cannot contract for exemption from responsibility for a failure on its part, or that of its servants, to exercise ordinary care in the transaction of its business. If the carrier may by contract limit its liability for gross negligence or willful misfeasance to any extent, it may contract for total exemption. A contract for exemption from liability for its torts being void as against public policy, it cannot shield itself, as to any portion of the damages to persons or property, occasioned by its gross negligence or willful misconduct. As we have seen, it may protect itself against fraud by requiring the consignee to state the value of the thing shipped; but when it receives property for transportation it must exercise reasonable care until it reaches its place of destination, and will not be permitted to absolve itself from that responsibility.

By the strict rule of the common law, the carrier was liable for injuries resulting from causes beyond his control, and which were not the result of his act or the omission of his duty, the exception being that he was not liable for injury or loss resulting from the act of God or the public enemy. Thus he must account for goods received for transportation, even though they be destroyed by fire without his fault. The rule has generally been so far relaxed that the carrier may, by special contract, exempt himself from this strict liability imposed by the common law; but the weight of authority, in our judgment, holds, as this court has uniformly held, that he may not exempt himself from liability for damages resulting from the gross negligence or willful misconduct of himself or of his servants. The law does not authorize common carriers to fix arbitrarily the value of goods delivered to them for transportation, and thereby limit their liability in case of loss. If a value should be fixed by the carrier, as before stated, and the contract of shipment was based thereon, the amount thus fixed would ordinarily determine the liability of the carrier. It would not, however, if untruthfully given, in respect of property that the carrier had less opportunity to inspect and know the value of than the shipper, entitle the carrier to show that the value was less than that fixed.

It cannot be said that the clause in this contract, attempting to limit a recovery to $100, amounts to an admission on the part of the shipper that the horse was worth no more than that sum. It was not made by the shipper, or intended as a statement of the value of the property, but was intended to fix a limit to the defendant's liability in case of loss; and if the contract had not been void, and had been knowingly entered into by the shipper or his authorized agent, it might have furnished the measure of recovery. If the injury to the property and damage resulting had been caused by any casualty against which the carrier might contract, the tender made by the defendant of the amount named in the contract might have been a bar to recovery, if it had been kept good. It is manifest from the foregoing that the tender was not effectual to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff. As before said, we are not unmindful that a contrary rule has been announced by courts of the highest respectability, and among them the Supreme Court of the United States. Notwithstanding the great respect we entertain for the very learned and eminent tribunals which have thus held, we are so strongly committed to the doctrine before announced that we feel compelled to adhere to the rule so long and firmly established in this State. And notwithstanding the persuasive weight of the rulings of these eminent tribunals, and of the reasons given for their decisions, we are still satisfied that the rule laid down in this State is based upon sound reason and a wise public policy, and is also supported by the decided weight of authority. In this case the agent of appellant came to the agent of the appellee and others, and offered special inducements to ship their animals over appellant's road. No representation was made by appellee or his agent to induce the fixing of the value either of the property shipped or of the services of the appellant for its carriage. It is insisted that the Company had two classifications at the time under which live stock was shipped; that one limited the amount of recovery for a horse to $100 in case of loss, and that in the other class there was no limitation, but a higher freight rate was charged. At the same time of this shipment no notice was given of any such classification. The appellant's agent received the property, charged what he saw proper, and made out the bill of lading without asking any questions as to the value of the property. The fact that such classification existed could in no way affect the plaintiff's right of recovery, unless notice thereof had been brought home in some way to the plaintiff or his agent. But it cannot avail in any event as against the right of recovery here. Plaintiff was guilty of no misconduct, which would estop him from asserting his right to recover the value of his property, and it was unlawful for the railway carrier to contract for exemption from liability resulting from the gross negligence of its servants. Some other minor points are made, which, however, have been disposed of by what has already been said, and no further discussion need be indulged.

We find no substantial error in the record, and the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morrison & Whitlock, for appellant:

Appellant could not go into a court of equity and procure the cancellation of this deed, and appellee is estopped from obtaining affirmative relief at law. The court will leave the parties where it finds them, giving relief to neither.

Mr. Edward L. McDonald, for appellee:

It is not competent, in an action of ejectment, to show who paid the consideration money on the conveyance of the premises to the plaintiff, with the view to establish a trust.

While in a suit on a simple contract fraud is a good defense, it is not generally pleadable in bar when the action is founded on a specialty.

The sudden springing of such defense upon the trial as that attempted in this case would operate as a surprise, and tend to mar the system of common-law pleading, which intends that a party must have some notice of the questions which must be met.

Escherick v. Traver, 65 Ill. 381.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment, brought by Frank H. Clark against Susie Kirkpatrick, to recover lot 27, in Tilton & Cassell's Addition to Jacksonville. A trial was had on a plea of not guilty, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff; and the defendant now appeals to this court.

NOTE.—Parties in pari delicto are without remedy.

Where parties are concerned in illegal agreements or transactions, whether they are malum prohibitum or malum in se, courts of equity, following the rule of law as to participators in crime, will not grant relief to either party in accordance with the maxim, in pari delicto, etc. Harrington v. Bigelow, 11 Paige, 349, 5 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 158; Warburton v. Aken, 1 McLean, 400; Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 333; Swartz v. Gillett, 1 Chand. 207; Davies v. London & P. M. Ins. Co. L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 469; Bromley v. Smith, 3 Hill, 517; Vandyck v. Hewitt, 1 East, 96; Howson v. Hancock, 8 T. R. 575; Browning v. Morris, Cowp. 790; Osborne v. Williams, 18 Ves. Jr. 579; Buller, N. P. 131.

Where the scheme is malum in se, and the parties to it are in pari delicto, the law refuses to aid either of them against the other, but leaves them where they have placed themselves by their own act. Thomas v. Richmond, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 349 (20 L. ed. 458); Smith v. Hubbs, 10 Me. 71; Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 64; Knowlton v. Congress & E. Spring Co. 57 N. Y. 518; Nellis v. Clark, 20 Wend. 24; Smith, Cont. 3d Am. ed. 187; Burt v. Place, 6 Cow. 431; LeWarne v. Meyer, 88 Fed. Rep. 191; Keel v. Larkin, 83 Ala. 146.

The only exception to this rule is where one party acts under oppression, injustice, hardship, undue influence or great inequality of age or condition; although he may be in delicto, he is not in pari delicto, and may have relief in equity. Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 421; Pinckston v. Brown, 3 Jones, Eq. 494; Freelove v. Cole, 41 Barb. 818; Goodenough v. Spencer, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 248, 45 How. Pr. 347; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 800; Foley v. Greene, 1 New Eng. Rep. 17, 14 R. I. 618; Bagley v. Williams, 4 Giff. 623.

The plaintiff, at the trial, made proof, under the twenty fifth section of the Statute in relation to ejectment, that he claimed title through one Matthew Ashelby, a common source of title with the defendant, and then read in evidence a warranty deed from said Ashelby and wife, duly acknowledged and recorded, conveying said lot to him. The defendant's counsel then called the defendant as a witness in her own behalf, and, after she had testified that she had been acquainted with the plaintiff for about eleven years, and that, when she first became acquainted with the lot in question, it was the property of Mr. Ashelby, she was asked the following questions: "State whether or not, at the time this deed was made to Mr. Clark, you were in a controversy with your husband, and whether or not the deed was made to Mr. Clark by arrangement between you and Mr. Clark, so as to prevent any claim your husband might have on the property if the deed was in you." "You may state whether or not Mr. Clark at any time, in fact, was the owner of and in possession of that property."

These questions, being both objected to by the plaintiff's counsel on the ground of incompetency and immateriality, were excluded, and thereupon the defendant's counsel made to the court the following statement and offer: "We expect and offer to prove by this witness and two other witnesses, Mr. and Mrs. Rogers, who have been sworn and are now in court, that they heard a conversation between Mr. Clark and Mrs. Kirkpatrick in which it was stated that Mr. Clark had no interest in the property, and never had any; that the deed was made to him for the purpose of blinding and defrauding creditors and the husband of Mrs. Kirkpatrick, and that Mr. Clark then admitted that every cent that Mrs. Kirkpatrick ever owed him had been paid, and that he had no claim to the property,—no right to it,—and that the property in controversy in this case was held by him only for the purpose of blinding and delaying creditors; that she asked him to give her a deed to the property, and he refused to do it, but admitted that he had no title in it, and that he only held it to cover it up so that the creditors could not get it, and also to prevent her husband from having any right to it."

The evidence thus offered, being objected to as incompetent, was excluded, and counsel then further offered to prove by Mrs. Kirkpatrick "that she went, in company with Mr. Clark, to Mr. Ashelby, and requested Mr. Ashelby to make the deed to Mr. Clark for the property, but did not tell Mr. Ashelby the reason for his being made to Mr. Clark; that Mrs. Kirkpatrick paid in full the consideration of said deed."

This evidence also, being objected to for the same reason, was excluded. Exceptions were duly preserved by the defendant to the rulings of the court excluding said evidence, and said rulings are the only errors now assigned upon the record.

A considerable portion of the evidence offered was clearly incompetent or immaterial, or both. Thus, the question put to the witness as to whether the plaintiff had ever been, in fact, the owner of the property in question, if understood as calling for the legal ownership of the lot, was incompetent, as the legal title to lands cannot be proved in that mode. If understood as calling for the equitable title, it was immaterial, as in this form of action only legal titles can be investigated. So of the question whether the deed was not made to the plaintiff, by arrangement between him and the defendant, with a view to keeping said lot free from any claim the defendant's husband might have thereon in case the title was taken in her name. The evidence called for by that question would simply have tended to show that the plaintiff took and was holding the title to said lot as trustee for the defendant. Her equitable title thus attempted to be shown was quite immaterial, since it constituted no defense to the action. The rule is well settled that a trustee may recover in ejectment the lands affected by the trust, even as against the cestui que trust.

In Ross v. Allen, 10 Ill. 200, this court said: "A court of law may, indeed, investigate some questions of fraud, and, when proved, treat a deed as a nullity and conveying no title, as where a party was induced to execute a deed supposing it was another paper; but in general it will not go behind the naked legal title, and inquire where the equities are. Even in case of a naked trustee, the law is so strenuous for the legal title that it enables the trustee to recover in ejectment against the cestui que trust." See also Kirkland v. Orr, 94 Ill. 400; Sedgwick v. W. Trial of Title to Land, § 222, and cases cited in notes.

If it be said that the purpose of said question was to elicit evidence tending to show that said conveyance to the plaintiff was a fraud upon the rights of the defendant's husband, it may be answered that, even admitting that proof of such fraud would have been material, said evidence would have had no tendency to prove it. If the lot in question had been conveyed directly to the defendant, it would have vested in her husband no right of interest except an inchoate right of dower; and it was no fraud upon him if his wife, in purchasing the lot, had the title conveyed to a trustee for the express purpose of preventing such right from attaching. Even at common law, where the husband was entitled to the possession and enjoyment of his wife's lands during their joint lives, it was never supposed to be a fraud upon his rights for his wife to have lands purchased with her separate means, or derived from sources other than her husband, conveyed to a trustee for the sole purpose of placing them beyond his control, and having them held for her separate use; and such trusts were habitually resorted to for that purpose. But under our Statute a married woman is entitled to the sole possession and enjoyment of her lands free from the interference and control of her husband, the husband's right of dower, even after it has become vested, being imperfect and incapable of assertion or beneficial enjoyment until after her death. How, then, can he be said to have rights in lands which his wife does not yet own, but which she contemplates purchasing, which it would be a fraud upon him to deprive him of? Dower in lands which the wife does not yet own is an interest to which the husband has neither a legal, equitable nor moral right; and the wife is entirely at liberty to so manage her purchases made with her own means, if she can, as to prevent his acquiring such right.

A more difficult question is raised by that portion of the offer of the defendant's counsel in which they propose to prove by said witnesses that the lot in question was paid for by the defendant, but that, by arrangement between her and the plaintiff, the conveyance was made by Ashelby to the plaintiff with intent to hinder and defraud the defendant's creditors; such intention being participated in by both the plaintiff and the defendant.

It is a general rule, subject, it is true, to certain exceptions, that, where parties are concerned in illegal agreements, they are left without remedy against each other, provided they are in pari delicto. The law, in such cases, refuses to lend its aid to either party, but leaves them where it finds them, to suffer the consequences of their illegal or immoral acts. This rule is ordinarily expressed by the maxim, ex dolo malo, or ex turpi causa, non oritur actio, or by the maxim, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendente et possidentis. These maxims are applied to executed transactions as well as to those which are executory, and are enforced by courts of law as well as courts of equity.

As said by the chancellor in Bolt v. Rogers, 3 Paige, 154, 3 N.Y. Ch. L. ed. 95, "Wherever two or more persons are engaged in a fraudulent transaction to injure another, neither law nor equity will interfere to relieve either of those persons, as against the other, from the consequences of their own misconduct."

In Smith v. Hubbs, 10 Me. 71, the court says: "There is a marked and settled distinction between executory and executed contracts of a fraudulent or illegal character. Whatever the parties to an action have executed for fraudulent or illegal purposes, the law refuses to lend its aid to enable either party to disturb. Whatever the parties have fraudulently or illegally contracted to execute, the law refuses to compel the contractor to execute, or pay damages for not executing, but in both cases leaves the parties where it finds them. The object of the law in the latter case is, as far as possible, to prevent the contemplated wrong, and in the former to punish the wrong-doer, by leaving him to the consequences of his own folly or misconduct." See also Miller v. Marchie, 21 Ill. 132; Nellis v. Clark, 20 Wend. 34; Howell v. Fountain, 3 Ga. 176; Corey v. Smith, 11 Ga. 539; White v. Orm, 16 Ga. 416; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 298.

If it be true, as the evidence offered would tend to show, that the defendant purchased the lot in question of Ashelby with her own money, but, for the purpose of hindering and defrauding her creditors, entered into a fraudulent arrangement or conspiracy with the plaintiff to have said lot conveyed to him, said transaction was illegal, and within the condemnation of the fourth section of our present Statute of Frauds. The transaction being consummated by the execution of the conveyance to the plaintiff, leaving the defendant in the possession which she had previously obtained under a demise from Ashelby, the law should leave them both where it finds them. The defendant, clearly, could not be permitted to go into a court of equity to compel an execution by the plaintiff of his trust, and it would seem that, upon the same principle, the plaintiff should be debarred from coming into a court of law to use his ill-gotten title for the purpose of recovering of the defendant the possession.

We know of no case where this precise question has been decided by this court, but cases are to be found where the reasoning adopted has a tendency to support the view above expressed. The case of Rogers v. Brent, 10 Ill. 573, was ejectment, brought by the holder of a patent from the United States, issued to him as assignee of the certificate of entry, against the holder of a title derived through a sheriff's deed executed upon a sale of the land on execution against the original holder of said certificate prior to its assignment to the plaintiff. The court, in holding that the assignment of the certificate and the patent subsequently issued thereon were fraudulent and void as to the defendant, said: "The law is that the common-law courts may entertain jurisdiction of questions of fraud, and that a conveyance, whether it be by deed from an individual or by a patent from the government, although executed with all the forms of law, when obtained in fraud of the rights of others may, in an action of ejectment, be disregarded by the court as void at the instance of the injured party, or those holding under him." In the course of the opinion it is said, by way of argument, that "it would hardly have been denied that a court of law would treat as a nullity a deed to the assignee of Samuel, when it was established that the assignment was made and the deed obtained to defraud creditors, or to defeat a title previously obtained by a sale under an execution against Samuel (the assignor)."

In Jamison v. Beaudin, 4 Ill. 113, which was also an action of ejectment, the plaintiff's proof of title consisted of a certificate of pre-emption; and, certain evidence tending to impeach the pre-emption on the ground of fraud being excluded by the trial court, this court, in holding that such exclusion was erroneous, said: "Fraud, it is said, vitiates all acts as between the parties to it, nor can there be a doubt that fraud is cognizable in a court of law as well as equity. It is an admitted principle that a court of law has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of equity in cases of fraud. The evidence offered went directly to the validity of the certificate of pre-emption purchase. If it had its inception in fraud, it was certainly competent for the defendant to show the fact; and, if the officers granting it were parties to the fraudulent act, it was no doubt void, and might be impeached in an inquiry in which the pre-emptor was a party."

The case of Miller v. Marchie, 21 Ill. 153, was a bill in equity for the foreclosure of a mortgage alleged by the mortgagor to have been executed without consideration, for the purpose of securing his property against his creditors until he could get means to settle with them; and this court, in holding that the defense should have been sustained, said: "If money has been actually paid or property transferred, and the grantee put in possession, courts will not compel the money or property to be restored or the party ousted. They will not, on the one hand, undo what has been done, nor, on the other, perfect what has been left unfinished. Suppose the position of these parties reversed, and the appellant was seeking by bill in chancery to rescind the mortgage, and for a surrender of the notes. . . . The court would not interfere. It would leave the parties where it found them, aiding neither. We would say: 'You executed the notes and the mortgage for a fraudulent purpose. The act is binding on you, and you cannot have our aid to compel their surrender.' So we say to the appellee here: 'You have the notes and mortgage. You were a willing party to a proposed fraud. We will give you no assistance to enforce the one or the other. Equity aids not iniquity.' Had an absolute deed of the premises been made, and the party put in possession, the court would not interfere to oust him." See also Tyler v. Tyler, 126 Ill. 525.

In the first two of the three cases last above cited the fraud was set up by parties not in pari delicto with the parties against whom the fraud was charged. Those cases sustain the rule, however, that a court of law will, in an action of ejectment, on proper proof, hold a conveyance upon which a party relies to establish his title to be fraudulent and void, at least where the fraud is charged by one who is not a party to it. In the case last cited the court held that it was proper to grant relief at the instance of a participant in the fraud. In the present case, if the facts are as the evidence offered would tend to show, the fraudulent transaction has been consummated, to the extent of vesting the title in the plaintiff and leaving the possession in the defendant. Here, according to the rules of law above discussed, they should be left. The defendant, clearly, can have no remedy to recover the title; and, if the defendant is permitted in this action to recover the possession, said rules will be applied in all their rigor to the defendant, while the plaintiff will be exempted from their application. His present title, without the possession or the means of obtaining it, is a barren right. But, if a court of law can lend him its aid to recover the possession, his title becomes perfect, at least as against the defendant; and the law, notwithstanding his participation in the fraud, will be to him both a sword and a shield. We are not inclined to so apply the law as to involve an absurdity of this character.

In Harrison v. Hatcher, 44 Ga. 688, the precise question before us was presented, and we are disposed to concur with the conclusion reached by the court in that case. The action was ejectment, and the plaintiff claimed title under a deed executed to him by the defendant; and the evidence tended to show that said deed was executed by defendant without consideration, and for the purpose of defrauding the grantor's creditors. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury, among other things, in substance, that if said deed was executed by him to defraud his creditors, and that he remained in possession, the transaction was fraudulent, and the defendant could not be ousted of possession, as the court would not aid a party to a fraud to assert rights against the other party, and would not disturb the possession. This charge the court refused to give; and, there being a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, it was held on appeal that the refusal of the court to charge as requested was error. The point thus raised is discussed in its opinion as follows: "On looking into the cases upon this subject, we are satisfied that the rule in pari delicto applies to the condition of a defendant in a suit, even though he sets up his own fraud. He is in possession, and the courts will not aid the other party to get possession under a fraudulent deed. They will even permit the defendant to say: 'The deed under which the plaintiff claims is a fraud,—the result of evil practices between him and me;' and if this be made out by the proof the plaintiff cannot recover."

It follows that in the present case the evidence offered, so far as it tended to show that the deed under which the plaintiff claims title was executed in fraud of the defendant's creditors, was proper, and should have been admitted, and that its exclusion was error. For said error the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

M. P. HARWELL, Pf. in Err.,

(.....Ga.....)

"That a creditor transferred to his attorney a just debt, and caused attachment and garnishment to issue and be prosecuted in an adjoining State, thus coercing payment, though both parties were citizens of Georgia, and though the motive for proceeding elsewhere was to evade the laws of this State exempting the debtor's wages from process of garnishment, constitutes no cause of action in favor of the debtor against the creditor.

*Read note by BLACKLEY, Ch. J.
S. L. R. A.

ERROR to the Atlanta City Court to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged contempt and abuse of law in the collection of a certain claim by attachment. Affirmed.

Petitioner alleged that he was in the employ of the Western & Atlantic R. Co.; that several members of his family being sick, he purchased drugs of defendants to the amount of $8 70, upon which he afterwards paid a small amount. When asked to pay the remainder he informed defendants that he was earning but $1.25 per day, with which amount he was hardly able to support his family, but that he would pay the amount as soon as possible; that defendants thereupon made a pretended transfer of their claim to a Tennessee attorney, who instituted a garnishment proceeding and attached petitioner's wages; that petitioner was forced to go to Tennessee, and, in order to feed his family, pay said attorney $18 out of the wages so sequestered; that the amount so squeezed from his daily wages did not leave him enough to pay his house rent and provide sufficient food and clothing for his family, and that the $18 taken from his wages under the circumstances is blood money; that both parties were residents of Georgia and that the drugs were sold and the wages earned there; that the proceeding was a trick to evade the laws of Georgia and treat them with contempt, that the proceeding was an abuse of legal process; and that, petitioner's wages being free from garnishment in Georgia, defendants were guilty of a breach of legal duty because of which petitioner ought to recover.

Messrs. Haygood & Douglas, for plaintiff in error:

If plaintiff and defendant to a suit in another State both live in Georgia, the plaintiff may be restrained from using process in that other State to collect a debt exempt under the laws of Georgia.

The fact that they reside in this State can make no difference. The law of the place of the injury invariably governs.

Blockley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the statute law of this State, "all journeymen, mechanics and day laborers shall be exempt from the process and liabilities of garnishment on their daily, weekly or monthly wages, whether in the hands of their employers or others." Code, § 3554.

We are not informed by anything directly alleged in the plaintiff's declaration whether or not any similar law prevails in the State of Tennessee. The fair inference from what is alleged would be that there is no like exemption in that State, or at least none of which nonresident debtors could avail themselves. It appears that the defendants, who were creditors of the plaintiff, for the purpose of resorting to a Tennessee forum, and to evade this provision in the laws of Georgia, transferred their account to their attorney, and caused attachment to issue in Tennessee, and a garnishment to be served on the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, who was indebted to the plaintiff for wages earned as a daily laborer. The effect of this garnishment was to constrain the plaintiff to pay the debt, in whole or in part, which he owed to the defendants, the sum paid being $18. This is the grievance of which he complains, alleging that he was injured and damaged thereby in the sum of $2,500. Both parties being citizens of Georgia, it is not unlikely that, if application had been made in time, an injunction might have been obtained, restraining the defendants from prosecuting their attachment and garnishment in Tennessee. Ample and apparently sound authority for so doing may be found. Snook v. Sactier, 25 Ohio St. 516; Kryser v. Rice, 47 Md. 208. Tanger v. Landrey, 69 Iowa, 725; Hager v. Adams, 70 Iowa, 746; Mumper v. Wilson, 73 Iowa, 163; Wilson v. Joseph, 107 Ind. 490, 5 West. Rep. 681.

It does not follow, however, that because the plaintiff might have asserted his exemption in this way, and claimed the benefit of the law of his own State, it was in any sense unlawful, or legally wrongful, for the defendants to bring their attachment in Tennessee, and use there the remedy of garnishment furnished by the laws of that State. Unless restrained by some tribunal of their own State, they were but exercising a privilege common to all citizens of the United States. While left free to act according to their own will in the use of remedies they had as much right to sue in Tennessee as they would have had if they were citizens of that State. Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 53.

In dealing with a somewhat similar question, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Lawrence v. Batchelder, 181 Mass. 504, speaking by Field, J., said: "The argument of the plaintiffs in the case at bar is that, as it was contrary to equity for the defendant to proceed with his suits to judgment, and to a satisfaction of the judgments from the funds attached, so it is contrary to equity for him to retain the money so obtained, and that they can maintain an action at law against the defendant for money had and received to their use, because the money, ex quo et bono, belongs to them. This argument rests on the assumption that courts of law will afford a remedy in damages for all wrongs done, which courts of equity, if seasonably applied to, will prevent; but this is not true. Courts of equity recognize and enforce rights which courts of law do not recognize at all; and it is often on this ground that defendants in equity are enjoined from prosecuting actions at law." The plaintiff may have had his election to bring the defendants' rights, as against his wages, to the test of Georgia law, or allow them to be tested by Tennessee law. This election could be exercised, however, only in due time and proper manner. He could not allow the law of Tennessee to be applied to the case, and afterwards, by such an action as this, have the law of Georgia applied to it. His remedy, if he had any, was to prevent, by injunction upon his adversary, the application of Tennessee law as a rule of adjudication. This he did not do otherwise than by paying the debt. Although it is not distinctly stated, we think it is to be inferred from the language of the declaration that he paid before the proceeding in Tennessee reached a conclusion by judgment. Had it resulted in a judgment, there can be no doubt, assuming that the attachment and garnishment were regular according to the laws of Tennessee, that such judgment would have to be treated in Georgia as having the same effect as would be ascribed to it in Tennessee. Green v. Van Buskirk, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 810 [18 L. ed. 600], 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 189 [19 L. ed. 109].

A case very similar to the present has been decided in Indiana; and it was held that, even though there was a statute making the act complained of penal, no recovery could be had for the transfer of a just debt, and proceeding upon it by attachment in another State, though the effect was to deprive the debtor of his exemption allowed by the laws of his own State, of which State the creditor also was a citizen. Uppinghouse v. Mundel, 108 Ind. 238, 1 West. Rep. 204.

The soundness of that adjudication may be questioned, inasmuch as there was an express statute violated. But with us there is no such statute, and we are therefore not required to go the full length of this Indiana precedent.

Upon no recognized theory of a malicious abuse of process, or the malicious prosecution of a civil action, can the declaration before us be upheld. There was a just debt, and a lawful resort to a competent forum (nothing to the contrary being alleged) for its collection, and payment was made either pending the suit or after judgment. The debt was thus, in whole or in part, extinguished. The money paid is no longer that of the debtor, but has become the property of the creditor. While there may have been damage, there has been no legal injury—no wrong done to the plaintiff—for which any court adjudicating upon legal principles can afford redress. There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration.

Judgment affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

J. B. STEELE, App't.

(.....N. C.....)

1. Where an innkeeper made a regulation that "no livery-man or agent of any transportation or baggage company, no washer-woman or sewing-woman, not connected with the house, or loafer or lounge or objectionable person will be allowed in the hotel," and gave notice to the agent of a livery stable who had previously been in the habit of "drumming" for custom at his hotel not to come upon the hotel premises again,—Held, that the innkeeper had a right to expel said agent from the hotel without using unnecessary force, if he entered it after such notice, and engaged in drumming for custom, although at the time the hotel-keeper had made an arrangement with another keeper of a livery stable, by which the former should receive 10 per centum of the proceeds of the business derived from the guests of the hotel, and notwithstanding the further fact that a third livery-man representing his own stable, and who had received a similar notice, was actually in the hotel at the time of the expulsion, and had been soliciting patronage for his business among the guests, but was not shown to have had actual license from the innkeeper to approach the guests.

2. Guests of an hotel, and travelers or other persons entering it with the bona side intent of becoming guests, cannot be lawfully prevented from going in or put out by force after entrance, provided they are able to pay the charges and tender the money necessary for that purpose, if requested by the landlord, unless they be persons of bad or suspicious character, or of vulgar habits, or so objectionable to the patrons of the house, on account of the race to which they belong, that it would injure the business of the house to admit them, or unless they attempt to take advantage of the freedom of the hotel to injure the landlord's chances of profit, derived either from his inn or any other business incidental to and connected with its management, and constituting a part of the provision for the wants or pleasure of his patrons.

3. When persons, unobjectionable on account of character or race, enter an hotel, not as guests, but intent on pleasure or profit, to be derived from intercourse with its inmates, they are there not of right, but under an implied license that the landlord may revoke at any time.

4. Regulations, such as that made by the Battery Park Hotel, of which the defendant was the manager, are reasonable, and any person violating them may be expelled, after notice to desist from violating them, if it be done without using excessive force.

5. An innkeeper has the right to establish a livery stable in connection with his hotel, as he can a barber shop, a news stand or a laundry, or he may contract with the proprietor of a livery stable in the vicinity to secure for the latter, as far as he legitimately can, the patronage of his guests for a per centum of the proceeds or profits derived by the owner of such vehicles and horses from dealing with the patrons of the public house; and where he enters into such contract he may, after notice, enforce such a regulation as that made by the Battery Park Hotel, by expelling the agents or representatives of livery stables, who enter to solicit the patronage of guests, or, where such agent persists in visiting the hotel for that purpose after notice to desist, the landlord may expel him without excessive force, if he refuses to leave, and may eject him, even though he enter for a lawful purpose, if he does not disclose his true intent when requested to leave, or whatever may have been his purpose, if he has in fact engaged in soliciting the patronage of the guests.

6. The rule is that the proprietor of a public house has the right to request a person, who visits it not as a guest or on business with guests, to depart, and if he refuses the landlord may expel him, and if he do not use excessive force, may justify, on a prosecution for assault and battery, in removing him.

7. If the prosecutor went into the hotel at the request of a guest, and for the purpose of conferring with the latter on business still if, while in the hotel, he engaged in "drumming" for his employer, after notice to desist from it, the defendant might expel him in the same way; and if the prosecutor, having entered to see a guest, did not then solicit business from the patrons of the hotel, but had done so previously, the defendant, seeing him there, had the right to use sufficient force to eject him, unless he explained, when requested to leave, what his real intent was. The guest, by sending for a hackman or carriage driver, could not delegate to him the right to do an act for which even the guest himself might be lawfully put out of the hotel.

8. If it be admitted that the rule laid down in Markham v. Brown, 6 N. H. 221, is correct, our case comes under the exception in that case; because it appears that the conduct of the prosecutor was calculated to injure the business of the hotel by diminishing its profits derived from the contract made with the keeper of the other livery stable.

9. The defendant as manager of the hotel could make a valid contract, for a valuable consideration, with Bevier to give him the exclusive privilege of remaining in the house and soliciting patronage from the guests in any business that grew out of providing for the comfort or pleasure of the patrons of the house. The proprietor might contract for a per centum of the amount realized from doing a livery business with the guests, and expel without excessive force the agents of rival establishments, who, after notice to desist, persisted in soliciting business from the guests, on the ground that they were entering his inn to injure him in his business connected with the hotel.

10. The proprietor could permit B., who contracted to pay the hotel 10 per centum of the proceeds of his business with the guests, to remain, or omit to order C. the livery-man who had received a notice similar to that sent to the prosecutor, or to put C. out and expel the prosecutor without violating the constitutional inhibition against monopolies.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Buncombe County adjudging him guilty of an assault and battery, and overruling his motion for a new trial. Reversed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a criminal action for an assault and battery tried before Charles A. Moore, Judge, and a jury, at the October Term of the Criminal Court of Buncombe County, on an appeal from a court of a justice of the peace of said county. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

Joseph Weaver, the prosecutor, swore that a Mr. Dawson, who was a guest at the Battery Park Hotel, in the City of Asheville, Buncombe County, called to him, the witness, to supply him some horses from a livery stable, in the City of Asheville, with which stable the witness was connected as the agent of the manager and owners thereof. That because of this he went up on the porch of the hotel, when the defendant, who was the manager of the hotel, came up to him, and asked him to get off the porch. The witness said he replied, "All right, sir," and then started off, but before he could get off the defendant pushed him, and he would have fallen and been hurt had he not caught on the railing of the porch. Witness stated, on his cross-examination, that he did not know whether the defendant knew he was drumming for a livery stable or not. That the defendant had notified him in writing previous to that time not to go on the grounds of the hotel (see "Exhibit C," infra). That the defendant had told him before that day to go on the back side of the hotel, when he had livery business to transact with the guests of the hotel, to a place designated for livery-men to conduct such business. That he had been notified by the defendant to keep off the porch before that day. That on that day he was standing on the steps of the hotel porch. That the defendant did not give him time to get off. That the defendant was within two feet of him, when he said, "Get off of here," and that before he could get off the defendant pushed him off, as he above described. That the defendant pushed him after he was down off the steps, where he was permitted to stay. The defendant introduced in evidence the rules and regulations of the hotel, which were printed on a heavy piece of card-board. See "Exhibit A," infra.

The defendant, being introduced to testify in his own behalf, said he was the manager of the Battery Park Hotel and its business. That the prosecutor, on the day of the alleged assault, was on the porch of the hotel, interfering with parties working on the hotel. That he told the prosecutor to go away, and to go off the porch, and that he might stay at the place designated for livery men. The prosecutor was a livery-man. That he kept two persons to receive orders for all livery-men from said place so designated from guests at the hotel, and that it was the duty of these two persons to transact all business between the guests of the hotel and the livery men, and that he made no charge against livery-men or anyone else on account of the services of such persons. That the prosecutor knew of this rule and regulation of the hotel, and was on the porch in violation of the rule. That he told him to go away, and he did not go. That he then put his hands gently on the prosecutor, and pushed him gently down the steps off the porch. That he only used such force as was necessary to put the prosecutor off the porch. That he used no violence whatever.

Witness further testified that the prosecutor constantly came into the hotel, and would "hang around." That he would go on the porch and "hang around" there, spitting tobacco juice around on the floor and on the railing of the porch. That on the morning of the difficulty the prosecutor had a stick under his arm. That it was the duty of the witness, under the rules of the hotel, to keep all livery-men out of the hotel. On cross examination, the witness testified that the prosecutor was interfering with the men at work on the hotel by talking to them and taking up their time. That the prosecutor told him that the painters had asked him for a chew of tobacco. That he thinks the painters were working by the day. That they were working for a Mr. Lee, but that he paid the hands on that job by the day. That his impression is that the prosecutor was in the office of the hotel that day also. That the prosecutor told him that he had come there to see his customers, and that he told the prosecutor, "You must get off of here;" and that the prosecutor said that he would not, and resisted him. That he had told Weaver and other livery-men not to come there. That he saw the prosecutor spitting on the floor. That he had some time before that made a contract with one Sevier, a livery man, to do the livery business for the hotel, and that Sevier was to pay him 10 per cent of the proceeds of the business. That he had never complained to the prosecutor of his spitting on the floor. That the prosecutor was there on that morning drumming for the livery stable he was connected with. That he had come there to annoy him, and that it did annoy him to see him there. That he had torn up the contract with Sevier by order of Col. Coxe, the owner of the hotel. That he heard the prosecutor drumming that morning. That he was talking about horses and carriages, and talking loud. That Mr. Sevier and all other persons in the livery business could get orders to and from the guests of the hotel. That he had never seen the prosecutor drunk. That he does not know for certain that Sevier is now, and was then, paying 10 per cent of the proceeds of the livery business of the hotel to Col. Coxe.

The defendant then proposed to offer in evidence two ordinances of the City of Asheville, as follows: "Sec. 681. Any porter who shall enter the general passenger depot, or any passenger depot in this city, for any hotel or boarding house, or eating-house, without the consent of the railroad authorities in charge of such depot, shall, upon conviction, be fined five dollars. Sec. 682. If any person or persons shall enter any passenger depot, hotel, boarding house or other place of business, and violate the rules thereof, or hinder or obstruct the business therein, he may be ordered out by the person in charge, and upon refusal to go shall be punished as provided in the preceding section, provided said rules shall be reasonable, and shall have been approved by the mayor and board of aldermen."

The defendant then offered in evidence other ordinances of the City of Asheville ("Exhibit B," infra) for the purpose of showing that the rules of the hotel had, by an ordinance of the said city, been duly approved. The solicitor for the State objected to the introduction of these ordinances. The objection was sustained by the court, and the defendant accepted.

Henry Nettles was then introduced by the defendant, and swore that he was employed at the Battery Park Hotel. That it was his duty to announce carriages when ready, to take orders from guests of the hotel, and to send orders to any livery stable in town desired by the guests, and to take orders to and from livery-men at places designated for them by the hotel authorities. That a Mr. Reynolds was also employed for the same purpose. That he had seen the prosecutor there; had seen him often spitting tobacco juice on the floor, and drumming among the guests. That he had seen him when pretty full of liquor at the hotel, but not down drunk. That he saw the difficulty between the defendant and the prosecutor. Defendant told the prosecutor to get off a half dozen times. The prosecutor said he would not go. The defendant put his hand on the prosecutor's shoulder, and pushed him down the steps. That the way he pushed him would not have pushed a baby down the steps. On cross-examination, he stated that the prosecutor was drinking. That his face was red, and his breath smelled bad. That the prosecutor said that he had a warrant for the defendant. Prosecutor also said that he had not touched a drop of liquor. As the defendant pushed him he caught hold of the "bannisters," but the defendant did not push him violently. He also said that he had collected bills for the prosecutor from guests of the hotel. That when he was asked by a guest to order a carriage, that he would ask what stable he wanted it from, and, if no particular stable was mentioned, he would give it to the one he (the witness) wanted to have it.

In reply, the State introduced one H. B. Loomis, who swore that he was the room and bill clerk at the Battery Park Hotel. That the written contract between Sevier and the defendant as to the livery business of the hotel had been destroyed, but the agreement was still in force, the only difference in the terms being that, under the contract originally, he collected the money, while now Sevier collected it. That he knows the hotel gets 10 per cent of the proceeds of the business done by Sevier, and not of the business done by other livery-men.

The prosecutor was recalled, and testified as follows: That he never spit on the floor at the hotel. That his conduct was gentlemanly in every respect, and that he had not drunk a drop. That Mr. Woodbury, his employer, had at one time before this had the same contract with the hotel that Sevier had. That when Mr. Woodbury had the contract, he complained about other livery-men doing livery business at the hotel.

E. C. Chambers swore that he was a livery-man doing business in the City of Asheville. That he had received the same notice received by the prosecutor. That he drummed at the hotel among the guests for custom since he had received the notice, and that he had not been put out of the hotel, or ordered to leave. That he had also had a man employed to drum for him since the notice had been given him.

Because of a disagreement of counsel, and because requested by them so to do, all the evidance, except as to character, is sent up as part of the case. No special instructions were asked of the court by the defendant.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"It is admitted by the defendant that he did, against the will of the prosecutor, Weaver, put his hands upon him, and push him off the porch of the Battery Park Hotel, and down the steps thereof, to the ground. Nothing else appearing, this, in law, would constitute an assault and battery. But the defendant insists that he was justified in so putting his hands on the prosecutor, and so pushing him off the porch and steps of the hotel: (1) Because he, the defendant, was on his own premises, where he had a right to be; that the prosecutor, Weaver, was a trespasser there; that he ordered him to go away which he refused to do, and that he then gently put his hands upon him, and gently pushed him down off the porch and steps of the hotel, using no unnecessary force whatever. (2) Because he was the manager of the Battery Park Hotel, in the City of Asheville, in Buncombe County, and in control of the same at the time he so put his hands on the prosecutor and pushed him off the porch and steps of the hotel, and that, as such manager, it was his duty to keep all disorderly persons from the hotel, and to keep therefrom all such persons as are, because of their conduct, habits, manners, business, etc., nuisances, and an annoyance and discomfort to the guests of the hotel; that the prosecutor went to the hotel, after having been forbidden to do so, and so conducted himself as to become such nuisance, annoyance and discomfort, by spitting tobacco juice upon the floor, by becoming intoxicated, and other conduct; that the law devolved it upon him, and that it was his duty, as manager of the hotel, to the guests thereof, to make such rules and regulations as were necessary to procure the exclusion therefrom of disorderly persons, and such as, by their conduct, manner, habits and business, are nuisances and an annoyance and a discomfort to the guests of the hotel; and that he had made a rule, which was known to the prosecutor, and which was necessary and proper to procure the comfort of his guests, and to secure quiet and good order; that the prosecutor violated this rule, and when requested to leave the hotel and premises refused to do so, and that then the defendant gently put his hands upon him, and put him off the porch and steps of the hotel, using no excessive or unnecessary force or violence whatever.

"To these positions of defense relied upon by the defendant the State replies that the prosecutor, Weaver, was where he had the right to be; that he was at the Battery Park Hotel, which was a public inn, for a lawful purpose, to wit, to attend and serve the customers of his employer's livery stable; that others engaged in the same business he was in were permitted by the defendant to go and be there for the same purpose, and that therefore the defendant had no right lawfully to remove him from the hotel unless he was so conducting himself as to become a nuisance, an annoyance and discomfort to the guests and officers of the hotel; and that, in fact, he was not so conducting himself, nor was he such nuisance, annoyance or discomfort. The court charges you that, ordinarily, when one is on his own premises, he has the right to order another person who may come upon the same to go away, and upon a refusal to go he may put his hands gently upon him, and gently remove him therefrom, and, in the event of resistance, to use such force as may be necessary to eject him. But this is not always so when the premises are those of a public inn or hotel, such as it is admitted the premises were in this case. It being admitted by both the State and the defendant that the premises from which the defendant put the prosecutor in this case were those of a public inn or hotel, and that the defendant was at the time the manager thereof, and in control of the same, the court charges you that it was the duty of defendant, and the law devolved it upon him, to prescribe such reasonable rules and regulations as were necessary to the comfort of his guests, to secure quiet and good order, and to procure the exclusion from the hotel of disorderly persons, and such as by their conduct, manner and habits or business are nuisances, and an annoyance and discomfort to the guests of the hotel. It was also the duty of the defendant to his guests, and he had the right, to prevent all such persons coming into the hotel, and after they should come into the hotel, or upon the porch thereof, to order them to go away, and upon a refusal to go to put his hands gently upon them, and gently remove them, and, in the event of resistance, to use such force as would be necessary to remove them. It is admitted by the State that the defendant had, prior to the time he pushed the prosecutor off the porch and steps of the hotel, made the rules and regulations which have been read in your hearing, and that the prosecutor, Weaver, knew of them. It is also admitted by the State that the prosecutor had received a written notice from the defendant not to come upon the premises of the hotel prior to such time. This written notice has also been read to you. It is also admitted by the State, as insisted by the defendant, that the prosecutor went to the hotel for the purpose of transacting business connected with his employer's livery stable.

"The questions, then, for consideration and determination, are: (1) Did the prosecutor have the right to go to the Battery Park Hotel to transact the business of his employer, that of a livery-man, with the guests of the hotel? (2) If he did have such right, did he so conduct and demean himself while there as to forfeit his right to be there? (3) If he had no right to go to the hotel to transact his business as a livery-man, or if, while there, having such right to go and to be there, he so conducted himself as to forfeit such right, did the defendant use only such force as the law permitted him to use in removing the prosecutor, or was the force excessive and unlawful? The court charges you that, if you shall find from the evidence that others engaged in the same business as the prosecutor were permitted by the defendant to go to the Battery Park Hotel for the same purpose for which the prosecutor went there,—that is, to secure and transact business for his employer's livery stable,—then the prosecutor had also the right to go there for that purpose at reasonable times, and to remain there a reasonable length of time for the transaction of such business; and it would not matter that the rules of the hotel forbade his entering the premises of the hotel for that purpose, or that he had been previously forbidden, in writing, to come upon the premises of the hotel, nor would it matter that the defendant had designated a place at the back of the hotel where livery men could transact their livery business with the guests of the hotel, through the servants and employes of the hotel, even though the prosecutor knew of such place being so designated. He would not, however, have the right to go there at all times, nor would he have the right to remain there all the time, or an unreasonable length of time, for the transaction of such business, against the will of the owner or manager. Unless you find from the evidence that other persons in the same business as the prosecutor were permitted by the defendant to go to the hotel for the same purpose for which the prosecutor went there, then the prosecutor had no right to go or be there for the purpose of transacting the business of his employer in connection with his livery stable, after notice from defendant to keep off the premises, and after the rule for bidding livery men to come there to transact their business had been made known to him. Whether or not others, engaged in the same business as the prosecutor, were permitted by defendant to go to the Battery Park Hotel for the same purpose for which the prosecutor went there, whether the prosecutor went there at a reasonable time, whether he remained there only a reasonable length of time for the transaction of his business with a guest or guests of the hotel,—are matters for the consideration of the jury alone, and they must find how such facts are from the evidence adduced in the case. If the jury shall find from the evidence, under the charge of the court, that the defendant permitted others engaged in the same business as the prosecutor, to wit, the livery business, to go to the hotel to transact such business, and that other persons did go there, and there transact such business, although the prosecutor would then have the same rights at the hotel as such other person, yet if while at the hotel the prosecutor so demeaned himself, by becoming intoxicated, by spitting tobacco juice on the floor, loud and boisterous talking, cursing, swearing and other conduct, as to become a nuisance, an annoyance and discomfort to the guests and officers of the hotel; or if he went there at an unreasonable time for the transaction of such business, or remained there an unreasonable length of time for the transaction of such business, against the will of the defendant,—he lost all right to be at the hotel for any purpose, and it became the duty and right of the defendant to order him away, and upon his refusal to go to first put his hands gently upon him, and gently put him away, and, in the event of resistance, to use such force as would be necessary to eject him. The defendant would, in no event, have the right to use excessive force in putting the prosecutor off the porch and steps of the hotel. As to whether the prosecutor so conducted and demeaned himself, whether he went to the hotel at an unreasonable time for the transaction of his business, and whether the defendant used excessive force in removing the prosecutor, are matters of fact for the determination of the jury from the evidence."

The defendant excepted in writing to the charge of the court, as follows: "The defendant excepted to the charge of the court, as hereinbefore set forth, for that—(1) The court erred in submitting the question to the jury as to whether or not the rules and regulations adopted by the Battery Park Hotel were reasonable and proper. (2) That the court erred in submitting the question to the jury as to whether or not other persons engaged in the same business as the prosecutor were permitted by the defendant to go to the hotel for the purpose of carrying on this business, for that there was no evidence that the defendant permitted or allowed such to be done. (3) That the court erred in the following instructions given to the jury: 'If you shall find from the evidence that others engaged in the same business as the prosecutor were permitted by the defendant to go to the Battery Park Hotel for the same purpose for which the prosecutor went there,—that is, to secure and transact business for his employer's livery stable,—then the prosecutor had also the right to go there for that purpose at reasonable times, and to remain there a reasonable length of time for the transaction of such business; and it would not matter that the rules of the hotel forbade his entering the premises of the hotel for that purpose, or that he had been previously forbidden in writing to come upon the premises of the hotel.' (4) That the court erred in the following instructions given to the jury: 'Nor would it matter that the defendant had designated a place at the back of the hotel where livery-men could transact their livery business with the guests of the hotel through the servants and employes of the hotel, even though the prosecutor knew of such place being so designated.'"

Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Motion for new trial. Motion overruled. Appeal by the defendant to the supreme court. Case settled on a disagreement of counsel.

Exhibit A: "No livery-man or agent of any transportation or baggage company, no washer-woman or sewing woman not connected with the house, or loafer or lounge or objectionable person, will be allowed in the hotel."

Exhibit B: "At the meeting of the board of aldermen of the City of Asheville, on the 16th day of August, 1880, the following proceedings were heard: 'It was moved and seconded that the following rules for the regulation and government of the Battery Park Hotel be approved by the board. The motion was carried,—aye, 5; nays, 1.' Among these rules is the following: 'No livery-man or agent of any transportation or baggage company, no washer woman or sewing-woman not connected with the house, or loafer or lounge or objectionable person, will be allowed in the hotel.'"

Exhibit C: "Battery Park Hotel, Asheville, N. C. J. B. Steele, Manager. July 14th, 1880. Mr. Joseph B. Weaver. On and after July 18th, 1880, parties engaged in the livery business will be indicted for trespass if found inside the Battery Park Hotel or grounds, unless by permission of J. V. Sevier, lessee of livery privilege of said hotel. [Signed] J. B. Steele, Manager."

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was formerly held by the courts of England that where an innkeeper allured travelers to his tavern by holding himself out to the public as ready to entertain them, and then refused to receive them into his house when he had room to accommodate them, and after they had tendered the money to pay their bills, he was liable to indictment. But this doctrine, says Bishop (vol. 1, § 639, Crim. Law), "has little practical effect at this time, being rather a relic of the past, than a living thing of the present." Rex v. Lullin, 13 Mod. 445.

In a dictum in State v. Mathews, 9 Dev. & B. L. 434, this old principle was stated with some qualification, viz., that "all and every one of the citizens have a right to demand entertainment of a public innkeeper, if they behave themselves, and are willing and able to pay for their fare; and, as all have a right to go there and be entertained, they are not to be annoyed there by disorder, and if the innkeeper permits it he is subject to be indicted as for a nuisance." Romney v. Schombart, 120 Pa. 579, 9 Cent. Rep. 743.

The duty and legal obligation resting upon the landlord are to admit only such guests as demand accommodation, and he has the right to refuse to allow even travelers who are manifestly so filthy, drunken or profane as to prove disagreeable to others who are inmates, and thereby to injure the reputation of his house, to enter his inn for food or shelter, though they may be abundantly able to pay his charges. 3 Whart. Crim. Law, § 1587. Rex v. Rymar, 18 Cox, Cr. Cas. 878.

The right to demand admission to the hotel is confined to persons who sustain the relation of guests, and does not extend to every individual who invades the premises, not in response to the invitation given by the keeper to the public, but in order to gratify his curiosity by seeing, or his cupidity by trading with, patrons who are under the protection of the proprietor. 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 625.

The landlord is not only under no obligation to admit, but he has the power to prohibit the entrance of, any person or class of persons into his house for the purpose of plying his guests with solicitations for patronage in their business; and especially is this true when the very nature of the business is such that human experience would lead us to expect the competing "drummers," in the heat of excitement, not only to trouble the guests by earnest and continued approaches, but by their noise, or even strife. The guest has a positive right to demand of the host such protection as will exempt him from annoyance by such persons as intrude upon him without invitation and without welcome, and subject him to torture by a display of their wares or books, or a recommendation of their nostrums or business.

That learned and accomplished jurist, Chief Justice Shaw, delivering the opinion in Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 600, said: "An owner of a steamboat or railroad, in this respect, is in a condition somewhat similar to that of an innkeeper, whose premises are open to all guests, yet he is not only empowered, but he is bound, so to regulate his house as well with regard to the peace and comfort of his guests, who there seek repose, as to the peace and quiet of the vicinity, and to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct therein; and of course he has a right and is bound to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons, and all persons not conforming to regulations necessary and proper to secure such quiet and good order."

This principle was stated as an established one, and used by the court as an argument to sustain by analogy its ruling announced in a subsequent portion of the opinion, that a railroad company had a right by its regulations to exclude from its depot and cars, at any station, persons who visited them for the purpose of soliciting passengers to stop at particular hotels; and one of the reasons given for holding the regulation reasonable was that, where the agents urged the claims of their respective hotels "with earnestness and importunity, it was an annoyance to passengers." The doctrine is there laid down, too, that persons other than passengers prima facie have the right to enter the depot of a railroad company, as others besides guests may go into hotels, without making themselves trespassers, because in both instances there is an implied license given to the public to enter. But such licenses in their nature are revocable, except in the one case as to passengers, and in the other as to guests, who have the right to enter the train, ticket office or hotel, as the case may be, if they are sober, orderly and able to pay for transportation or fare. The court went further in that case, and held that, in enforcing the reasonable regulation against "drummers" for hotels at the depot, the servants of the railway company were not guilty of an assault for expelling by force, not excessive, a person who had repeatedly violated the regulation by going upon the platform and soliciting for a hotel, though on the particular occasion when he was ejected from it he had a ticket, and intended to take the train destined for another town, but failed to disclose to such servants the fact that he entered for "another purpose, when it was in his power to do so."

Were we to follow the analogy to which the principle laid down in that case would lead, an innkeeper could not only make and enforce a regulation forbidding persons to come on his premises for the purpose of soliciting his guests to patronize the livery stables that they might represent, but he might, in enforcing the rule against one who had previously violated it after notice that he should not do so, put such person off his premises, without excessive force, though at the particular time the person had entered with the bona fide intent to become a guest at the hotel, but failed to announce his purpose, or, under the same principle, he might expel by force one who becomes a guest, and takes advantage of his situation to subject other inmates of the house to the annoyance of "drumming" for such establishments. The same distinction is drawn between guests and others who enter a hotel intent on business or pleasure by the courts of Pennsylvania.

In Com. v. Mitchell, 1 Phila. 68, and Com. v. Mitchell, 3 Para. Eq. Cas. 481, it was held that an innkeeper is bound to receive and furnish food and lodging for all who enter his hotel as guests, and tender him a reasonable price for such accommodation, but "if an individual [other than a guest] has entered a public inn, and his presence is disagreeable to the proprietor or his guests, he has a right to request the person to depart, and, if he refuses, the innkeeper has the right to lay his hands gently upon him, and lead him out, and, if resistance is made, to employ sufficient force to put him out," without incurring liability to indictment "for assault and battery."

Justice Story, in Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Samn. 224, discussed the doctrine to which we have referred, that the right even of one who pays for his passage on a steamboat or railway is subject not only to the limitation that he shall be sober, and shall not be guilty of such nuisance or make such disturbance as shall annoy other passengers, but to the further restriction that he may be refused admittance or expelled, after he enters the boat or car, if it appears that "his object is to interfere with the interest or patronage of the proprietors (or company) so as to make the business less lucrative to them."

In the case last cited the proprietors of the boat Franklin had entered into a contract to run a line of stages between Boston and Providence in connection with the boat, which was running from New York to Providence. The plaintiff, Jencks, had been in the habit of coming on board the boat at Newport to solicit passengers for an opposition line of stages between Providence and Boston, thus interfering with the business of the owners of the boat, and the arrangement made by them for their own profit and advantage with a different line from that represented by said plaintiff, just as in the case at bar the proprietors of the hotel had entered into a contract with one Sevier by which they were to receive 10 per centum of the amount realized by him for the hire of carriages to the guests of the Battery Park Hotel.

Justice Story, too, runs the parallel between the hotel and boat line just as Chief Justice Shaw did between the inn and the railway company, but with the marked difference that the former goes much further in tracing the analogy that makes the public house subject to some of the same liabilities created, and entitled to the full measure of protection afforded by law to companies engaged in transporting passengers. In discussing the principle he says: "A case still more strongly in point, and which, in my judgment, completely meets the present, is that of an innkeeper. Suppose passengers are accustomed to breakfast or dine or sup at his house, and an agent is employed by a rival house, at the distance of a few miles, to decoy the passengers away, the moment they arrive at the inn; is the innkeeper bound to entertain and lodge such agent, and thereby enable him to accomplish the very objects of his mission, to the injury or ruin of his own interests? I think not."

In the case of Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. R. Co., 67 N. Y. 302, the court of appeals held that a company running a line of steamboats for transporting passengers had a right to establish, in connection with their boats, an agency for the delivering of baggage at the terminus, and that one who had had the contract to transfer such baggage upon similar terms, two years before, could be expelled and refused as a passenger, if after notice he would not discontinue his efforts to induce passengers to employ him in the same capacity, rather than an expressman with whom the company had entered into a later agreement for their own pecuniary interest to deliver the baggage of its passengers.

All of the authorities that we have cited above are collated and approved in Angell on Carriers, in sections 530, 530a and 530b.

In the case of Harrie v. Sterna, 81 Vt. 70, it was held that when a railway company erected station houses it impliedly opened the doors of them to every person to enter, but that the license was revocable as to all persons except those who had legitimate business there, growing out of the operation of the road, and with the officers or employes of the company, and that the corporation had the right to direct all other persons to leave the depot or ticket office, and, on their refusal to depart, to remove them. It was further held in the same case that it was a reasonable regulation to require everyone who expected to take the train, and desired to remain in the station house for that purpose, to purchase a ticket, and that the servants of the company would be justified in expelling, without excessive force, one who did not declare his purpose to buy a ticket, and actually buy it within a reasonable time, or one who had bought a ticket even, if he failed to disclose that fact when requested to leave.

In the recent case of Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, 147 Mass. 83, 6 New Eng. Rep. 806, the court laid down the rule in reference to the rights of persons at depots as follows: "Passengers taking and leaving the cars at the station, and persons setting down passengers or delivering merchandise or baggage for transportation from stations or taking up passengers or receiving merchandise that had been transported to the station, had a right to use the station building and grounds superior to the right of the plaintiff (corporation) to exclusive occupancy." And it is further held to be the correct construction to be placed on a statute passed by the Legislature, giving to all persons equal terms, facilities and accommodations for the use of its depot and other buildings and grounds, that it was intended only to govern the relation between the common carrier and its patrons, and hence that a railroad company, even in the face of such a statute, had a right to contract with an individual to furnish the means to carry incoming passengers or their baggage and merchandise from its stations, and may grant to him the exclusive right to solicit the patronage of such passengers.

Upon a review of all the authorities accessible to us, and upon the application of well-established principles of law to the admitted facts of this particular case, we are constrained to conclude that there was error in the charge given by the court to the jury, because:

1. Guests of a hotel, and travelers or other persons entering it with the bona fide intent of becoming guests, cannot be lawfully prevented from going in or put out by force, after entrance, provided they are able to pay the charges and tender the money necessary for that purpose, if requested by the landlord, unless they be persons of bad or suspicious character, or of vulgar habits, or so objectionable to the patrons of the house, on account of the race to which they belong, that it would injure the business to admit them to all portions of the house, or unless they attempt to take advantage of the freedom of the hotel to injure the landlord's chances of profit derived either from his inn or any other business incidental to or connected with its management, and constituting a part of the provision for the wants or pleasure of his patrons. Jencks v. Coleman, Com. v. Mitchell and Com. v. Power, supra; Pinkerton v. Woodward, 38 Cal. 557, 91 Am. Dec. 660, Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co. supra; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 631; Ang. Carr. § 525, 539, 580, Britten v. Atlanta & C. A. L. R. Co. 98 N. C. 586.

When persons unobjectionable on account of character or race enter an hotel, not as guests, but intent on pleasure or profit, to be derived from intercourse with its inmates, they are there, not of right, but under an implied license that the landlord may revoke at any time; because, barring the limitation imposed by holding out inducements to the public to seek accommodation at his inn, the proprietor occupies it as his dwelling-house, from which he may expel all who have not acquired rights, growing out of the relation of guests, and must drive out all who, by their bad conduct, create a nuisance and prove an annoyance to his patrons. Harris v. Stevens, 31 Vt. 79; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 625.

3. The regulation, if made by any innkeeper, that the proprietors of livery stables, and their agents or servants, shall not be allowed to enter his hotel for the purpose of soliciting patronage for their business from his guests, is a reasonable one, and, after notice to desist, a person violating it may be lawfully expelled from his house, if excessive force be not used in ejecting him. Com. v. Power and Harris v. Stevens, supra. See also Griswold v. Webb, 18 R. I.—, 7 L. R. A. 308, Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, supra.

4. An innkeeper has unquestionably the right to establish a news stand or a barber shop in his hotel, and to exclude persons who come for the purpose of vending newspapers or books, or of soliciting employment as barbers; and, in order to render his business more lucrative, he may establish a laundry or a livery stable in connection with his hotel, or contract with the proprietor of a livery stable in the vicinity to secure for the latter, as far as he legitimately can, the patronage of his guests in that line for a per centum of the proceeds or profits derived by such owner of vehicles and horses from dealing with the patrons of the public house. After concluding such a contract, the innkeeper may make, and, after personal notice to violators, enforce, a rule excluding from his hotel the agents and representatives of other livery stables who enter to solicit the patronage of his guests; and where one has persisted in visiting the hotel for that purpose, after notice to desist, the proprietor may use sufficient force to expel him if he refuse to leave when requested, and may eject him, even though on a particular occasion he may have entered for a lawful purpose, if he does not disclose his true intent when requested to leave, or whatever may have been his purpose in entering, if he in fact has engaged in soliciting the patronage of the guests. Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co., Jencks v. Coleman and Harris v. Stevens, supra; Ang. & A. Corp. § 530.

5. The broad rule laid down by Wharton (1 Cr. Law, § 625) is that "the proprietor of a public inn has a right to request a person who visits it, not as a guest or on business with a guest, to depart, and if he refuse the innkeeper has a right to lay his hands gently upon him, and lead him out, and, if resistance be made, to employ sufficient force to put him out; and for so doing he can justify his conduct on a prosecution for assault and battery." It will be observed that the author adopts in part the language already quoted from the courts of Pennsylvania.

6. If it be conceded that the prosecutor went into the hotel at the request of a guest, and for the purpose of conferring with the latter on business, still, in any view of the case, if, after entering, he engaged in "drumming" for his employer when he had been previously notified to desist in obedience to a regulation of the house, the defendant had a right to expel him if he did not use more force than was necessary; and if the prosecutor, having entered to see a guest, did not then solicit business from the patrons of the hotel, but had done so previously, the defendant, seeing him there, had a right to use sufficient force to eject him, unless he explained, when requested to leave, what his real intent was. Harris v. Stevens and Com. v. Power, supra.

The guest, by sending for a hackman, could not delegate to him the right to do an act for which even the guest himself might lawfully be put out of the hotel.

7. If we go further, and admit, for the sake of argument, that the principle declared in Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 530, and relied on to sustain the view of the court below, is not inconsistent with the law on the same subject, as we find it laid down by Wharton and other recognized authorities, still our case will be found to fall under the exception to the general rule stated in express terms in that case. The court said: "If one comes to injure his [the innkeeper's] house, or if his business operates directly as an injury, that may alter the case; but that has not been alleged here; and perhaps there may be cases in which he may have a right to exclude all but travelers and those who have been sent for by them. It is not necessary to settle that at this time." There was no evidence in Markham v. Brown that the proprietor of the hotel had any contract with another stage line, or would suffer pecuniary loss or injury, if the agent who was expelled was successful in his solicitations, and it seems that Angell and others, who cite as authority that case, as well as Jencks v. Coleman and Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co., reconcile them by drawing the distinction that in the latter cases, and in the hypothetical case of an innkeeper, put by Justice Story, the person whose expulsion was justified was doing an injury to the proprietor, who had him removed, by diminishing his profits derived legitimately from a business used as an adjunct to that of a common carrier or innkeeper. In using the language quoted above, Justice Parker seems to have had in his mind, without referring to it, the opinion of Justice Story, delivered in the circuit court but two years before (Jencks v. Coleman, supra).

6. The defendant, as manager of the hotel, could make a valid contract, for a valuable consideration, with Sevier, to give him the exclusive privilege of remaining in the house and soliciting patronage from the guests in any business that grew out of providing for the comfort or pleasure of the patrons of the house. The proprietors of the public house might legitimately share in the profits of any such incidental business as furnishing carriages, buggies or horses to the patrons, and for that purpose had as full right to close their house against one who attempted to injure the business in which they had such interest as the owner of a private house would have had; and this view of the case is consistent with the doctrine enunciated in Markham v. Brown.

There was no evidence tending to show that Chambers had actual permission from the proprietors to approach the inmates of the hotel on the subject of patronizing him, nor that they had actual knowledge of the fact that he had continued his solicitations after receiving a similar notice to that sent to the prosecutor. The fact that he was overlooked or passively allowed to remain in the hotel (it may be under the impression on the part of the defendant that he had desisted from his objectionable practices) cannot, in any view of the law, work a forfeiture of the right to enforce a reasonable regulation, made to protect their legitimate business from injury. If, therefore, a permit on the part of the defendant to Chambers to "drum" gratuitously in the house would at once have opened his doors to all of the competitors of the latter (a proposition that we are not prepared to admit), the defendant did not, so far as the testimony discloses the facts, speak to him on the subject; and the soundness of the doctrine that, without interfering with the legal rights of the guests, the proprietor of a hotel is prohibited by the Organic Law from granting such exclusive privileges to any individual, as to the use or occupancy of his premises, as any other owner of land may extend, is not drawn in question. We therefore sustain the second and third assignments of error. His honor erred, for the reasons given, in instructing the jury that the guilt of the defendant depended upon the question whether he permitted Chambers or Sevier to solicit custom in the house. He had a lawful right to discriminate, for a consideration, in favor of Sevier, while it does not appear from the evidence that he granted any exclusive privileges to Chambers. We hold that the regulation was such a one as an innkeeper had the power to make, and must not be understood as approving the idea that the sanction of the municipal authorities could impart validity to it, if it were not reasonable in itself, and within the powers which the law gives to proprietors of public houses in order that they may guard their own rights and protect their patrons from annoyance. For the reasons given the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Louis O. MORASSE

v.

G. Elz BROCHU.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A declaration in a suit for slander, which claims special damages because of loss of trade, will not be held insufficient for failing to set out the names of persons who ceased or refused to employ plaintiff, after defendant has proceeded to trial without noticing such failure. An objection raised for the first time by a request for instructions comes too late.
2. An action will lie to recover damages for the utterance of a false imputation, although not actually defamatory, if it was made with the express purpose of injuring plaintiff in his profession, and such injury actually follows as the probable and natural result of the speaking of the words, just as was intended by defendant.
3. A statement by a clergyman to his congregation in effect that a certain physician was excommunicated by reason of his marriage, that he should be debarred from being employed as a physician in the parish and the patients who employed him could not in their sickness have the ministrations of the clergyman, may properly be given to the jury to determine whether or not it was made of the physician in respect to his profession so as to render them actionable per se.

4. Evidence of special damage may be given in an action for slander although the words spoken were actionable per se; it is also admissible although a necessary allegation of special damage has been insufficiently made if defendant has waived the defect.
5. Defendant's declarations made after the commencement of a suit against him for slander may be admitted in evidence upon the question of malice.
6. Where the evidence substantially supports the declaration an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover by reason of a variance is properly refused.
7. It is competent for a jury to find that words spoken by a clergyman to his congregation, to the effect that a certain physician had been excommunicated and should be no longer employed by them, were spoken maliciously and for the purpose of injuring the physician in his business.

(June 20, 1890.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a judgment of the Superior Court for Worcester County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the alleged publication of a slander. Overruled.

NOTE.—Slander. See Nixon v. Cramer (N. C.) 6 L. R. A. 780, and cases referred to in note.

Plaintiff was a practicing physician in South-bridge. His wife left him, went to Michigan and procured a divorce, to which plaintiff consented for the purpose of saving her honor. He was afterwards married to another woman by a justice of the peace.

Defendant was pastor of the Roman Catholic Church to which plaintiff belonged. At the time of the marriage he was absent in Europe. After his return he was invited to attend a dinner party at which plaintiff was to be present, but refused to do so. On Sunday, February 27, 1887, in the course of his sermon he said, according to his own testimony:

"Upon my return from the Holy Land, I learned with sorrow that a scandal had taken place among my congregation. I have kept silent until this day, but I see with sorrow that certain members of my congregation strive to have me publicly approve the object of the scandal. I was invited, recently, to seat myself at a table of friends, at which were the authors of the scandal. I blame those members of the congregation who endeavor to have me approve of that which the Church condemns, and punishes by excommunication. I should state to you, upon the subject of excommunication, that if you have need of the priest for your sick, and if you should have in your service an excommunicant, please call the priest before or after, seeing that the priest, in his sacred function, cannot remain at the same time as an excommunicant beneath the same roof."

Evidence was admitted against defendant's objection that after the commencement of the suit he stated to the congregation as follows:

"An action has been brought against me. I am not the party sued; everything falls upon the congregation. Be not disturbed—the congregation is worth $20,000. We will see if the church shall destroy the vermin, or if the vermin destroy the church."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and defendant alleged exceptions.

The points of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. John Hopkins and Charles Haggarty, for defendant:

The language relied upon, read and interpreted as it would ordinarily be understood by mankind, does not mean what the plaintiff says it means in his innuendo. An innuendo cannot add to, enlarge or change the sense of the previous words, and the matter to which it alludes must always appear from the antecedent parts of the declaration.

Goodrich v. Hooper, 97 Mass. 1; York v. Johnson, 116 Mass. 432; Adams v. Stone, 131 Mass. 123; Thomas v. Crowell, 7 Johns. 204; Sunderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 208.

Words not actionable in themselves do not become so when spoken of one in his profession unless they touch him in his profession.

Van Tassel v. Capron, 1 Denio, 230.

In case of a physician they do not touch him professionally, unless they impute misconduct or incapacity in the discharge of his professional duties.

Appe v. Crown, 3 Ad. & El. 2.

Where the words can bear but one meaning, and that is obviously not defamatory, no innuendo or other allegation in the pleadings can make the words defamatory.

Hunt v. Goodlake, 30 L. T. N. S. 472; Mulligan v. Cole, 33 L. T. N. S. 12.

The fact that special damage is alleged and that actual damage has in fact followed from the publication is immaterial in considering what is the true construction of the language.

Hart v. Wall, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 150.

Where special damage is the foundation of the cause of action it is a material allegation and must be fully and accurately stated.

Hassmeyer v. Fuller, 60 How. Pr. 216; Hatlock v. Miller, 2 Barb. 530.

Loss of the society of friends and neighbors, expulsion from religious society or suffering "annoyance, trouble, disgrace, loss of friends, credit and reputation," are not special damage.

Roberts v. Roberts, 10 L. T. N. S. 603; Weldon v. De Bathe, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 339, 53 L. T. N. S. 520; Dwyer v. Mackay, 15 L. R. (Ir.) 133.

Loss of custom is special damage, and must be specifically alleged and the customers' names stated on the record.

Odgers, Libel and Slander, 299; Bran v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Cook v. Cook, 100 Mass. 194; Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 113 Mass. 371; Till v. Parsons, 2 Car. & P. 201.

Where words imputing misconduct to another are spoken by one having a duty to perform, and the words are spoken in good faith in the belief that it comes within the discharge of that duty, or when they are spoken in good faith to them who have an interest in the communication, no presumption of malice arises and no action can be maintained without proof of express malice.

Bradley v. Heath, 12 Pick. 164.

No inference of malice is to be drawn from the fact that the words used were intemperate or excessive from over-excitement.

Brow v. Hathaway, 18 Allen, 239.

In actions of slander evidence cannot be given of words spoken on another occasion, and of a different import from those charged in the declaration, although offered only for the purpose of showing malice.

Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 370; Taylor v. Kneeland, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 67; Howard v. Sutton, 4 N. Y. 157; Howell v. Cheatham, Cooke (Tenn.) 111.

Messrs. W. S. E. Hopkins and A. J. Bartholomew, for plaintiff:

Such words as must injure the plaintiff's reputation to disparage him in his means of living—such as reflect upon the moral character or conduct of the plaintiff—always fall within the range of defamatory and actionable words, if false or maliciously uttered (Odgers, Libel and Slander, 1st Am. ed. pp. 64-65, 302-312; Burtch v. Nickerson, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 5th ed. 103, and cases cited), and need not impute crime.

Goss v. Blaken, 31 Minn. 60; Bran v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 113 Mass. 371.

It is a fact for the jury to determine whether the words were spoken of the plaintiff in the way of his business.

Odgers, Libel and Slander, p. 69; Ramadales v. Greenacre, 1 Post. & P. 61; Bloss v. Tobey, 3 Pick. 328; Van Tassel v. Capron, 1 Denio, 250; Terry v. Hooper, 1 Lev. 115; Starkie, Slander and Libel, 3d Eng. ed.; Bigelow, Tort, p. 104.

A general averment of damage by loss of clients is sufficient.

Odgers, Libel and Slander, pp. 818, 819, and cases cited, Chaddock v. Briggs, 18 Mass. 251; Phillips v. Hoyle, 4 Gray, 571; Burt v. McBain, 20 Mich. 280; Ashley v. Harrison, 1 Esp. 48; Cook v. Field, 3 Esp. 188.

Here there was a count alleging special damage, and at the trial the defendant asked for no specifications of names which perhaps might have been ordered, nor was that objection taken on demurrer.

(Tark v. Munsell, 6 Met. 262, 287; Olney v. Brigham, 8 Gray, 162; Olney v. Sherman, 119 Mass. 291.

The jury alone could decide the following questions:

Did he speak them concerning the plaintiff in the way of his profession?

Allen v. Hillman, 12 Pick. 104.

Were the words spoken false, and did the defendant utter them with a deliberate intent to injure the plaintiff's business?

Gassett v. Gilbert, 6 Gray, 98; Brown v. Hathaway, 18 Allen, 239; Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. 810; Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 26.

Were the words, taking them in the connection in which they were used and the circumstances under which they were used, defamatory words?

Odiorne v. Bacon, 6 Cush. 166.

The words spoken after suit were competent to prove malice, or the intent with which the words were uttered.

Baldwin v. Soule, 6 Gray, 226; Markham v. Russell, 19 Allen, 578.

O. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The defendant contends that there is no sufficient averment of special damages. The averment in respect to the plaintiff's loss of practice as a physician is, that members of the church and other persons have refused to have transactions with him or to employ him in his profession, whereby he has been deprived of the profits, income and emoluments thereof. The only omission of any needful averment which is suggested is, that the names of the persons who have ceased or refused to employ the plaintiff should have been set out.

Where there is merely an accusation of immorality, in words which might be spoken of anyone, whether having any particular occupation or not, it has often been held that a charge of special damages from loss of custom or society must include the names of those who have cut off from the plaintiff in consequence of the imputation. This rule has not been so strictly held in cases where the accusation has been made for the express purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his trade or profession, and has had that effect; and in various cases, and for differing reasons, the rule in such cases has been relaxed, and a general averment of loss of customers has been held sufficient. Beane v. Harries, 1 Hurlst. & N. 231; Riding v. Smith, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 91; Clarke v. Morgan, 35 L. T. N. S. 854; Hopwood v. Thorn, 8 C. B. 803, 809, per V. Williams, J., interloc.; Weiss v. Whittemore, 28 Mich. 306; Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Parrina, 24 N. J. L. 403, 415. 6 L. R. A.

See also Hargrave v. LeBreton, 4 Burr. 2422; Hartley v. Herring, 8 T. R. 120.

In this Commonwealth, this question has not been decided.

In Cook v. Cook, 100 Mass. 194, the charge was general, and had no relation to any particular occupation of the plaintiff, and there was no question of loss of custom or of society.

In Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 871, the averments were full, and no question arose.

In the present case there was a demurrer to the declaration. The Practice Act requires that in case of a demurrer the particulars in which the alleged defect consists shall be specially pointed out. Pub. Stat. chap. 167. In view of this requirement, the defendant specially and at length assigned five different grounds of demurrer, but there was no intimation of an objection on the ground that the names of the persons who would not employ the plaintiff were omitted. If the demurrer had contained this ground of objection, the plaintiff might have applied for leave to amend. Moreover, the Practice Act provides that no averment need be made which the law does not require to be proved, and that the substantial facts may be stated without unnecessary verbiage (Pub. Stat. chap. 167, § 2); and the court may in all cases order either party to file a statement of such particulars as may be necessary to give the other party and the court reasonable knowledge of the nature and grounds of the action or defense. § 61.

The demurrer having been overruled, no motion was made by the defendant for an order that the plaintiff be required to specify the names of persons referred to in the declaration. So far as the matter of pleading, therefore, is concerned, it must be considered that the defendant was content to go on trial without an averment of the names of these persons, and his request, at the close of the evidence, for an instruction to the jury that there was no sufficient allegation of special damage to make the words actionable, came too late, even if otherwise it could be considered as the proper way to raise the objection.

It must now be taken, therefore, that there was a sufficient averment of special damages.

2. If there was a sufficient averment of special damages, then the question is, whether an imputation of the kind made by the defendant upon the plaintiff, when false and when made for the express purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his profession, and when such injury is the probable and natural result of the speaking of the words, and when such injury actually follows, just as was intended by the defendant, will support an action by the plaintiff against the defendant.

It is sometimes said that it will not, unless the words are defamatory. But the better rule is, that such an imputation, whether defamatory of the plaintiff or not, will support an action under the circumstances above mentioned. There were all the elements of a wrongful act deliberately done for the purpose of working an injury and actually working one, even though the words have no meaning which, strictly speaking, could be called defamatory. Riding v. Smith, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 91; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 600, per Lord Wensleydale; Dorley v. Walford, 9 Q. B. 197; Green v. Dutton, 2 Cramp. M. & R. 707; Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Ferriss, 28 N. J. L. 403. See also Odgers, Libel and Slander, 89, 93 (at bottom), where the question is fully discussed.

It may not be technically an action for slander, if the words are not defamatory, but the name of the action is of no consequence.

In Kelly v. Partington, 5 Barn. & Ad. 643, Littledale, J., suggested the following illustration: "Suppose a man had a relation of a peevish disposition, and a third person, knowing that it would injure him in the opinion of that relation, tells the latter a generous act which the first had done, by which he induces the relation not to leave him money, would that be actionable?" And Sir John Campbell answers: "If the words were spoken falsely, with intent to injure, they would be actionable."

In Odgers on Libel and Slander, the following illustration is given: "If in a small country town where political or religious feeling runs very high, I maliciously disseminate a report, false to my knowledge, that a certain tradesman is a radical or a disenter, knowing that the result will be to drive away his customers, and intending and desiring that result, then if such result follows, surely I am liable for damages in an action on the case, if not in an action of slander." P. 91.

In such a case there is an intentional causing of temporal loss or damage to another without justifiable cause and with the malicious purpose to inflict it, which will sustain an action of tort. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 585.

And under this doctrine, in the opinion of a majority of the court, the present action may well stand.

2. But even if the averment of special damages is to be regarded as insufficient, for want of naming the persons who would not employ the plaintiff as a physician, the question remains, whether the words are actionable per se, as containing a defamatory imputation upon the plaintiff, or rather, whether there was enough in them to warrant the judge in submitting them to the jury.

Words are held to be actionable per se which convey an imputation upon one in the way of his profession or occupation, and in such case there need be no averment of special damages. The old phraseology of Comyn's Digest, which has often been followed or repeated, is that "words not actionable in themselves are not actionable when spoken of one in an office, profession or trade, unless they touch him in his office;" and many cases turn upon the question whether words spoken of one who has a particular profession or trade touch him in it—that is, whether they have such a close reference to such profession or trade that it can be said they are defamatory by means of an imputation upon him in that character, as, e. g., an imputation upon him as a clergyman, a physician or a tradesman, distinctly and independently of being an imputation upon him as an individual. Some of the cases have gone very far to negative such a construction. Thus, for example, it was said by Bayley, B., in Lundy v. Atlday, 1 Cramp. & J. 201 (1831), that it was his opinion (for the time being) that the words must go to the length "of showing the want of some necessary qualification, or some misconduct, in the office." And in Ayre v. Green, 2 Ad. & El. 2, words imputing adultery to a physician were held not actionable per se, and without special damage, there being nothing to show that the adultery was committed by him while acting as a physician, or in connection with his medical practice. These two cases are perhaps the most striking of any in that direction. But see also Hemmerlen v. Colls, 10 Q. B. 461, and Gallwey v. Marshall, 9 Exch. 294, for instances where imputations upon clergymen were held not to reflect upon him in his profession.

The case of Ayre v. Green has not escaped criticism and comment, both from the bar and bench, though perhaps it has never been overruled.

In Hepwood v. Thora, 8 Q. B. 293, Cockburn and E. James said in argument: "Ayre v. Green has confessedly gone to the very verge of absurdity."

In Gallwey v. Marshall, 9 Exch. 294, Willes said in argument: "The case of Ayre v. Green is an extreme case;" to which Alderson, B., replied from the bench: "There are certain professions, the proper exercise of which depends on morality; and except for the case of Ayre v. Green, I should have thought that that of a physician was one of them." P. 297.

It may well be suggested that the doctrine of that and kindred cases has a distinct tendency to lower the estimation in which clergymen and physicians are naturally and properly held. At any rate, they do not correctly represent the law of Massachusetts.

In Chaddock v. Briggs, 13 Mass. 343, which was decided when drunkenness was not a crime in Massachusetts, and when the habits in respect to drinking intoxicating liquors were freer than at present, it was held that to charge a clergyman with a single act of drunkenness was actionable per se. The decision of course rested on the ground that it injured him in his profession, the court saying, "a pure and even unsuspected moral character being necessary to their usefulness in the community." That case has never since been questioned in this State, and it is inconsistent with the general doctrine that the words must impute either ignorance or want of skill, or some misconduct while actually performing the duties or functions of the profession or office.

In the present case it must now be assumed that the jury found, under the instructions which were given to them, that the defendant falsely and with a deliberate purpose and intent of injuring the plaintiff in his profession, and for the purpose of gratifying his ill will towards the plaintiff, spoke the words in question. These words did not merely instruct the congregation that the effect of a second marriage, under the circumstances which existed, was to excommunicate the plaintiff from the Catholic Church, but they proceeded to impute against the plaintiff that such marriage or such excommunication should debar him from being employed as a physician in the parish, and that patients who employed the plaintiff as a physician could not in their sickness have the ministrations of the defendant as their priest. The question is, Does this imputation affect him or, in the words of Comyn, touch him, in his capacity as a physician? It seems to be a palpable straining of language to say that it does not. It imports not only that the plaintiff was not in himself a suitable person for a Catholic community to employ as a physician, but that if employed the patient must lose the attendance of a priest. But the jury might well find that the plaintiff was a suitable person to be employed there as a physician, notwithstanding his marriage and its ecclesiastical consequence. The defendant assumed to stand in a position of authority. By virtue of this position he was able to exert a special influence upon his people. He assumed to assert and to exercise this influence; and his words amounted, in the opinion of the jury, to a plain departure from the proper exercise of such influence, and virtually to an instruction that the plaintiff was an unsuitable and improper person to be employed as a physician, and a direction not to employ him, on pain of losing caste in the church, and of losing the benefit of his ministrations as priest if they should be sick. The words were also susceptible of the meaning that the plaintiff was an unfit man even to be met socially, and that the defendant would not sit at the same table with him. Under these circumstances the court cannot lay down a rule that the words did not touch the plaintiff in his profession. According to the verdict of the jury, they were designed to touch him, and did touch him, effectually in his profession.

Denny, 1 Exch. 196, 202, 203, support this view.

In the opinion of a majority of the court the words might therefore properly be found by the jury to have been spoken of the plaintiff in respect to his profession as a physician, and they might properly be found to be defamatory and actionable without an averment of special damages. See, as supporting this result, Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 398, 45 where the court formulates a rule which would include this case.

The minor questions in the case may be briefly disposed of.

If an averment of special damages was necessary, or if the words set forth were actionable per se, in either case the evidence of special damage was properly received.

The evidence of what the defendant said after the commencement of the action was competent upon the question of malice. Beale v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 405.

The judge properly refused to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover by reason of a variance. Taking the testimony of the various witnesses, there was from some one or other of them evidence substantially in support of all the words set forth in the declaration.

It was competent for the jury to find that the defendant spoke the words maliciously, for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff as a physician.

Exceptions overruled.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

HUNTER, Appl.

(.....N. C.....)

1. Merely standing still on a sidewalk and refusing to move at the command of a policeman does not make one guilty of a nuisance.
2. If all except one of those who are obstructing a sidewalk disperse upon request of an officer, the one remaining is not subject to arrest for obstructing the free passage of the street "and failing to disperse upon notice."
3. An ordinance providing that a person may be arrested and taken, without warrant or hearing, to the station-house because he refuses to "move on," and, in the opinion of an officer, "unreasonably persists in remaining so as to incommode others passing," violates a constitutional provision that "no person should be taken, imprisoned . . . or in any manner deprived of his life, liberty or property, but by the law of the land."

4. An officer must determine at his peril whether an offense has been committed, before making an arrest without a warrant, where his power to arrest without warrant is expressly confined to cases where he has seen an offense committed, or where he knows it has been committed, and has reasonable ground to apprehend an escape.
5. The mere fact that a person is drunk on the streets will not authorize his arrest, under an ordinance permitting arrest for being "found drunk in the streets, hallooing or making an unusual noise."

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Buncombe County convicting him upon an indictment for false imprisonment. Affirmed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was an indictment for false imprisonment, tried at the January Term, 1890, of the Criminal Court of Buncombe County, before Moore, Judge.

The defendant was a policeman of the City of Asheville, and arrested one Samuel Bennett, without warrant, for alleged violation of city ordinances in the following words: "Any persons assembling and loitering on the streets in sufficient numbers, or in such manner, as to cause an obstruction to free passage of the streets or sidewalks or crossings, and failing to disperse upon notice by any officer or any member of the police, shall, on conviction, be fined $10." "Whenever three or more persons obstruct the sidewalk, it shall be the duty of the officer to courteously request them to move on, and, if such persons unreasonably persist in remaining, so as to incommode others passing, he shall take them to the station-house."

After several witnesses had been examined for the State, the defendant testified in his own behalf as follows: "Four or five months ago Bennett and four or five others were standing on the sidewalk in front of Powell & Snider's store when people were passing, and they had to step out on the curbing to get around them. He asked them politely to get off the sidewalk and not obstruct it; and they all went off except Bennett, who said to him: 'There is room.' He told the prosecutor for the third time to move, and he refused to do it. He had no warrant or other process for the prosecutor at the time, but the next morning he swore out a warrant, which was produced in evidence. He was at that time a policeman. The prosecutor was drunk, and acted like a drunken man. Witness told him that he was drinking. The prosecutor only remained in the calaboose twenty or thirty minutes; and he told him that if he, or any of his friends, would deposit $5 in lieu of bond, he would let him go until next morning, and then appear before the mayor. One Smith deposited with the defendant the $5. The prosecutor did not demand to be permitted to give bond; nor did he offer bond, nor deposit any money in lieu thereof. No one offered to go his bail, and Smith deposited the $5 after the prosecutor was confined in the calaboose. On cross examination the defendant stated that Bennett was standing nearly in front of the store door, and about three and a half feet from the edge of the sidewalk; and when he asked him to move he said: 'There's eight feet,' but there was not so much as eight feet between the place where the prosecutor was standing and the edge of the sidewalk, which is not more than eight feet wide at that place. The arrest was made about sunset for a violation of the city ordinance, for blocking the sidewalk; and people were passing at the time. He did not decline to tell the prosecutor for what he arrested him, but did tell him. Prosecutor said something about going to Thrash's or somewhere else, to get bond. Defendant declined to go with him, but told him he could give bond, but would not take him to hunt it up. Prosecutor did not offer to go to procure bail before he got into the calaboose. Pulliam, one of the aldermen of the city, was at that time mayor pro tem. His place of business is in the Bank of Asheville, two hundred yards away, and it was about the same distance to the calaboose from where the arrest was made. Pulliam was not in the bank at that time, but was at his residence, about a half mile distant. Upon re-direct examination the defendant stated that Thrash's place of business was between said bank and the place of arrest. No surety was present to go on the bond, and prosecutor only suggested that he could give bond."

Mr. George A. Shuford for appellant.

Mr. Theodore F. Davidson, Atty. Gen., for the State.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the case of State v. Freeman, 86 N. C. 698, the court distinctly recognized the right of a police officer to arrest without warrant, not only for felonies, riots and breaches of the peace, but for violation of a city or town by-law prohibiting nuisances, and which the municipality has the power to make, when the offense is committed in his presence. The Code, § 3820, makes it a misdemeanor to violate any valid city or town ordinance. The city law relied upon by the defendant to justify the arrest is not very happily and clearly expressed. The first section offered, numbered 848, makes the gravamen of the offense created by it consist in the failure on the part of the persons who, by assembling in sufficient numbers in the streets, have caused an obstruction, "to disperse upon notice by any officer or any member of the police." According to the defendant's own account of the transaction, the prosecutor, Bennett, and four or five others, were standing in front of Powell & Sailer's store, when they were asked politely not to obstruct the sidewalk; and all of the others immediately went away, leaving Bennett alone. Bennett then said, "There's room," whereupkeeper of a restaurant, to arrest without a warrant one who, taking a meal, fraudulently substitutes for the check given him one of a smaller amount, which he pays. Boyleston v. Kerr, 2 Daly, 331.

Right of private person to arrest.

At common law it is the duty of any person, in whose view a felony is committed, to arrest the offender. Long v. State, 12 Ga. 282; Brockway v. Crawford, 3 Jones, L. 48; Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 212; Keenan v. State, 3 Wm. 122.

So, the owner of property, finding a person in the act of taking it unlawfully, may arrest the taker without a warrant. Smith v. Donnelly, 45 Ill. 465.

A private person may, in a temperate manner, in good faith and without a warrant, arrest one who has just committed a felony. State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 202.

A private person may arrest without a warrant if he is sure that a felony has been or is about to be committed. See Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 462; Hawley v. Butler, 84 Barb. 400; Samuel v. Payne, Doug. (Eng.) 309; Doughty v. State, 39 Tex. 1; Ex parte Krana, 1 Barb. & C. 261; Rex v. Hunt, 1 Moody, Q. C. 60; Hadley v. Parks, L. R. 1 Q. B. 452; Allen v. London & N. W. R. Co., L. R. 5 Q. B. 65; Rex v. Jackson, referred to in 1 East, P. C. 205.

He may arrest another who is guilty of an affray or breach of the peace, without a warrant (Knot v. Gay, 1 Root, 90), but he cannot arrest for a breach of the peace after it is over. Phillips v. Trull, 11 Johns. 408.

Any person may suppress an affray, but he cannot of his own authority arrest either fighter after the affray is over, unless there is reason to apprehend the affray will be renewed. Price v. Seeley, 10 Clark & F. 25, 1 Lead. Cr. Cas. (Bennett & H.) 142; Phillips v. Trull, 11 Johns. 408; 1 Hum. Cr. 9th ed. 408, 411; 1 Hawk. P. C. 68 12, 13, 16.

Distinction between private person and peace officer.

There is a distinction, as to the right to arrest, between a peace officer and a private person: the officer is justified in arresting one whom he has good reason to believe to be guilty of a felony, while a private person is not justified, however reasonable his belief, unless it appears that a felony was actually committed. Wrexford v. Smith, 3 Root, 171; Long v. State, 12 Ga. 282; Holley v. Mix, 3 Wend. 250; Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 462; State v. Bryant, 65 N. C. 227; Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 262.

A private person cannot arrest another on mere suspicion, however strong the suspicious circumstances may be. Long v. State, 12 Ga. 282; Teagar, 3 L. R. A.

Don v. Graham, 31 Ind. 452; Doering v. State, 49 Ind. 26; Somerville v. Richards, 25 Mich. 290; Hewck v. McGregor, 22 N. J. L. 70; Brockway v. Crawford, 3 Jones, L. 48; Hanes v. State, 3 Humph. 23; Ashley v. Doodas, 5 U. C. Q. B. (Q. B.) 754; McKenzie v. Gibson, 5 U. C. Q. B. 100.

When there is only probable cause of suspicion a private person, without a warrant, makes an arrest at his peril, as nothing short of proof of a felony will justify the arrest. Wakely v. Hart, 6 Blinn. 214.

Where a warrant has been issued, a private person has no right to arrest for the crime included in the warrant. Kirbie v. State, 5 Tex. App. 60.

A private person has no right to arrest another without a warrant upon information of the commission of a felony upon which he had reason to rely. Such arrest is illegal and he makes it at his own risk, although an officer would be justified if he had acted upon such information. Cary v. State, 76 Ala. 78; Carr v. State, 43 Ark. 89; Long v. State, 12 Ga. 282; Ryan v. Donnelly, 71 Ill. 100; Allen v. Leonard, 26 Iowa, 289; People v. Burt, 61 Mich. 190; Simmerman v. State, 16 Neb. 612; Reuck v. McGregor, 22 N. J. L. 70; Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 462; Holley v. Mix, 3 Wend. 250; Wakely v. Hart, 6 Blinn. 214; Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 262; Brockway v. Crawford, 3 Jones, L. 48.

Arrest: how made.

Although manual seizure of the person is not always necessary, there must be that or its equivalent; but it is no arrest where there is no personal coercion, or deprivation of liberty. Hill v. Taylor, 50 Mich. 248.

Anything which subjects a person to the actual control and will of another constitutes an arrest and imprisonment, whether a physical control, locking the door of a room where a person is found or a voluntary submission to words of arrest. United States v. Benner, 1 Bald. 240; Field v. Ireland, 21 Ala. 240; Strout v. Gooch, 3 Me. 127; Brushaber v. Stegemann, 22 Mich. 297; Gold v. Russell, 1 Wend. 210.

An arrest is effected by an officer laying his hand on the person whom he has authority to arrest, though he may fail to stop or hold him. Whithead v. Keyes, 3 Allen, 495.

In a case of felony, where a person may lawfully be arrested without a warrant, the officer need not exhibit a warrant, but in cases of misdemeanor, where an arrest cannot lawfully be made without a warrant, the law requires the officer to have the warrant in his possession at the time of the arrest, that the person arrested may know whether the aron the defendant, after the prosecutor had been requested three times "to move," and had not done so, arrested him. A man cannot be guilty of a nuisance by merely standing still on a sidewalk, and refusing to move at the command of a policeman. Even under the phraseology of the ordinance, he was not guilty if the failure to "disperse" which was essential to constitute guilt. An obstruction may be removed, and a crowd dispersed, if all save one go off in different directions and he stands his ground. The act of one person halting on the streets for a reasonable time without misbehaving himself in any way is not such a nuisance as the city had a right to forbid by its laws under the general power delegated to it. *Cooley, Const. Lim. 200.

The section referred to imposes a fine of $10 for a violation; and if its provisions are within the purview of the powers granted to the corporation the violation was also a misdemeanor. The other ordinance, Rule 15, is not materially different as to what it professes to prohibit and prevent; but it is amenable to objection, as legislation ultra vires, in that, instead of a fine, it imposes the punishment of imprisonment in the station-house, to be inflicted at the discretion of an officer, without a previous preliminary examination. Not only is the right of municipalities to make by laws restricted to the express legislative grant of authority given in the charters or contained in the general laws defining the rights, duties and powers of all such corporations, but they are subject to the limitations contained in the Constitution of the United States, and that of the State in which they may be situated. *Cooley, Const. Lim. 198, 199.

The second ordinance relied upon for the protection of the officer, Rule 15, is clearly in violation of the Constitution, art. 1, §§ 12, 13, 17, in providing that a person may be arrested because he refuses to "move on," and, in the opinion of the officer, who is left to judge of rest is legal or not. State v. Phinney, 48 Mo. 384; Com. v. Cooley, 8 Gray, 360; Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 189; State v. Spanking, 34 Minn. 381.

Notice to be imparted to person arrested.

The person arrested should have notice that he is arrested by lawful authority. State v. Phinney, 48 Mo. 384; Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 189.

Any actual notice of arrest by lawful authority is sufficient, and in such cases the officer need not exhibit or read his warrant. State v. Townsend, 8 Harr. (Del.) 487; Com. v. Cooley, 8 Gray, 360; People v. Wilson, 55 Mich. 504; Arnold v. Steeves, 10 Wend. 514; Wolf v. State, 19 Ohio St. 348; Reg. v. Davis, Leigh & C. Cr. Cas. 64; State v. Garrett, 1 Winst. L. 144; 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 12, § 12.

Notice of arrest is imparted where the person making the arrest is a known officer, or by seeing his uniform or badge of office. Yates v. People, 30 N. Y. 808.

Being arrested while in the act of committing a breach of the peace or other offense is notice of arrest. Wolf v. State, 19 Ohio St. 348.

Notice of the purpose to arrest and the reason for it, or immediate pursuit from the scene of the crime, is notice of arrest. People v. Pool, 29 Cal. 572.

Notice, to one who has committed a felony, of the purpose of pursuit, is necessary only to give the pursued an opportunity to desist from flight and unlawful action and to peaceably surrender, and is not necessary if he necessarily knows the purpose of the pursuit and the attempted arrest. State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 388.

Where a party has been apprehended in the commission of a felony or on fresh pursuit, notice is not necessary. Ibid.

A private person who fails to give notice of his purpose to arrest is guilty of a trespass. State v. Bryant, 65 N. C. 287.

Right to use necessary means to effect arrest.

An officer in making a lawful arrest has the right, and it is his duty, to use every necessary means to make the arrest, and if resisted he may use sufficient force to overcome the resistance, and if the person resisting is killed by the officer it is justifiable homicide. United States v. Fayette County Jailor, 2 Abb. U. S. 288; State v. Fuller, 30 Mo. 188.

An officer has the right to use force to overcome resistance or prevent the escape of a fleeing criminal. People v. Carlton, 115 N. Y. 612.

He has no right, however, rudely and with violence to seize and collar his prisoner, unless resistance be offered, or an attempt be made to escape. State v. Mahon, 8 Harr. (Del.) 388; Burns v. State, 60 Ill. 341.

Unnecessary harshness or violence should be avoided. Fulton v. State, 41 N. Y. 486; Skidmore v. State, 3 Tex. App. 22; Beaverts v. State, 4 Tex. App. 172.

An officer has no right to use handcuffs, unless, without them, there is danger of the prisoner's escape. Cochran v. Toher, 14 Minn. 388.

He has a right to use his discretion as to the necessity for using handcuffs, and is liable only in case of a clear abuse of such discretion. Firestone v. Rice, 15 West. Rep. 358, 71 Mich. 377.

After a prisoner has twice escaped, the officer is justified in using handcuffs upon him, and is not indictable for assault on account of having done so. State v. Sigman (N. C.) April 15, 1890.

Authority to break in doors.

The verbal order of a magistrate justifies the officer in breaking doors to make the arrest when the authority to arrest is lawful. Com. v. McGahay, 11 Gray, 184.

The officer has the right to break open the outer and inner doors of a house to effect an arrest under a criminal warrant or on an arrest for felony on reasonable suspicion, or to quell an affray, and will be justified although it should transpire that the person sought is not in the house at the time. Kelsey v. Wright, 1 Root, 88; Hawkins v. Com. 14 B. Mon. 388; State v. Smith, 1 N. H. 346.

Where an officer has reasonable cause to believe that the person named in the warrant, or a person whom he seeks to arrest on a charge of felony, is in the dwelling-house of another, he has a right to search the house, and, after demand for admittance and notice of his purpose, to break open doors if necessary to prosecute the search. Com. v. Reynolds, 120 Mass. 190; Com. v. Irwin, 1 Allen, 887.

The officer should first demand admittance, and explain the purpose of his entry. Barnard v. Dartlett, 10 Cush. 301.

If a person escapes while under arrest the officer may re-arrest him, and, if necessary, may break open the doors of his house to effect the arrest. Cahill v. People, 100 Ill. 681.

An officer may break open doors to prevent an affray, or to follow with fresh pursuit when affrayers flee into a house. 1 Russ. Cr. 8th ed. 415; 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 62, § 12.

Upon fresh pursuit a private person has a right to break open the doors of any house in which the his conduct, "unreasonably persists in remaining, so as to incommode others passing," and can be taken, without warrant or hearing, to the station house. Under this law, he may be deprived of his liberty, and sent to a dungeon, not only without trial, but without even a preliminary examination, or an opportunity to give bail for his appearance at an investigation to be had in future, because, in the opinion of a policeman, he consumes an unreasonable time in exchanging greetings with two friends whom he meets upon the sidewalk of the city.

In the case of Judson v. Reardon, 16 Minn. 481 (Gil. 887), the defendant justified, in an action brought against him to recover damages for arresting the plaintiff, under an ordinance of the City of St. Paul, which provided that anyone who refused, without sufficient excuse, to obey any order or direction given at a fire by a person duly authorized to order or direct, should pay a fine not exceeding $50, and that "any member of the common council or any fire warden may arrest and detain such person, . . . until such fire is extinguished."

The court held that the clause permitting the arrest and detention during the fire was unconstitutional and void, and that, if the plaintiff had violated any valid city ordinance, he might have been arrested without warrant. This case has been cited with approval by both Cooley and Dillon. Cooley, Const. Lim. *201, 245, note 3; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 414, note.

It was held, also, that an ordinance providing for the destruction of property as a nuisance, without a judicial hearing, was void under a section in the Constitution of Illinois substantially the same as that already cited from our own Organic Law. Article 1, § 17; Dorst v. People, 81 Ill. 286.

The by-law distinguished as "Rule 15" is unconstitutional and void. If the other section is sufficiently intelligible to be enforced under a strict construction of its language in in any conceivable case, it is certain that the felon has taken refuge. Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 388; Rawley. Law of Arrest on Criminal Charges.

But upon mere suspicion a private person has no right to break open doors or kill the suspected person to prevent his escape. Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 388; State v. Bryant, 35 N. C. 287.

Right of officers to call on citizens to assist.

An officer has a right to call upon any citizen to assist him in the execution of his warrant, and anyone refusing to assist is subject to prosecution. Coleman v. State, 35 Ala. 93; State v. Denniston, 8 Blackf. 277; Coyle v. Hurin, 10 Johns. 88; State v. Shaw, 3 Ired. L. 20.

A person assisting an officer at his request or command, although the latter be a trespasser, is protected by law against suits for trespass and false imprisonment, if in his acts he confines himself to the order and directions of the officer. Watson v. State, 35 Ala. 62; Firestone v. Rice, 71 Mich. 577; McMahan v. Green, 34 Va. 58. Centre, Mitchell v. State, 12 Ark. 80.

One aiding in making an arrest must himself have reasonable grounds for belief that the accused is guilty of a felony. Salisbury v. Com. 79 Ky. 425.

Persons coming to the aid of officers are entitled to the same protection as the officers themselves. State v. Oliver, 3 Houst. 166; People v. Moore, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 1; Coyle v. Hurin, 10 Johns. 88; State v. Alford, 30 N. C. 446; Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 388; Galvin v. State, 5 Coldw. 288; 1 Hale, P. C. 408; Frost. Cr. L. 309.

A private person coming to the aid of an officer is not justified in killing where no felony has in fact been committed. See East, P. C. 297; Frost. Cr. L. 309.

Killing by officer in making arrest.

In no case must a felon be killed in attempting to effect his arrest if the officer can capture him by obtaining assistance or otherwise. Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 41.

It has been held that so long as the person sought to be arrested on a charge of murder was content peaceably to avoid arrest, the pursuing party had no right to kill him. State v. Anderson, 1 Hill, L. 377.

If an officer acts without a warrant he must be prepared to show the fact of a felony committed in order to justify taking the life of a person whom he is endeavoring to arrest or secure; his own belief of the commission of a felony, on however reasonable a ground, will not justify the killing. Conrady v. People, 6 Park. C. C. 384.

The killing of an actual felon by a private person in his endeavor to arrest may be justified where the felon has notice of the intention to arrest him. State v. Roane, 2 Dev. L. 54.

A peace officer, in overcoming resistance to arrest for a misdemeanor aggravate delicto, is not restricted to the use of force necessary to self-defense, but may resort to the taking of life if necessary. State v. McNally, 2 West. Rep. 481, 87 Mo. 444.

An officer upon a warrant is justified in killing one accused of felony if he resists or flees; and so without warrant on the probable suspicion founded on his own knowledge or the information of others. Compare United States v. Rice, 1 Hughes, 600; Clements v. State, 50 Ala. 117; State v. Garrett, 1 Winst. L. 144; Wolf v. State, 18 Ohio St. 244; State v. Anderson, 1 Hill, L. 377; Reg. v. Dadson, 2 Denham, C. C. 28; 1 East, P. C. 288; 3 Hale, P. C. 45.

An officer seeking to arrest a felon, who refuses to stop when ordered to, may kill him, to prevent his escape, if he cannot otherwise capture him. Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 388.

A well-grounded belief that a felony is about to be committed will exonerate homicide committed in prevention, but not in pursuit, by a volunteer. State v. Rutherford, 1 Hawks, 467; State v. Roane, 2 Dev. L. 54. See Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 212.

Killing by officers in riots, mobs and unlawful assemblies, if necessary in arrest of offenders, is justifiable. Pond v. People, 5 Mich. 169; 4 Ill. Com. 180; 1 Hale, P. C. 468.

Not authorized in case of misdemeanor.

In misdemeanors, the voluntary killing of the accused in the effort to arrest him is murder. Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 41.

In making an arrest for misdemeanor the officer can kill or inflict great bodily harm upon the person only when, by reason of resistance, he is placed in danger of like harm. Diger v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 87.

So an officer has no right to kill a prisoner in custody for a misdemeanor to prevent his escape, and if he does so he is guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to circumstances. Beneau v. State, 3 Lea, 780; Furster's Case, 1 Lewin, Cr. Cas. 187.

In a case in Texas it was held that a penitentiary guard had no right to shoot an escaped convict who continued to flee when called upon to stop. Wright v. State, 44 Tex. 448.

So in making arrests in misdemeanors and in civil actions, life can be taken only where the party sought to be arrested resists by force, not when he merely escapes. A mere attempt to resist, not conduct of the prosecutor in failing "to disperse" after his comrades had deserted him did not, according to defendant's own account of the transaction, subject him to liability either for the penalty prescribed, or to indictment under the general law making it a misdemeanor to violate a town ordinance.

The charter of the city (chap. 111, §§ 25, 27, 29, Priv. Laws 1868) gave the city marshal the powers, as a peace officer, of the sheriff or constables of the County of Buncombe, and to both the marshal and a policeman the authority to make arrests "(1) whenever he shall have in his hands a warrant duly issued by the mayor of the City of Asheville or a justice of the peace of the County of Buncombe; . . . (3) whenever a misdemeanor or violation of any ordinance has been committed, and he has reasonable cause to believe that the suspected party may make his escape before a warrant can be obtained."

The power to arrest without warrant is, in express terms, confined to two classes of cases: where he sees an offense committed; or where he knows it has been committed, and has reasonable ground to apprehend an escape. The latter provision enlarges his authority beyond that of a sheriff or constable, but upon condition that the ordinance has certainly been violated. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (vol. 1, § 211), says: "Charters authorizing municipal officers to make arrests upon view, and without process, are to be viewed in connection with the general statutes of the State, and, being in derogation of liberty, are strictly construed." Peaterfield v. Vickers, 8 Coldw. 205; White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550.

In the exercise of the extraordinary power given him by the charter, it was the duty of the defendant, before he touched the person of the prosecutor and demanded a surrender of his liberty, to know that the misdemeanor had been committed, either from seeing, or from amounting to an assault, will not justify killing. Clements v. State, 50 Ala. 117. See Foot. C. L. 371; 1 Hale, P. C. 421; 1 East, P. C. 308; State v. Bryant, 45 N. C. 357; Tiner v. State, 44 Tex. 128; Hawley, Law of Arrest on Criminal Charges.

But killing to prevent an escape after a felony actually committed is justifiable. State v. Rutherford, 1 Hawks, 459; State v. Boone, 2 Dev. L. 65.

But an officer who, in attempting to recapture a person charged with a misdemeanor after the latter's escape, fires a pistol the ball from which passes near such person, is guilty of an assault, no matter what may have been his intention as to shooting him. State v. Sigman (N. C.) April 15, 1890.

After the escape of a prisoner charged with a misdemeanor, the officer cannot lawfully use any means to recapture him that he would not have been justified in employing in making the first arrest. Ibid.

Right to resist illegal arrest.

Illegal official action may be forcibly resisted. 1 Wharton, Cr. L. 5th ed. 3515.

A person may resist an illegal arrest. People v. Rounsda, 11 West. Rep. 307, 47 Mich. 422; State v. Wimbush, 9 S. C. 508; Alford v. State, 5 Tex. App. 545.

But a person may not lawfully offer forcible resistance to an attempted wrongful arrest, until all other means of peaceably avoiding it have been exhausted. People v. Carlton, 115 N. Y. 618; Rafferty v. People, 73 Ill. 37; State v. Balk, 75 N. C. 10.

An arrest for improper purposes without just cause, or for a just cause without lawful authority, and for unlawful purposes, excuses acts committed under it. Strong v. Grannis, 26 Barb. 125; State v. Leonard, 41 Vt. 585.

Where an officer and a posse attempt to arrest a person for theft without a warrant, he not being caught in the act, he is justified in using his whip to compel them to release his horse, and so avoid arrest. Mamie v. State, 27 Tex. App. 317.

If the person making the arrest is not known to be an officer, resistance is justified, even to the taking of life. Alford v. State, supra.

There is a clear distinction in the right to resist an arrest, between cases where the arrest is made by officers known to be such, and those made by private persons. Yates v. People, 32 N. Y. 509.

Under the Kentucky Criminal Code an officer who does not inform the person of the offense charged against him, or that he is acting under a S. L. R. A.

warrant, may be lawfully resisted. Hamlin v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 345.

And persons assisting in the arrest, who were not duly summoned, may be lawfully resisted. Ibid.

If a person undertakes to resist an officer after he has made known his authority, he does so at his peril. State v. Oliver, 2 Houst. (Del.) 565.

If a party assists in resisting a criminal's arrest for felony, he may become an accessory after the fact, by endeavoring to shelter the accused. United States v. Tinklepaugh, 3 Blatchf. 425; McQuoid v. People, 3 Ill. 78; Slicker v. State, 13 Ark. 397; Reg. v. Maruden, L. R. 1 C. C. 132, 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 90; 4 Bl. Com. 129; 1 Hale, P. C. 412; 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 28, § 28; Dalt. Just. 390.

Even where arrest is lawful, if the officer illegally shoots at the person whom he is seeking to arrest, the latter is justified in shooting in self-defense. State v. Oliver, 2 Houst. (Del.) 565; Tiner v. State, 44 Tex. 128.

So, in case of an illegal arrest a person may resist, and if he kills the officer in so doing, it is only manslaughter. Nolen v. State, 28 Ala. 31; State v. Oliver, supra; Galvin v. State, 5 Coldw. 291; Corn. v. Drew, 4 Mass. 391; Com. v. Carey, 12 Cush. 246; Roberts v. State, 14 Mo. 140; Rafferty v. People, 69 Ill. 111, 73 Ill. 37; State v. Balk, 75 N. C. 10. See Tackett v. State, 3 Yerg. 322.

Killing officer in resisting arrest; when murder.

The law does not sanction the taking of life to repel every threatened trespass or invasion of personal rights. Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 41; Nolen v. State, 24 Ala. 372; Roberts v. State, 14 Mo. 138; Com. v. Drew, 4 Mass. 391; Tackett v. State, 3 Yerg. 322.

When a person in resisting an officer or those engaged in assisting an officer to make a lawful arrest in a lawful way, slays one of the arresting party, it is murder. Dill v. State, 25 Ala. 15; Johnson v. State, 30 Ga. 420; Wilner v. State, 30 Ga. 137; State v. Oliver, 2 Houst. (Del.) 565; Reg. v. Porter, 12 Cox, Cr. Cas. 444; 1 East, P. C. 309; Foot. Cr. L. 270, 305; 1 Wharton, Cr. L. 5th ed. § 413; 1 Hum. Cr. 9th ed. 733.

If the officer had the right to make the arrest the killing would be murder although done in the heat of blood. Galvin v. State, 5 Coldw. 293.

If the party having authority to arrest or imprison, using the proper means, happens to be killed, it will be murder for all who take part in such resistance. State v. McNally, 2 West. Rep. 431, 37 Mo. 644.

The intentional killing of an officer, acting under proper warrant of arrest, is murder in the first degree. State v. Spaulding, 34 Minn. 232; Rafferty v. People, 73 Ill. 37.

such information as made him willing to incur the risk of indictment, or of being mulcted in damages, if no ordinance had been violated. The question of good faith on the part of the policeman comes to his aid when he is resisted in making an arrest that he has an undoubted right to make, if there be resistance, and the question arises whether excessive force was used to overcome it; but policemen of Asheville must determine at their peril, preliminary to proceeding without warrant, whether a valid ordinance has been violated within or out of their view. The principle recognized in the cases of State v. McNinch, 90 N. C. 603, and State v. Pugh, 101 N. C. 787, was never intended to apply in any case except where an officer is making a lawful arrest.

In the case of Judson v. Hardon, supra, another principle was laid down which seems to have met with approval also. It was held that the arrest having been made under a void by-law, and being without authority, the officer making it could not rely upon his good faith as a defense to an action brought by the party imprisoned for malicious prosecution, and that, if the arrest was made upon the first part of the ordinance, which was not unconstitutional, the honest purpose of the defendant would not protect him because the plaintiff had violated that part of the ordinance by crossing the hose. There two distinct provisions, one valid and the other void, were embodied in one paragraph, while in our case they are the subjects of distinct sections. The difference in that respect can give rise to no distinction between that case and the one before us, for a legislative or a municipal law may be valid in part and void in part, and the portion not repugnant to the Organic Law will be enforced just as if it had been a distinct statute.

There was no suggestion in the evidence that the prosecutor was "found drunk in the streets, hallooing or making an unusual noise," so as to bring him within the letter or even the spirit of the only other ordinance offered in evidence, designated as "number 645." The fact that the prosecutor told the defendant that he had been drinking, or acted like a drunken man, or that he even was drunk, without making any noisy demonstration, neither subjected him to liability for the penalty nor to indictment, because, under a strict construction of the law, he must have been both drunk and noisy.

This case may be distinguished from that of State v. McNinch, 87 N. C. 507, in the fact that in the latter the arrest was made under an ordinance declaring "public drunkenness and loud and profane swearing to be a nuisance." The court held that, where one was found drunk and swearing in an open space in rear of a bar room, it was public drunkenness, though in a private place, and that the defendant was therefore liable under the letter of the law. That case went to the extreme limit in sustaining the right to declare any act a nuisance that was not a nuisance at common law, and especially when no specific power to enact the by-law was shown to be in the city charter.

We conclude that according to the defendant's own evidence he was guilty; and therefore, though the judge may have failed to state the law correctly in submitting to the jury the whole case, still the defendant is not entitled to a new trial if he was guilty in the aspect of the testimony most favorable to himself, and founded upon the conception that his own statement was true.

The judgment must be affirmed.

v.

W. I. S. DEEVER et al.

(.....N. C.....)

1. Even the owner of real estate has no right to make a forcible entry upon the actual possession of another who is not a recent trespasser or intruder.
2. In addition to nominal damages for a forcible entry upon the peaceable possession of plaintiff, even by the owner, he can recover for any injury inflicted upon his person or personal property.
3. Exemplary damages for forcible entry may be recovered if the unlawful act is done in a wanton and reckless manner.

(May 12, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged forcible entry and detainer. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. Theodore F. Davidson for appellant.

Mr. M. E. Carter for appellees.

Shepherd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff had been in possession of the strip of land in controversy from 1884 to March, 1888. Whether he entered under the defendant Wilson, the owner, and the terms under which he entered, are disputed questions. It is admitted, however, that in March, 1887, Wilson, after giving the plaintiff notice to quit, agreed that he should remain upon the land until the succeeding October. The plaintiff continued in possession until March, 1888, when, without any further notice, he was forcibly ejected by the defendant Deever and a negro, who were acting under the direction and authority of the said Wilson. The entry was made while the plaintiff was in the actual possession of his house, and in his presence, and was done under such circumstances as to constitute a forcible entry under the Statute, if not, indeed, an indictable forcible trespass. His honor charged the jury that, if the plaintiff was not the tenant of Wilson, the latter, and those acting under him, "had the right to go there and put him out by force, if no more force was used than was necessary for that purpose." Under the circumstances of this case (the plaintiff not being a recent trespasser or intruder), we cannot approve of the instruction given, as it is not only opposed to the public policy which requires the owner to use peaceful means or resort to the courts in order to regain his possession, but is directly contrary to a statute which condemns the violent act as a criminal offense.

In Dustin v. Cowdry, 28 Vt. 681, Redfield, J., said: "We entertain no doubt that such a principle of law . . . did exist in England from the time of the Norman conqueror until the Statute of 5 Richard II., chap. 8, of 'Forci-

NOTE.—Forcible entry and detainer, as a remedy.

The remedy of forcible entry and detainer was designed to protect the actual possession, whether right or wrong; and it is no defense that defendant was entitled to the possession. Logan v. Lee (Ark.) March 29, 1890.

It is a civil action (Taylor v. De Camp, 88 Wis. 192); but it does not lie for a mere trespass on land. Castro v. Townsbury, 89 Cal. 582.

Actual possession is sufficient to sustain the action against a wrong-doer. Mears v. Dexter, 14 Va. L. J. 240.

In order to maintain an action of forcible entry, the plaintiff must show that he was in the actual and peaceable possession of the property entered upon, that the defendant, by some kind of violence or circumstance of terror, entered into or upon the property, and so turned the plaintiff out, and took and held possession of it himself; or that, after making a peaceable entry, the defendant, by force, threats or menacing conduct, turned the plaintiff out and took the possession. Castro v. Townsbury, 89 Cal. 582.

The plaintiff must be, at the time of the alleged entry, in the actual possession of the premises; neither the right of nor constructive possession is sufficient. Dills v. Justice, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 547.

But it is not necessary for plaintiff to prove actual personal presence on the land for five days continuously preceding the unlawful entry. Giddings v. 76 Land & Water Co., 88 Cal. 86.

The action cannot be brought unless the plaintiff has had peaceable possession; and a scrambling possession obtained by tying horses in an unfinished stable which is in the hands of the contractor is not sufficient. Blake v. McCray, 85 Miss. 448.

Possession means that position or relation which gives an occupant the use and control of land, excluding all others from a like use or control. Seisin means possession with intention of asserting a claim. 8 L. R. A.

to a freehold estate. Ft. Dearborn Lodge v. Klein, 2 West. Rep. 38, 115 Ill. 177.

Proceedings under the Forcible Entry and Detainer Act decide the right of possession only; one having a right to enter may do so peaceably. "Force," as used in the statutes, means actual force. Ibid.

Under the Arkansas Statute relating to forcible entry and detainer, a contractor may recover possession of a part of a railroad, where he has been turned out of possession by force and violence after its completion and before payment. Iron Mountain & H. R. Co. v. Johnson, 119 U. S. 608 (80 L. ed. 504).

Title to property not in issue.

The title to the property cannot be inquired into for any purpose. Riverside Co. v. Townshend, 10 West. Rep. 580, 120 Ill. 9; Kepley v. Luke, 108 Ill. 888; McGuirk v. Barry, 88 Ill. 118; Smith v. Hoag, 45 Ill. 233; McCartney v. McMullen, 35 Ill. 237; Shoudy v. School Directors, 83 Ill. 230.

Title cannot be shown in defendant to prevent a restitution of the premises. Republica v. Shryber, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 88 (1 L. ed. 40); Peyton v. Stith, 20 U. S. 5 Pet. 485 (8 L. ed. 200).

The immediate right of possession is all that is involved, and hence a judgment in such action is not a bar to ejectment. Riverside Co. v. Townshend, 10 West. Rep. 580, 120 Ill. 9. See Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351 (34 L. ed. 126).

Neither the title nor the right to possession is at issue, nor can they be put in issue in such action. Sheehy v. Flaherty, 5 Mont. 285.

A forcible entry upon the actual possession of plaintiff in forcible detainer being proved, he will be entitled to restitution though the fee simple and present right of possession are shown to be in defendant. Giddings v. 76 Land & Water Co., 88 Cal. 86.

Evidence of title in action of forcible detainer is ble Entry and Detainer,' a period of nearly three hundred years; . . . and it is certain, we think, that such a mode of reducing rights of action to possession is more suited to the turbulence and violence of those early times, when no man whose head was of much importance to the state felt secure of retaining it upon his shoulders for an hour, than to the quiet and order and general harmony of the nineteenth century. . . . But as men advanced towards equality, and claimed to have their rights respected and guaranteed to them, and more carefully defined, this state of the law became intolerable and was among the first to be abrogated by Parliament." This was done by the Statute of 5 Richard II., which is substantially enacted in North Carolina (see Code, § 1028) and in many other States of this Union.

"A contrary rule," says Lawrence, J., in Reeder v. Purdy, 41 Ill. 279, "befits only that condition of society in which the principle is recognized that—

He may take who has the power,
And he may keep who can.

If the right to use force be once admitted, it must necessarily follow as a logical sequence that so much may be used as shall be necessary to overcome resistance, even to the taking of human life."

Nearly all of the authorities agree that such forcible entries on the part of the owner are unlawful; but there is a great diversity as to whether an action of trespass quare clausum fregit may be maintained, and also whether the defendant can justify under the plea of liberum tenementum.

Erskine, J., in Newton v. Harland, 1 Man. & Gr. 844, said that "it is remarkable that a question so likely to arise should never have been directly brought before any of the courts sitting in banc," until that case, which was tried in 1840; and it is also worthy of remark that Ruffin, C. J., in Stat. v. Whitfield, 8 Ired. L. 817, regarded it as still an open question in North Carolina. In the conflict of authorities we must adopt that rule which in our judgment rests upon the sounder reason. This is so well expressed by the court in Reeder v. Purdy, supra, that we will reproduce the language of the learned justice who delivered the opinion. He says: "The reasoning upon which we rest our conclusion lies in the briefest compass, and is hardly more than a simple syllogism. The Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer, not in terms, but by necessary construction, forbids a forcible entry, even by the owner, upon the actual possession of another. Such entry is therefore unlawful. If unlawful, it is a trespass, and an action for the trespass must necessarily lie. . . . Although the occupant may maintain trespass against the owner for a forcible entry, yet he can only recover such damages as have directly accrued to him from injuries done to his person or property, through the wrongful invasion of his possession, and such exemplary damages as the jury may (under proper instructions) think proper to give. But a person having no title inadmissible, the inquiry being confined to the actual, peaceable possession of plaintiff, and the unlawful or forcible ouster or detention by defendant. Ibid.

Pleadings and proceedings in action.

A return of service of summons in forcible entry and detainer, which fails to show that a copy of the complaint was certified to by the justice of the peace, or by the plaintiff or his agent or attorney, is insufficient to maintain a judgment by default. Deila v. Flint, 15 Or. 188.

A defendant in a proceeding under the Oregon Forcible Entry and Detainer Act may be required to answer not less than two, or more than four, days after service. Ibid.

A complaint alleging in substance that the defendant broke and entered the premises rented by plaintiff from defendant, and by force and menace refused to permit plaintiff to enter the same, and has ever since held, and now forcibly holds, possession, wrongfully and illegally, and claiming damages for such wrongful acts, and the consequent injury to plaintiff's business, was held to state a cause of action in tort, and not upon contract. Medcraft v. Dartt, 67 Wis. 118.

An allegation that prosecutor was seized, etc., is good, although not stating when he was seized. An additional allegation of peaceable possession is merely surplusage. Republica v. Shryber, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 68 (1 L. ed. 40).

It is not necessary for plaintiffs in forcible detainer to show that defendants held possession by force or threats of force. Giddings v. 70 Land & Water Co., 33 Cal. 88.

To constitute a forcible entry, it is sufficient if the entry, in the presence or absence of the possessor, is attended with such a display of force as manifests an intention to intimidate the party in possession, or to deter him from defending his rights, or to excite him to repel the invasion. My v. Yore, 71 Cal. 150.

Unless there is evident force against the person in actual possession, indictments should be discouraged. Thompson v. Com. 7 Cent. Rep. 881, 118 Pa. 155.

Entering a house under claim of right and in occupant's absence, and substituting a new lock for the occupant's, does not amount to forcible entry and detainer. Ibid.

The mere filing, by the defendant, of an answer claiming title to the premises, will not deprive the court in which the action is pending of jurisdiction; but if it should appear from the evidence that the question involved was one of title, and not for possession of the premises alone, the case should be dismissed. Lipp v. Hunt, 25 Neb. 61.

In an action of trespass for forcible dispossession of one claiming as tenant, evidence of the temper and character of the one making personal assaults was admissible in evidence, to show the knowledge plaintiff had of such temper and disposition, and the effect which threats might have upon him. Chaplin and Sherwood, J's., dissenting. Baumer v. Antlau, 8 West. Rep. 115, 65 Mich. 31.

Evidence of personal assaults made by defendant's wife in his presence are admissible, while those made in his absence should be excluded. Ibid.

Evidence of the character of the premises, to show the value of the lease, was held admissible; and evidence of the cost of machinery which plaintiff had purchased for the purpose of working the premises was not admissible. Ibid.

There being evidence that the parties had made a settlement by which the plaintiff had surrendered possession, the charge of the court should have submitted to the jury to determine whether a settlement had in fact been made; but not whether it had been made on a good and sufficient consideration. Ibid.

to the premises clearly cannot recover damages for any injury done to them by him who has title." "He may, however," says the court, "recover nominal damages in all cases of forcible entry and detainer;" and this, in our opinion, is the correct view of the law. It is strongly sustained in Newton v. Harland, supra, though the point is not distinctly decided. In that case, Bosanquet, J., agrees with Tindall, C. J., in holding that, "if the act be expressly prohibited by statute, it must . . . be illegal and void." See also Cooley, Torts, 828, 824.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that, there having been a forcible entry upon the peaceable possession of the plaintiff, he is entitled to recover nominal damages for the trespass. He is also entitled to recover damages for any injury inflicted upon his person, his furniture, his tools, and even his house, if it is a fixture only. There may also be awarded exemplary damage if the unlawful act be done in a wanton and reckless manner. The complaint alleges such injuries, and it was error on the part of the court in making the case turn upon the question whether the force used was necessary to the expulsion of the plaintiff, as we have seen that the forcible entry was unlawful, without reference to the amount of force necessary to effectuate the purpose of the plaintiff. We are also of the opinion that the incompetent collateral matter admitted by the court must have had a prejudicial effect against the plaintiff.

For the reasons given, there must be a new trial.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANAPOLIS CABLE STREET R. CO.,

Appx.

v.

CITIZEN'S STREET R. CO.

(....Ind....)

1. The rule which prohibits the granting of monopolies applies only to such things as are of common right, and is never applied to things which are monopolies in their nature; hence it will not prevent the granting for a reasonable and fixed period of the exclusive right to operate a railway line in certain streets.
2. A mere agreement by a municipal corporation not to grant any rights or privileges which will impair or destroy those conferred by its ordinance giving a certain corporation permission to operate a street railway system in its streets will not prevent it from granting like permission to others.
3. Where two rival companies have each received permission to construct a railway system in the streets of a city, the one which first begins work on a line involving a certain street, in good faith and acting within the terms of its grant, has the better right to the use of that portion of the street which its tracks will cover; and this right will continue so long as money is expended and the work diligently prosecuted with a view to its completion.
4. A municipality having control over its streets may prescribe the motive power to be used in propelling street cars thereon; and when it prescribes one kind of power no other can be used.

5. A street railway company having authority to use a cable for motive power acquires no right to the exclusive use of a street by entering thereon and laying tracks upon which it intends to use a different motive power.
6. A street railway company may, for the purpose of defeating the rights which its rival claims to have acquired by reason of prior occupation of a street in which both companies have equal rights, allege and prove that such occupation was not in conformity to such rival's charter powers, in that the tracks were laid with the intention of using motive power different from that permitted by the charter.
7. A grant of permission to use a certain motive power upon street railway tracks wrongfully constructed with the intention of using such power when another was prescribed by the company's charter, will not relate back to the time of the construction of the tracks so as to cut off intervening rights.
8. A company having power to own and operate a street railway in a particular city may use the tracks, cars and other property which it purchases from another company previously chartered with like power, although the latter had no power to sell and transfer its franchise.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court

NOTE.—Electric railways in city streets.

A charter permitting a street railway to use horses or other power will permit the use of electricity as a motive power. Taggart v. Newport St. R. Co. (R. I.) 7 L. R. A. 205.

Where authority is given to use electricity as a motive power, by any system of application approved as suitable, the placing of poles in the streets will not be held prohibited by a clause in the charter prohibiting the incumbering of any part of the streets not occupied by its tracks. Ibid.

The New York Statutes authorizing a turnpike company to operate a street railroad, and to use "the power of horses, animals or any mechanical or other power, or the combination of them, which such company might choose to employ, except the force of steam,"—embraces electricity as a motive power. Hudson River Teleph. Co. v. Watervliet Turnp. & R. Co. 29 N. Y. S. R. 694.

The Rapid Transit Act (Laws 1878, chap. 606) authorized the organization of companies to construct street railways on the surface, to be operated by any power other than animal. Earl, J., dissents. New York Cable R. Co. v. New York, 6 Cent. Rep. 56, 104 N. Y. L.

for Marion County affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from constructing a street railway upon certain streets, and from interfering with plaintiff in its construction of a railway upon the same streets. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

In this State, power to confer a monopoly does not exist.

Tate v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 7 Ind. 473.

Cooley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the appellee against the appellant, brought for the purpose of enjoining the appellant from constructing a street railroad on certain streets in the City of Indianapolis, and to enjoin it from interfering with the appellee in its construction of a street railroad on said streets.

It is alleged in the complaint that the Citizen's Street Railway is a corporation organized under the laws of this State for the purpose of building, maintaining and operating street railways propelled by animal power in the streets in the City of Indianapolis; that after the organization of said corporation the common council of said city, on the 18th day of January, 1864, passed an ordinance by section 2 of which, and by the terms of section 3 of a subsequent ordinance passed on the 18th day of September, 1865, said corporation was granted power and authority to construct and lay a single or double track for such railway lines upon and along the course of all the streets of the City of Indianapolis, including Meridian, Circle, Market, Georgia and Alabama Streets, and Home, Central and Lincoln Avenues, that by the terms of said ordinance said tracks were to be laid in the center of said streets where practicable, except where a double track was contemplated, in which case the tracks were to be laid so as to make the center of said tracks the center of the street; that the grant of said right was to extend for the full term of thirty-seven years; that said city was not to grant to any person or corporation any privilege which would impair or destroy the rights and privileges of said corporation; that said corporation promptly accepted said ordinance and the other ordinances amendatory thereof, and at once laid and commenced operating a system of street railways in the City of Indianapolis, and complied with the terms of said ordinance, and has never at any time given to the authorities of said city any cause of forfeiture, and has been continuously extending said system, at an expense of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and has never abandoned any of its rights; that the appellee is a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating street railways in the City of Indianapolis propelled by animal power, and that in April, 1868, it purchased from said Citizen's Street Railway Company all its property of every nature and description, including its cars, tracks, rights, franchises, real estate, horses, mules, harness, etc., with a view to succeeding to the rights of said Company in the continuation, maintenance and operation of its system of street railways in said city; that in April, 1868, said city, by a duly adopted ordinance, granted to the appellee all the rights, franchises and privileges of every nature and description belonging to said Citizen's Street Railway Company in the streets of said city, and thereupon appellant took possession of all such property, rights, franchises, etc., and has ever since been operating the said road under and in accordance with the authority conferred on it by its charter from the State of Indiana, and by its contract with said Citizen's Street Railway Company, and by the said ordinance granting and confirming to it, as the successor of said Citizen's Street Railway Company, all the rights of said last-named Company in the premises; that the appellant is a corporation organized under the laws of this State for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining lines of street cars in the City of Indianapolis, and is claiming the right to construct, operate and maintain such lines of cars in said city upon the streets heretofore named; that appellee has begun the construction of a line of street railway commencing and communicating with a track, or an existing and completed line, known as the Illinois Street line, at the junction of Illinois and Georgia Streets, extending thence east on

Georgia Street to Meridian, thence north on Meridian to Washington Street, and connecting on Washington Street with the Washington Street line, and also, thence north on Meridian to Circle; thence east on Circle to Market, and thence east on the Market Street line; and, also, diverging at Maryland Street from said Meridian Street line, and extending thence east on Maryland Street to Pennsylvania Street, and thence north on Pennsylvania Street to Washington Street, and connecting with said Washington Street line; that it has also commenced another line commencing at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Market Streets, extending thence east on Market Street to Alabama, thence north on Alabama Street to Home Avenue, thence east on Home Avenue to Central Avenue and thence north on Central Avenue to the State Fair Grounds; that on said last named line it has done a large part of the work for the construction of the same, and is still at work prosecuting the same with the greatest diligence; that on Tuesday, the 24th day of July, 1883, it commenced work on said Georgia and Meridian Street line, and is diligently prosecuting the same; that by the contract as set forth in said ordinance it is required to lay its said tracks in the center of said streets, and in case of double tracks the same must be laid at such distance from the center of said streets as will make the central point between the two tracks the center of the street; and that under its said contract and ordinances it has no right to lay said tracks at any other points in said streets; that the appellant, claiming to have authority or license from said city, has entered upon some of the same streets, to wit, Meridian and Market Streets, and is threatening to enter upon others of said streets, and is building and is threatening to build a double-track street railroad in the center of said streets, occupying precisely the same ground that the appellee is required by its ordinance to occupy, and is thereby seeking to, and will, if it is permitted so to lay its tracks and to maintain the same, exclude the appellee from the use of said streets; that in 1877 said city, by an ordinance duly passed, granted or attempted to grant to appellant the right to build and operate a line of street cars on Meridian, Circle, Market and Alabama Streets, and on Home and Central Avenues, the same to be operated as cable cars, that is, being cars propelled by a cable revolving under ground and moved by a stationary steam engine at the terminus of said lines; that long before it attempted to lay any track on said streets, or any of them, it disclaimed any purpose to accept said ordinance or license, and refused to accept the same; that on the — day of June, 1883, it did enter upon Meridian Street between Circle and Maryland Streets, and proceeded to construct along the center of said street, upon the very ground the appellee is entitled to occupy, a double-track line to be used and propelled by animal power, or possibly by electrical motors, and at the time it thus tore up said street and constructed its track thereon it had no license or authority whatever in the premises to build any line whatever except said cable line, which it disclaimed any purpose of building; that on the — day of —, 1883, said city passed an ordinance authorizing the appellant to build a line of street railroad on said streets to be operated by electric motors, the wires for said motors to be under ground, that said ordinance was general in its terms, simply permitting said lines on said streets and not specifying the parts of said streets to be occupied by said lines; that after the appellee had commenced, as it had the right to do, to build its said tracks on Georgia and Meridian Streets, and on the other streets named, the appellant commenced to tear up said streets, and has commenced laying track on Market and Meridian Streets, and is threatening to lay its said track on the other streets hereinabove named, along the center of the same, thereby excluding the appellee from said streets.

The appellant filed an answer in two paragraphs, and also a counterclaim, and on a subsequent day filed a third paragraph of answer; but as no question is made on these pleadings they need not be set out. The appellee also filed a second paragraph of complaint, but we deem it unnecessary to refer now to the allegations contained therein, as all the questions arising on this paragraph arise upon the special finding of facts hereinafter referred to in this opinion.

Upon issues formed the cause was tried at special term of the superior court, resulting in the granting of a perpetual injunction against the appellant, from which it appealed to the general term and assigned error. The judgment of the special term was affirmed, from which the appellant appeals to this court. The court at special term made a special finding of the facts in the cause and stated its conclusions of law thereon. In this special finding are set out the several ordinances of the City of Indianapolis under which the respective parties to this suit claim the right to construct and operate street railroads on the streets of said city.

It appears by the special finding of facts in this cause, among other things, that on the 18th day of January, 1864, the common council of the City of Indianapolis passed an ordinance by which it granted to the Citizen's Street Railway Company of Indianapolis, and its successors, the right to lay a single or double track for passenger railway lines, with all necessary and convenient tracks for turn-outs, side tracks and switches, in, upon and along the course of the streets and alleys of the City of Indianapolis. The ordinance required the company to use animals only as a motive power. The track is required to be laid in the center of the street in all cases where it is practicable to so lay it, except where a double track is contemplated, in which case the track may be laid at such distances from the center of the street as will make the center point between the two tracks the center of the street. No track is to be laid within twelve feet of the sidewalk upon any street, in any case where it is practicable to avoid it. The rights and privileges granted by the ordinance are to extend over a period of thirty years from its passage, and the city thereby binds itself, during said period, not to grant to or confer upon any other person or corporation any privileges which will impair or destroy the rights and privileges granted to the Citizen's Street Railway Company. It is provided that if at any time during said period of thirty years the common council of the City of Indianapolis should be of the opinion that a line of street railroad should be constructed upon any street in said city over which no line exists, it may so declare by resolution; and if said company shall fail for a period of thirty days after service of notice, by the delivery of a copy of such resolution to it, to certify to the common council of said city a copy of a resolution of its directors ordering the construction of said line, with the affidavit of the president attached, that it is the design, in good faith, of said company to proceed immediately with the construction of said line of railway, the common council may, by resolution, declare all privileges and right of way over and in said line of street railway forfeited, and may grant the same to some other person or company.

By an ordinance passed by said council on the 18th day of September, 1868, it is declared to be the true intent and meaning of the ordinance of January 18, 1864, to grant to the Citizen's Street Railway Company the right to construct and operate street railways on any and all streets in the City of Indianapolis, whether named in said ordinance or not, and by the latter ordinance such permission is granted as to all the streets then in said city as well as to all streets that might thereafter be added by the extension of the corporate limits of the city. Immediately after the passage of these ordinances the Citizen's Street Railway Company commenced the construction and operation of a system of street railways in the City of Indianapolis under said ordinances, and continued to construct and operate such system until the 24th day of April, 1884, at which time it had thirty-eight miles of street-railroad track. On the 24th day of April, 1880, it sold and transferred all its property, including said track, cars, mules, harness, etc., to the appellee, which transfer was duly approved by the common council of the City of Indianapolis. At the time of the approval of said transfer the council passed an ordinance granting to the appellee all the right and privileges possessed by the Citizen's Street Railway Company. Immediately after obtaining possession of the property the appellee began to extend the system of street railroads already existing, and between the time of its purchase and the 1st day of September, 1880, built near fifteen miles of additional track.

On the 22d day of June, 1887, the common council of the City of Indianapolis, by an ordinance duly passed, granted to the appellant permission and authority to lay, construct, operate and maintain a single or double track street railway, with all the necessary and convenient tracks for turn-outs, side-tracks, switches and terminals in, upon and along all streets and alleys of said city then existing or which might thereafter be laid out. The ordinance required the appellant to construct, by the 1st of November, 1888, what was known as a cable line, operated by underground cable in connection with stationary engines on the following portions of said streets: one line commencing at the Union Passenger Station at Jackson Place, thence north on the new fifty-foot street leading from Jackson Place to Georgia Street, thence east upon Georgia Street to Meridian Street, thence north on Meridian Street to Circle Street, thence west on Circle Street to Market Street, thence west on Market Street to Tennessee Street, thence north on Tennessee Street to New York Street, thence west on New York Street to Mississippi Street, thence north on Mississippi Street to Seventh Street, thence east on Seventh Street to Tennessee Street, thence north on Tennessee Street to Twelfth Street, and thence east on Twelfth Street to the State Fair Grounds, one line commencing at the intersection of Meridian Street and the south boundary of Circle Street, thence east on Circle Street to Market Street, thence east on Market Street to Alabama Street, thence north on Alabama Street to Home Avenue, thence east on Home Avenue to Central Avenue, thence north on Central Avenue to Clyde Street, thence east on Clyde Street to College Avenue, and one line commencing at the intersection of Georgia Street and Meridian Street, thence east on Georgia Street to Pennsylvania Street, thence south on Pennsylvania Street to Madison Avenue, and southwardly on Madison Avenue to Minnesota Street.

On the 23d day of June, 1887, the appellant filed notice of its acceptance of the terms of this ordinance, but nothing was done looking to the construction of railway tracks until about the 1st of January, 1888. At that time John W. Dudley, a civil engineer, made some surveys for the New York Cable Railway Construction Company, which work he prosecuted at intervals between the 1st of January and the 18th day of March, 1888. During this time he surveyed a line called the Michigan Street line extending from Fall Creek Bridge southwestwardly to West Street, and thence southerly to Michigan Street, and eastward on Michigan Street to the United States Arsenal grounds, and thence northerly on Keystone Avenue to Clifford Avenue, thence easterly on Clifford Avenue to Rural Street. He made a profile of this line. He was employed to do this work by W. W. Dudley, the general manager of the New York Cable Railway Construction Company, who was at the time president of the Indianapolis Cable Street Railroad Company. Between the 1st and 6th of May, 1888, said John W. Dudley resumed his surveys for the New York Cable Railway Construction Company, and within a few days thereafter the angle formed by the central line of Georgia Street and the central line of Meridian Street was measured and a wooden stake driven at the intersection of these two lines to form a basis upon which to order curve construction at said intersection. A similar stake was driven at the intersection of the central line of Meridian Street and the street car tracks of the Citizen's Street Railroad Company on Washington Street, and the angle was measured there in like manner. The same measurements were made at the intersection of the central line of Circle Street and Meridian Street, and a line was measured around the southeast quarter of Circle Street. There was also a similar stake driven at the intersection of the center line of Market Street and the center line of the Citizen's Street Railroad Company's tracks on Pennsylvania Street, and the angle there measured. At the intersection of the center line of Market and Alabama Streets a similar stake was driven and the angle of intersection measured

At the intersection of the center line of Alabama Street and center line of the Citizen's Street Railroad Company's tracks on Massachusetts Avenue a similar stake was driven and a like measurement of angle made. At the intersection of the center line of Morrison Street and Alabama Street a similar stake was driven, and also, both at the intersection of the center line of Alabama Street south of Morrison Street and north of Morrison Street, there being an off-set or jog on Alabama Street at Morrison of about fifteen feet. The angles were also measured on Morrison Street. Like measurements and stakes were driven at the intersection of Sixth and Alabama Streets, Sixth Street and Central Avenue, Central Avenue and Ninth Street, Ninth Street and the central line of the Citizen's Street Railroad Company's tracks upon College Avenue on Ninth Street, and at a point about two hundred feet east of College Avenue on Ninth Street, a similar peg was driven in the center of Ninth Street. Plats were made showing these measurements. All said surveying, measuring, platting were begun between the 1st and 6th of May, 1888, and continued for and done within three or four days, by John W. Dudley and his assistants. During the last eight days of May, 1888, John W. Dudley resumed work for the New York Cable Railway Construction Company, and made a survey beginning on Market Street, on the east side of Circle Street, extending to the intersection of the center line of Alabama Street and Market Street, and thence north on Alabama Street nearly to New York Street. This survey consisted of a measurement of the distance along the center line of the street, and pegs were driven at intervals of one hundred feet. These pegs were driven to furnish reference marks for a double line of track of street railroad extending along the line of the route measured. In the latter part of May, 1888, the New York Cable Railway Construction Company became insolvent, and, after the 1st of June that year, no more work was done for it in Indianapolis. The work done by or for said company was done for and on behalf of the appellant. The first of June, 1888, a contract was made between W. W. Dudley and associates, subscribers for the majority of the stock of the Indianapolis Cable Street Railroad Company, and Mr. Tom. L. Johnson and his associates, by which the latter obtained an assignment of said stock subscriptions, none of the stock of said company having then been issued. On the 1st of June, 1888, W. W. Dudley arranged with Tom. L. Johnson to order for the appellant a mile of single-track material, and on short notice to procure materials of three miles of double track, in all seven miles of single track. In pursuance of this order, a mile of track material was sent immediately, and at the same time he made arrangements for tools and employed agents and workmen for laying track on Meridian Street and other streets. On the 2d or 3d day of June, 1888, said John W. Dudley began work for the Indianapolis Cable Street Railroad Company upon the streets of Indianapolis. He drove stakes at intervals of fifty feet upon the center line of Meridian Street, between the south line of Circle Street and the north line of Pearl Street, by direction of W. W. Dudley, the president of the appellant.

These stakes were driven for the purpose of furnishing reference points by which to align tracks of a street railroad. On the 4th day of June, 1888, the appellant began laying street railroad track, beginning at the south line of Circle Street, and extending southward on Meridian. The track laid at this time on Meridian Street, south of Circle Street, was a double-track street railway, the two tracks being laid at equal distances from the center of the street, with their inner rails about four feet and four inches apart, each track occupying, with the ties supporting it, a space of eight feet. It was not a cable street railroad, and was not built for the purpose of being operated as such, the idea of building a cable road having been abandoned about the 1st of June of that year. The work of laying this double-track road on Meridian Street, extending south from the Circle, was continued until the north line of Washington Street was reached, when Washington Street itself was omitted, and work resumed on the south side of Washington Street, extending said tracks southward on Meridian until they reached Pearl Street, making a distance of about two hundred and twenty feet between Circle Street and Washington Street, and about one hundred and sixty-two feet between Washington Street and Pearl Street. This work was completed between Washington Street and the Circle, and was in progress south of Washington Street, when work was suspended by the request of the city attorney of Indianapolis, which request was based upon the ground that the track being laid on Meridian Street, south of Circle Street, was not a cable street railroad, and not authorized by the ordinance giving the appellant Company authority to lay street railroad tracks where those were laid. These tracks laid on Meridian Street, between Circle and Pearl Streets, could be used to run cars drawn by animals or propelled by the overhead wire and pole system of electricity, or by cars operated by an electrical storage battery, and could not be operated by cables or underground wires, as there was no excavation in the street below said tracks to constitute a chamber in which any underground wires could be operated. The appellant, at the time it constructed these tracks did not construct them to be operated by underground cables or wires.

Soon after the transfer to the appellee of the right of its predecessor hereinbefore mentioned, the general manager of that Company gave orders to construct a number of additional street-car lines in the City of Indianapolis, and among other lines was a line extending from the Union Station to the State Fair Grounds.

On the 6th day of June, 1888, the appellee began work on Market at the east line of Pennsylvania Street, and continued to excavate and lay track toward the east on Market Street, until the square between Market and Delaware Streets was completed, and the square between Delaware and Alabama Streets was well advanced towards completion, when work was stopped by the street commissioner of the City of Indianapolis. And on the 10th of June, 1888, an injunction suit was brought by the appellee to prevent further interference with the work by the city authorities, and upon this injunction being granted, work was resumed on Market Street between Delaware and Alabama, and continued upon Alabama Street between Market and New York Streets, said work on Alabama Street being well advanced towards completion on the 24th day of July, 1888. The appellant caused its said engineer and his assistants, on the 24th day of July, 1888, between the hours of eight and twelve in the morning, to survey Georgia Street between Illinois and Meridian Streets, and to drive stakes similar to those hereinbefore mentioned on the center line of Georgia Street from a point therein east of Illinois Street and west of Meridian Street, and at about one third of the distance eastward between Illinois and Meridian Streets, said point being at the west side of a street running north from the Union Depot and Jackson Place to Georgia Street and named McCrea Street, thence eastward, to the intersection of the center lines of Georgia and Meridian Streets, said stakes being driven into the surface of the street at intervals of fifty feet along said course, for the purpose of furnishing a reference mark for the construction by the appellant of a double track street railroad upon Georgia and Meridian Streets, to connect with the line of street railroad which the appellant had built, as before stated, between Circle and Pearl Streets, upon Meridian Street.

At the time the appellant caused said survey and staking, commencing about the 1st and 6th days of May, 1888, and continuing for three or four days, there was no street railway track of any company upon and along Meridian Street between Louisiana Street and Circle Street, or on and along Circle, or on and along Market Street between Circle Street and Alabama Street, or on and along Alabama Street between Market Street and Sixth Street, or on and along Sixth Street between Alabama Street and Central Avenue, or on and along Central Avenue between Sixth Street and Ninth Street, or on and along Ninth Street.

At the time the surveying and staking, within the last eight days of May, 1888, was done, there was no street railroad track of any company on and along Market Street between Circle Street and Alabama Street, or on and along Alabama Street between Market Street and Seventh Street.

On the 6th day of June, 1888, at 1 o'clock P. M., the appellee first began work upon a line of street railway on Market Street, between Pennsylvania and Alabama Streets, by placing a force of men there and commencing the digging up of the street to put in a double-track street railroad, and laid there some ties and track between that time and the third day thereafter, when said work stopped for the time being, no work having been done at that time on any other part of the line of which the track so put in was to constitute a part.

On the 24th day of July, 1888, the appellant, before causing the survey and staking on Georgia Street, made arrangements for assembling its workmen to resume construction the next morning on Georgia Street between Illinois and Meridian Streets, and on Meridian Street between Louisiana Street and Circle Street, and for such purpose caused its tool boxes to be deposited at the northeast corner of Meridian and Georgia Streets between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. About the same hour a force of the appellant's workmen commenced work on Georgia Street, at or near its intersection with Illinois Street, and began digging up said Georgia Street eastward from Illinois Street, and constructing upon said Georgia Street at that place toward Meridian Street a double-track street railway. About seven o'clock on the evening of the same day the appellant placed its force of workmen upon Meridian Street at the crossing thereof with Georgia Street, and commenced digging up said Meridian Street and constructing on and along the same a double-track street railway, beginning said digging and construction at the north side of said crossing and extending the same southward across said crossing and on Meridian Street toward Louisiana Street, there being then no street-railroad track constructed or in course of construction upon Meridian Street, except said portion constructed by the appellant heretofore mentioned. That on the same evening, and immediately after the appellant had commenced said digging and construction, the appellee, dividing its force of workmen so working upon Georgia Street, and transferring a portion of its said force of workmen from Georgia Street to Meridian Street north of Georgia Street, caused its said workmen to dig up Meridian Street between Georgia and Maryland Streets, and to construct thereon a double-track street railway, and the same night the appellee caused its said force of workmen to place its double-track iron curve for said railway at said crossing of Georgia and Meridian Streets, partly upon cross-ties placed by the appellant in excavations made by it, but did not fasten them, and, for the purpose of so placing said curve, drove and pushed from said place the workmen of the appellant, and afterward appellee removed the ties of appellant and replaced them with its own.

Thereupon, on said night of the 24th of July, 1888, and on succeeding days, the appellant constructed and finished its double-track railway upon Meridian Street between Georgia and Louisiana Streets. On the 25th day of July, 1888, the appellee caused its workmen to continue the work of constructing a double-track street railway on and along Meridian Street between Georgia and Maryland Streets. On the 25th day of July, 1888, the appellant, besides continuing its work of construction on Meridian Street between Louisiana and Georgia Streets, also proceeded to and did dig up and prepare Meridian Street from Pearl Street to and beyond Maryland Street, and place and construct there a double-track street railway. Also, on the same day, the appellant dug up and prepared Market Street from Circle Street eastward to Pennsylvania Street, and placed cross-ties and rails, and partly constructed a double-track street railway on and along said portion of Market Street, there being then no other railroad track upon said portion of Market Street.

On the evening of the 27th day of July, 1888, the appellant's workmen, being at work on Circle Street between its southern intersection with Meridian Street and its eastern intersection with Market Street, and having been notified of the issuance of a restraining order, which on that date was granted in the cause against it, restraining it from work on said line, and, because thereof, caused work upon its said line, the same being the first line designated in section 2 of said General Ordinance No. 19 of 1887, as amended by section 1 of said General Ordinance No. 34 of 1888.

After the issuing of the said restraining order herein, and after the granting of a temporary injunction, which was issued herein against the appellant on the 28th day of July, 1888, enjoining it from working upon said line, and while said restraining order and said temporary injunction were pending and in force, the appellee continued its work of construction, and constructed and finished, and has been and is using and operating with animal power, a continuous double-track street railway on and along the following streets: Georgia Street from Illinois Street to Meridian Street, Meridian Street from Georgia Street to Circle Street, Circle Street from Meridian Street south of Circle Street to Market Street east of Circle Street, Market Street from Circle Street eastward to Alabama Street, Alabama Street from Market Street to Home Avenue, Home Avenue from Alabama Street to Central Avenue, Central Avenue from Home Avenue to Tenth Street.

In the construction of its said line mentioned in the nineteenth paragraph of the special finding, while said restraining order and said temporary injunction were in force against the defendant, the appellee took up and wholly removed from their places in the streets all the tracks so constructed by the appellant on Meridian Street and Market Street, placing the material thereof in the street gutters, and placing and constructing its tracks of said line in the same places from which it had so removed the appellant's said tracks.

In constructing said line of street railway track from Illinois Street to Tenth Street, upon the route before described, and in extending its line on Meridian Street south of Georgia Street, appellee removed from its position 2,800 feet estimated as single-track street railroad, which was worth $1.75 a foot when in place in the street, and 75 cents a foot when removed and lying upon the side of the street as hereinbefore stated, except 400 feet on Market Street, between Circle and Pennsylvania Streets, which had only been partially completed, and was worth $1.50 as it lay in the street before removed to the sides thereof.

The city council of the City of Indianapolis, by an ordinance passed on the 2d day of July, 1888, granted to the appellant further time, extending to the 1st day of January, 1889, within which to complete certain designated lines of cable street railway with the right to construct either a cable or electric railway, which ordinance was accepted by the appellant on the 22d day of July, 1888.

As a part of said system of street railways of which the appellant took possession and proceeded to operate on the 3d day of April, 1888, there was and is a line of street railway extending on Washington Street along its entire course through said city, also a double-track street railway extending from Louisiana Street northward on Illinois Street to Seventh Street, connecting at Washington Street with said line thereon; also a double-track street railway connecting with said Washington Street line at the intersection of Washington and Pennsylvania Streets, and running thence northward on Pennsylvania Street to Seventh Street, and thence east on Seventh Street to Alabama Street, thence north on Alabama Street to Ninth Street, also a street railway connecting the said Pennsylvania Street line at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Ohio Streets, and running thence northeasterly on Massachusetts Avenue to New Jersey Street, thence north on New Jersey Street to Fort Wayne Avenue, thence northeasterly on Fort Wayne Avenue to Central Avenue, thence north on Central Avenue to Christian Avenue, thence east on Christian Avenue to College Avenue, thence north on College Avenue to Ninth Street; also a line of street railway connecting the said Washington Street line at the intersection of Washington and East Streets, and running thence north on East Street to Ohio Street, thence east on Ohio Street to Noble Street, thence north on Noble Street to Massachusetts Avenue, thence northeasterly on Massachusetts Avenue to Peru Street, thence north on Peru Street to Home Avenue.

The appellant has never disclaimed, abandoned or consented or agreed to the surrender or repeal of its rights or privileges under and through its said ordinances numbered 19 and 24, hereinbefore mentioned.

The double-track street railways commenced and constructed by the appellant on Meridian and Market Streets, as hereinbefore stated, were of such construction as to be capable of and suitable for operation as electrical street railways using the storage battery system for propelling the cars thereon, and were suitable for or capable of being operated by means of poles or overhead wires. Said storage battery system is one method of propelling cars run on street railways, but as yet is mostly experimental, not in general use, and expensive when used to propel cars over street railways. The purpose of the appellant to use such storage system as a motive power in propelling its cars over the line of its railways in the city was not declared in writing, or in any way made known to the city or its officers. It was, however, orally so declared about the 1st of June, 1898, by some of the officers of the defendant.

Upon these and other facts set out in the special finding, not necessary to be here repeated, the court stated as a conclusion of law that the appellee was entitled to an injunction against the appellant enjoining it from constructing a street railroad in the center of the streets named in the complaint, and entered a decree accordingly.

It is not denied that the common council of a city in this State has the exclusive control and management of the streets and alleys within the corporate limits of the city. Indeed, it is conceded on all sides that the common council of the City of Indianapolis possessed the power to grant to the appellee, as well as to the appellant, the privilege of building and operating street railroads upon the streets of said city.

It is contended by the appellant, however, that the appellee is claiming that the City of Indianapolis by its common council granted to it the exclusive right to occupy, for street railroad purposes, the center of all the streets in the city, and it is argued that such grant, if made, amounts to a monopoly, and that it is for that reason void.

As a general rule neither the State nor a municipal government can grant or create a monopoly. Uticas Gas & Mfg. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 38, 14 West. Rep. 92.

In that case it was said by this court that "the spirit and policy of the law forbid municipal corporations from creating monopolies, by favoring one corporation to the exclusion of another."

Our Constitution provides that "the General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens."

But it must not be understood that all monopolies are unlawful. Many things which are lawful are, from their nature and of necessity, monopolies, such as patent rights, copyrights, the right to keep a ferry, and many other things which might be mentioned. As a street railroad company has no legal right to lay its track upon the streets of a city without the permission of the common council, if the city should grant such right to one company and refuse to grant it to another, the company to which the right was granted would have a monopoly, until such time as the common council should grant a similar right to some other person or company. So if the common council should grant to a street railroad company the right to lay its track on certain streets which were too narrow to admit of being occupied by other street railroad tracks, such company would have a monopoly of such streets. It is plain, therefore, that while monopolies, as a general rule, are unlawful, there are many exceptions to the rule. The rule applies only to such things as are of common right, and is never to be applied to such things as are in their nature a monopoly.

Judge Elliott, in his valuable work on Roads and Streets, in discussing this question at page 306, says: "To deny the power of the Legislature to make a grant that is of necessity of a monopolistic character, would lead to the unwarranted conclusion that in no case can the Legislature grant the right to lay or operate a street railway in a road, or street; for, if the power to make such grant be conceded, it necessarily and unavoidably results that the occupancy of the part of the road or street is exclusive, as two railways cannot occupy the same space."

It is held in many respectable authorities that an exclusive right in such cases may be granted for a reasonable and fixed period. New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana, L. & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650 [20 L. ed. 516]; New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Nicks, 115 U. S. 674 [20 L. ed. 625]; D. & Moline, St. R. Co. v. Des Moines, B. & N. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 513; St. Tammany Water Works Co. v. New Orleans Water Works Co. 120 U. S. 64 [30 L. ed. 563].

This brings us to a consideration of the ordinance passed by the common council of the City of Indianapolis, granting to the Citizen's Street Railway Company the right to construct and operate street railroads upon the streets of the City of Indianapolis, and to whose rights the appellee claims to have succeeded. This ordinance, together with the ordinance subsequently passed declaratory of the intention of the parties at the time of its passage, grants to the Citizen's Street Railway Company the right to lay its track, either single or double, on all the streets of the City of Indianapolis, confining it to the center of the street where practicable. This right is not declared in the ordinance to be exclusive.

Grants of franchises by public corporations to individuals or private corporations are to be strictly construed, and no exclusive privileges pass unless it be plainly conferred by express words or necessary implication. Citizens St. R. Co. v. Jones, 84 Fed. Rep. 579.

A grant made by the Commonwealth, or by a municipal corporation under authority from the Commonwealth, is to be taken most strongly against the grantee, and nothing is to be taken by implication against the public, except what necessarily flows from the nature of the terms of the grant. Allegheny v. Ohio & P. R. Co., 26 Pa. 365; Birmingham & P. M. St. R. Co. v. Birmingham St. R. Co., 19 Ala. 465.

The ordinance granting to the Citizen's Street Railway Company the right to construct street railways on the streets of the City of Indianapolis does not grant to it the exclusive right to construct street railways thereon.

Indeed, it is not claimed by the appellee, as we understand the briefs on file, that it possesses the exclusive right to construct street railroads on the streets of said city, but it is conceded that the common council may grant to other persons or corporations the same right. Where the sovereign has granted a special charter to a corporation to conduct a particular business, without granting any exclusive privileges over that business, the same sovereign may in like manner grant special charters to other corporations to carry on the same business, and where there is a conflict of profits between them the first has no remedy. Oswestonville & M. Turnp. Co. v. Smith, 69 Ind. 290; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 420 [9 L. ed. 773].

Acting upon this well-known principle, the common council of the City of Indianapolis granted to the appellant the right, also, to construct, maintain and operate street railroads upon the streets of the City of Indianapolis.

At this point the question arises as to what were the rights of the appellant and the appellee, in so far as they had the right to occupy the streets of the city, as between themselves. As to unoccupied streets, our opinion is that they stood upon an equality, and that the controversy resolves itself into a question of first occupancy.

Judge Elliott, in discussing this question in his work on Roads and Streets, page 570, says: "If the company which secures the first grant actually occupies the street it is authorized to use, then there is much reason for affirming that its right to the part of the street actually occupied and used is paramount and exclusive. By actually taking possession of the street and using it for the accommodation of the public, the company first in point of time does such acts as vest its right. But, to have this effect, the company, as it seems to us, must take possession in good faith and for the purpose of constructing and operating such a railway as the grant contemplates. . . . While it is, as we believe, true that some act must be done vesting the inchoate right conferred by a general grant, still we do not regard it as essential that manual possession should be taken of all the streets or roads embraced in the general grant or license. If the company having the prior right enters upon the work of constructing a system, and with reasonable diligence and in good faith does actually construct a considerable part of the system, it ought not to lose its rights, unless it has failed to comply with a proper demand to complete the system, or has unreasonably delayed its completion. . . . Conflicting claims asserted by rival companies claiming under general grants must often be settled by applying the rule that the first to rightfully occupy the street has the better right."

We have thus copied copiously from the work above referred to because we think it states the law accurately and concisely. See also Waterbury v. Dry Dock, R. B. & H. R. Co., 54 Barb. 388; Titusville & P. C. R. Co. v. Warren & V. R. Co., 19 Phila. 643; Morris & R. R. Co. v. Blair, 9 N. J. Eq. 686; Dexter & R. G. R. Co. v. Cullen City & R. J. R. Co., 90 U. S. 408 [25 L. ed. 486].

Where a company has entered upon the construction of a particular system of street railroads, and has expended its money in the prosecution of the work, it would be manifestly unjust to permit some other person or company, after the commencement of the work, to jump in and appropriate any portion of the streets involved in such system, while the former was diligently prosecuting the work, and thus destroy the system, to the ruin of the company engaged in its construction. If this could be done no person or company would undertake the construction of a system of street railroads; but to hold the right to such system, money should be expended in its construction, and the work, with a view of its completion, should be diligently prosecuted without intermission, unless stopped by circumstances over which the projector has no control.

In this case, as we understand the special finding, the appellee, in the early part of June, 1888, entered upon the construction of a system of street railroads in the City of Indianapolis, which appropriated a portion of the streets described in the complaint. Such system was determined upon and ordered by the general manager of the appellee soon after the transfer made to it by the Citizen's Street Railway Company.

It does not appear that the appellant did anything under its charter prior to the 24th day of July, 1888.

Disregarding its charter, which authorized the construction of a cable road, it proceeded to construct one of an entirely different character. Indeed, it wholly abandoned the idea of constructing a cable road, and when engaged in constructing one of a different character, in violation of its charter, it was stopped by the city attorney, for the reason that it was acting wholly without authority. In our opinion the appellant, by taking possession of the streets of Indianapolis, with a view of constructing a street railroad other than a cable road, acquired no rights in such streets, either as against the appellee or the city. It was a mere trespasser. A municipal power having control over the streets may prescribe the motive power to be used in moving street cars, and when it prescribes one kind of power the company cannot use another.

As the grant of a special charter or franchise to a corporation is construed strictly against the corporation, where the right to use one motive power is prescribed the company cannot successfully maintain its right to use another or different power. Elliott, Roads and Streets, p. 860; People v. Newton, 48 Hun, 477, 112 N. Y. 396, 8 L. R. A. 174; Denver & S. R. Co. v. Denver City R. Co. 2 Colo. 681; Citizens Street R. Co. v. Jones, 84 Fed. Rep. 579; Birmingham & P. M. St. R. Co. v. Birmingham St. R. Co. 79 Ala. 465; Allegheny v. Ohio & P. R. Co. 28 Pa. 255; North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207.

It is urged, however, that the appellee cannot inquire as to the motive power by which appellant intended to move its cars, as that was a question entirely between the appellant and the City of Indianapolis. We are not inclined to adopt this view. If the appellee had no interest in the question other than any other citizen of the City of Indianapolis, doubtless it could not raise the question now under consideration; but the appellant and the appellee had equal rights in the streets in controversy. Neither had the exclusive right to the streets or any portion thereof until occupied under its charter. The first to take possession in good faith under the charter granted to it acquired the superior right. When the appellant claims, therefore, that it entered the streets of Indianapolis and took possession under the terms of its charter, in good faith, with a view of constructing the line of street railroad which it had the right to construct under the terms of its charter, we think it competent for the appellee to allege and prove that it did not enter under the terms of its charter, and that, instead of constructing a line of cable street railroad, it was acting in violation of its grant and was a mere trespasser. There can be no pretense that the appellant did any work conforming to the rights granted it by the City of Indianapolis prior to the 24th day of July, 1868, as it did not accept the right granted it to construct an electric railroad until the 23d day of that month. In the meantime the appellee had taken possession of the streets in controversy, and was diligently prosecuting the work of constructing a system of street railroad which included these streets. The rights acquired by the appellant on the 23d day of July could have no retroactive operation so as to affect the rights of the appellee, vested by its possession.

It follows from what we have said that, as the appellee commenced the construction of a system of street railroads under the terms of its charter, which included the streets in controversy, and was in good faith diligently prosecuting the work to completion prior to the time the appellant commenced work to construct a system of street railroads pursuant to the terms of its charter, the appellee has the superior right.

It is claimed, however, that the Citizen's Street Railway Company could not sell and transfer to the appellee its franchises, and that appellee by its franchise acquired no rights. We regard this as an immaterial question. The appellee is a duly organized corporation for the purpose of owning and operating a street railroad in the City of Indianapolis. It is not denied that by its purchase it acquired all the property of the Citizen's Street Railway Company, except its franchises. The City of Indianapolis, about the date of the transfer of the property, granted to the appellee all the rights, privileges and franchises possessed by the Citizen's Street Railway Company. Assuming, without deciding, that the Citizen's Street Railway Company could not sell and transfer its franchises, and still the right of the appellee to own, construct and operate its railroad upon the streets of the City of Indianapolis is complete.

We have carefully examined all the questions presented by the record and argued in the able briefs of counsel in this case, and find no error for which the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

1. A statute will not be presumed to have been intended by the Legislature to have any extraterritorial force, where such intention would make it void.
2. A statute compelling railroad companies to furnish double-decked cars for sheep, under a penalty for failure to do so, and limiting the price per carload, is void as an attempted regulation of commerce when applied to interstate shipments.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Macon County in 8 L. R. A.

favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back an alleged overpayment of freight charges for the transportation of certain sheep. Reversed.

Statement by Sherwood, J.:

The second count of the petition is as follows:

"(2) Plaintiff, for another and further cause of action, states that the defendant, in shipping said sheep as aforesaid, placed and carried them in twelve single-decked cars, and failed and refused and neglected to furnish plaintiff with double-decked cars, as it was its lawful duty to do; and the defendant, in violation of the Statute in such cases made and provided, charged and collected of plaintiff, for the carrying of said sheep from said La Plata, Mo., to East St. Louis, Ill., at the rate of $25 per car for twelve cars, making the sum of $300 re-colived by the defendant for the transportation of said sheep, which was the full legal rate of freight allowed for the shipment of stock, and was $150 in excess of the amount that the defendant could lawfully charge for such transportation of said sheep in a single-decked car. Wherefore the plaintiff says an action hath accrued to him to have and recover of defendant the sum of $150, the excess so charged as aforesaid, for which plaintiff demands judgment."

This count is based upon the Statute entitled "An Act to Require Railroad Companies to Furnish Double-decked Cars for the Shipment of Sheep, and Providing a Penalty for Failing so to Do," approved March 18, 1881.

A trial by the court, without the intervention of a jury, resulted in a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $105, which caused an appeal by the defendant to the Kansas City Court of Appeals, from which court the cause was transferred to this court on a jurisdictional ground. Other points are unnecessary to be set forth now, as they will be sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. George S. Grover, with Mr. Wells H. Blodgett, for appellant:

The Statute relied on for recovery has no extraterritorial force and does not apply to shipments from a point within to a point without the State of Missouri.

If, as held by the court below, this Statute applies to an interstate shipment, then it is a regulation of commerce, and, as such, is a violation of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The second count of the original petition charged that the contract was made to ship the sheep from La Plata, Mo., to St. Louis, Mo., but the amended petition charged the contract was to ship the sheep from La Plata, this State, to East St. Louis, Ill.; and upon this it is claimed that there was a change in plaintiff's cause of action. This point need not be discussed, because it appears that the answer of the defendant to the original petition was considered as replied to the amended petition, and this, being done without objection, cannot be objected to here for the first time. Nor need the action of the trial court as to plaintiff's first count be considered, seeing that it was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff does not appeal. The statutory provisions upon which this action is brought are as follows:

"Section 1. All railroad companies, private companies or individuals owning or operating a railroad or railroads in the State of Missouri are required to furnish a sufficient number of double-decked cars for the shipment of sheep to supply the demand for such cars on their respective lines, and to allow shippers to load both decks in said cars with sheep to the aggregate extent of (20,000) twenty thousand pounds; which cars, so loaded, shall be received and transported by such railroad companies, or private companies or individuals, as one carload of stock, and it shall not be lawful for said railroad companies, private companies or individuals to charge or receive for the transportation of a double-decked car of sheep more than the legal rate of freight allowed for the shipment of stock.

"Sec. 2. Should any railroad company, or private company or individuals, owning or operating a railroad or railroads in the State of Missouri, refuse or neglect to furnish cars as provided in the preceding section, it shall not be lawful for them to charge or receive for the transportation of a car of sheep more than one half the legal rate of freight allowed for the shipment of stock."

It will not be intended that this Statute was to have any extraterritorial force, since this would be beyond the power of the Legislature of this State. General presumptions of this sort always attend legislative Acts. Merrill v. Boston & L. R. Co. 63 N. H. 259, 31 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 48, and cases cited, 3 Rorer, Railroads, 1151; Rorer, Interstate Law, 149-154.

2. But if, as held by the trial court, the Statute under discussion can be held to apply to interstate shipments, then it is an attempted regulation of commerce, and violates article 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 (6 L. ed. 23); Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 (23 L. ed. 347); Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 (24 L. ed. 527); Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485 (24 L. ed. 547), Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727 (29 L. ed. 1137); Hardy v. Atkinson, T. & S. R. Co. 32 Kan. 608, 10 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 402, and cases cited; Carton v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 143; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tennessee Railroad Commission, 19 Fed. Rep. 679, 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 1.

"The legislative authority of every State must spend its force within the territorial limits of the State." Cooley, Const. Lim. 151.

Controlled by these considerations, we reverse the judgment.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS

Frank O. SINGER, Pfg. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF MARYLAND.

(.....Md.....)

1. A government has an inherent right to impose such restraints and to provide such regulations in regard to the pursuits of life as the public welfare may require.
2. Prohibiting any but registered plumbers, who have received a certificate of competency from a state board, to engage in the business of plumbing is but the ordinary exercise of the police power of the State, and does not violate any constitutional rights of individuals.

(June 12, 1920.)

ERROR to the Criminal Court for Baltimore City to review a judgment convicting defendant upon an indictment for refusing to comply with the provisions of a statute requiring plumbers to receive a certificate of competency before engaging in the plumbing business. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Miller, Bryan, Fowler, Briscoe, McSherry and Robinson, JJ.

Messrs. John Stewart and David Stewart for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. Pinkney White, Atty-Gen., and Charles G. Kerr for the State.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The traverser is a plumber by trade and was indicted for refusing to comply with the requirements of the Act of 1886, chap. 439, which provides that no person shall engage in the business of plumbing in the City of Baltimore unless such person shall have received from the State Board of Commissioners of Practical Plumbing a certificate as to his competency and qualification.

This Act the traverser contends is in violation of his constitutional rights under the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of the Constitution of this State, both of which declare that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty or property without due process of law. These constitutional safeguards have been so fully considered and discussed by the supreme court, especially since the adoption of the 14th Amendment, by which the restraint upon the power of the States to pass laws affecting personal and private rights was made a part of the Federal Constitution that it can only be necessary to refer to the conclusions reached by that court as affecting

No one questions the right of every person in this country to follow any legitimate business or occupation he may see fit. This is a privilege open alike to everyone. His own labor and the right to use it as a means of livelihood is a right as sacred and as fully protected by the law as any other personal or private right.

But broad and comprehensive as this right may be, it is subject to the paramount right inherent in every government to impose such restraint and to provide such regulations in regard to the pursuits of life as the public welfare may require. This paramount right rests upon the well recognized maxim, salus populi est suprema lex, and whatever difficulty there may be in defining the precise limits and boundaries by which the exercise of this power is to be governed, all agree that laws and regulations necessary for the protection of the health, morals and safety of society are strictly within the legitimate exercise of the police power. Powell v. Pennsylvania and Mugler v. Kansas, supra; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26 [83 L. ed. 585].

As to the common and ordinary occupations of life, little or no regulation may be necessary; but if the occupation or calling be of such a character as to require a special course of study, or training, or experience, to qualify one to pursue such occupation or calling with safety to the public interests, no one questions the power of the Legislature to impose such restraints and prescribe such requirements as it may deem proper for the protection of the public against the evils resulting from incapacity and ignorance. And neither the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, nor article 23 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of this State, was designed to limit or restrain the exercise of this power. It is in the exercise of this power that no one is allowed to practice law or medicine or engage in the business of a druggist unless he shall have been found competent and qualified in the mode and in the manner prescribed by the statute. And although the business and trade of a plumber may not require the same training and experience as some other pursuits in life, yet a certain degree of training is absolutely necessary to qualify one as a competent and skillful workman. We all know that in a large city like Baltimore, with its extensive system of drainage and sewerage, the public health largely depends upon the proper and efficient manner in which the plumbing work is executed. And this being so, the Legislature not only has the power, but it is eminently wise and proper that it should provide some mode by which the qualifications of persons engaged in that business shall be determined.

In considering the power of the Legislature to impose restraints upon all persons engaged in certain pursuits, the supreme court says:

"The nature and extent of the qualifications required must depend primarily upon the judgment of the State as to their necessity. If they are appropriate to the calling or profession and attainable by reasonable application no objection to their validity can be raised." Dent v. West Virginia, 120 U. S. 114 [82 L. ed. 623].

The Act of 1886, now before us, provides in the first place that no one shall engage in the business of plumbing except those qualified to work as registered plumbers; and further that no one shall be qualified to work as a registered plumber unless he shall have made application to and received from the State Board of Practical Plumbers appointed by the government a certificate as to his competency.

These requirements are appropriate, and relate to the business of plumbing, and are such as the Legislature deemed necessary and proper for the protection of the health of the people of Baltimore against the consequences resulting from the work of incompetent and inexperienced plumbers. They are in themselves fair and reasonable, and impose no restraint or qualification which may not be complied with by reasonable training and experience. Such an Act is but the ordinary exercise of the police power of the State, and does not violate in any sense the constitutional rights of the traverser.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHNSON et al., Appts.,

v.

David ELKINS and Wife.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The fact that land was purchased with pension money and a conveyance thereof made to the pensioner's wife does not exempt it from liability for his debts, under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 4747.

2. The words "process in an action" include an execution.

3. A coroner cannot execute process directed to the sheriff, under Code of Practice, § 667. Where the coroner is authorized to set the process must be directed to him.

(April 17, 1900.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Larue County dismissing the complaint in an action brought to subject property, alleged to have been fraudulently assigned, to the payment of a debt. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Johnson and John W. Gore for appellants.

Mr. D. H. Smith for appellees.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, having a judgment in the Green Circuit Court against the appellee David Elkins, sued out an execution to the County of Larue, where the debtor then resided. It was directed to the sheriff, but, there being none at the time in the county, it was received and returned by the coroner "No property found." This action was then brought in the Larue Circuit Court to subject to the payment of the judgment a tract of land of sixty three acres, situate in said county, which had been conveyed to the wife of the debtor Elkins by one Noe. The petition avers that the land was in fact paid for by the debtor, and that it was conveyed to the wife to defraud his creditors. The copy of the execution which issued to Larue County shows, at least prima facie, that the appellant's debt was created before the land was purchased. It bears interest according to it from October 14, 1887, and the purchase was not made until November 1, 1897. It appears that the land was paid for with pension money of the debtor, drawn from the United States government. The money itself never came to his hands. The check for it did, and was indorsed by him to one Hoover, who, for the debtor, drew the money upon it, and out of it paid Noe for the land. It is now claimed that the money, when paid to Noe, was in the course of transmission to the pensioner, and, being therefore exempt from seizure for the debts of the pensioner by the United States Statute, it was no fraud upon his creditor to invest it in the land, and have the deed taken to the wife.

Section 4747 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides: "No sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, whether the same remains with the pension office, or any officer or agent thereof, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner entitled thereto, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner."

It has been repeatedly decided by this court that after the money reaches the hands of the pensioner it is no longer exempt. Robison v. Walker, 82 Ky. 60; Hudspeth v. Harrison, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 804.

In the last-named case it was held that the fact that land was purchased with pension money did not exempt it from liability for the pensioner's debts.

In the case of Sims v. Walsham, 7 S. W. Rep. 537, the money itself did not come to the hands of the pensioner, but a check did; and he transferred it to another person, with directions to draw the money, and pay it to his sons, to be, and which was, used by them in paying for land, which was conveyed to them. It was held that the land, so held by them by voluntary conveyance, was liable for the pensioner's debt.

These cases are decisive of this one, so far as this question is concerned. Another one presents itself, however, which doubtless controlled the lower court in dismissing the action of the appellants. A creditor may sue in equity to set aside a conveyance of land by his debtor as fraudulent, upon a return of nulla bona upon an execution issued from a court having jurisdiction to sell land; or he may do so without it, provided he sues out an attachment upon any of the grounds mentioned in our Code of Practice, and in conformity to its provisions. He may adopt either course, but one or the other must be pursued. Marts v. Pfeifer, 80 Ky. 600; Kyle v. O'Neil, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 709.

In this instance the averments of the petition are not sufficient to sustain the action upon the last-named ground.

It is evident the action is attempted to be based upon the return of "No property" upon the execution which issued to Larue County. By section 667 of the Code of Practice every process in an action must be directed to the sheriff of the county. If he be a party to the suit, or interested in it, then it must be directed to the coroner; or, if he be interested, then to the jailor; or, if all these officers be interested, then to any constable; and a summons or an order for a provisional remedy may, at the request of the party in whose behalf it is issued, be directed to any one of the officers above named, if he be not a party to nor interested in the action.

It was held in the case of Menderson v. Specker, 79 Ky. 509, that an attachment must be executed by the officer to whom it is directed, and that it cannot be executed by any officer to whom it might have been directed, as is specially provided by section 47 of the Code as to a summons. The word "process," as used in the Code, includes an execution. It was so decided in the case of Gowdy v. Sanders, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 912, where it is also held that an execution from a circuit court or a court of like jurisdiction must be directed to the sheriff, unless he be a party to the action, or interested in it, and that it must be directed to the officer by whom it is to be executed. The return by the coroner, therefore, upon the appellants' execution is a nullity. He had no right to handle it. It was not directed to him, and could be executed only by the officer to whom it was directed. It results, therefore, that there was in fact no return of nulla bona to support this action. This objection has not been waived by the appellees. It was raised in the lower court, and insisted upon in the answer. It is therefore available here, and the judgment must be and is affirmed.

The rule is that notice arising from a bill filed is notice of what that bill contains and nothing more, and should not be extended beyond the property which is the subject of the suit. If land is affected by collateral proceedings in a cause where the bill itself does not affect it, actual notice of such proceedings must be proven to charge a purchaser. Griffith v. Griffith, Hoffm. 159, 6 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1130; Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. 365; Frakes v. Brown, 3 Blackf. 296; Edmonds v. Crenshaw, 1 McCord, Eq. 264.

Lis pendens affects a purchaser with constructive notice of all the facts that are apparent on the face of the pleadings at the time he takes his deed, and of such other facts, as those facts necessarily put him upon inquiry for, and as such inquiry, pursued with ordinary diligence and prudence, would bring to his knowledge. *Jones v. BILL in equity to procure cancellation of certain mortgage sales and to compel a transfer of the mortgages to the owner of the mortgaged premises, or to redeem the premises from the sales. On demurrer to bill. Sustained.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Plaintiffs. John E. Lester, Amasa M. Eaton and Herbert Almy for complainants.

Defendant. Mr. James M. Ripley for respondent, the Citizens' Savings Bank.

Respondents. Simon S. Lapham, Charles H. Salisbury and Daniel W. Fink for the other respondents.

Durfee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill shows that John K. Lester, late of Providence, died January 20, 1880, leaving a will by which he devised the larger part of his homestead estate, subject to certain conditions, to his son John Erasmus Lester; that said homestead estate, when said John K. died, was subject to two mortgages, for $3,000 each, given to the Mechanics' Savings Bank, one dated September 10, 1875, and the other March 2, 1876, that said bank transferred them, August 18, 1884, to the Citizens' Savings Bank; that September 29, 1888, said Citizens' Savings Bank advertised said homestead estate for sale on October 20, 1888, under the powers in said mortgage; and that, previous thereto, said John Erasmus Lester had conveyed his interest in said estate to the complainant Julia J. Holland. This bill was filed October 19, 1888. It set forth that said Julia had offered to pay said Citizens' Savings Bank the amount due on the mortgages and expenses, provided the Bank would assign the mortgages to her, or to some person named by her, but that the Bank had refused to do so. The bill repeated the offer, and prayed that the Bank might be compelled to accede to it, and also that the sale might be enjoined. The complainant prayed for a preliminary injunction, which the court denied. The bill also showed that John K. Lester died leaving other real estate, likewise mortgaged, and two other sons, to one of whom, James C.

Lester by name, he devised, subject to certain conditions, besides other real estate, that portion of the homestead estate which he did not devise to said John Erasmus, so that the two $3,000 mortgages covered the estate devised to said John Erasmus, and overlapped upon that which was devised to said James C. Lester. The bill as originally filed set forth certain complications, which it alleged had arisen in the settlement of the estate, affecting the rights of said John Erasmus and the said Julia, his grantee, making it difficult for her to pay off the mortgages, and, at the same time, important for her to have them assigned to her. The bill has been amended, and as amended sets forth that the homestead estate was sold at mortgagee's sale October 20, 1888, to one Orrin E. Jones, and afterwards was conveyed by him to one Rowell O. Whitney. Jones and Whitney have been made parties to the bill as amended. The bill now asks that the sales may be canceled, and that said Julia may have said mortgages transferred to her on paying the amount due thereon, or that she may be allowed to redeem. The Bank has demurred to the bill generally for want of equity, and the case is before us on said demurrer.

The amended bill sets forth reasons for relief not set forth in the original bill; but it alleges nothing to show that the sale, as such, was improperly conducted. The purchaser, therefore, acquired a good legal title to the estate, and communicated it to his grantee; and the grantee, as legal owner, is entitled to hold the estate, unless the complainant Julia can show some equity which gives her a right, as against him, to the relief prayed for. But she can have no equity against him unless he and his grantor had notice thereof when they purchased. The amended bill simply avers, in regard to Jones, the purchaser at the mortgagee's sale, that he had notice of the pendency of this bill, which means, of course, the bill before it was amended, the amendment having been made since the sale. The averment in regard to Whitney, the present owner, is that he purchased with notice of the complainant's rights. The averment is very general. Story, Eq. Pl. § 262.

But, whatever notice Whitney may have had, he would take the estate subject only to the equities which it was subject to in the hands of his grantor, who, as we have seen, is simply alleged to have had notice of the pendency of the bill as originally filed. The question, then, supposing such notice sufficient, is whether the bill as originally filed disclosed equities entitling said Julia to the relief now prayed for.

We will first consider whether the bill as originally filed showed that the said Julia had any right to have the mortgages assigned to her upon paying to the holder the amount due thereon, together with the expenses incurred by the holder in advertising, etc. The rule which is the more generally recognized is that a mortgagee cannot be required to assign the mortgage upon receiving the amount due thereon unless the person making payment is entitled to such assignment for some equitable reason, but can only be required to release or discharge the debt and mortgage, or, if the person making payment prefers, to surrender them to him, uncanceled. This is because the mortgagee, like any other creditor, is not under any obligation to sell and transfer his claim to another, but is only under obligation to accept payment thereof when duly tendered, and because he is entitled, under his mortgage, if the debt is not paid as stipulated, to sell the estate for its payment, or to foreclose in some other mode, as provided by law. Chadler v. Millard, 18 R. L. 401; Butler v. Taylor, 8 Gray, 455; Lamson v. Drake, 105 Mass. 804; Lamb v. Montague, 119 Mass. 853; Hamilton v. Dobbs, 10 N. J. Eq. 227; Bigelow v. Comstock, 20 N. J. Eq. 557; Gatwood v. Gatwood, 75 Va. 407; Chase v. Williams, 74 Mo. 430; Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 80.

The question, then, is, What is such a reason as will give a right to the assignment, and does any such apply in favor of said Julia? The cases hold that a surety paying the debt is entitled to have the mortgage assigned to him, and it has been said that the equity would likewise reach to anyone else personally bound to pay the debt by reason of a similar relation to it. Gatwood v. Gatwood, supra.

And so, doubtless, the mortgagee might become subject to the equity by reason of his own contract or conduct. Further than this we do not find that the cases, except in New York, admit the equity, their doctrine being that where two or more persons are interested in mortgaged property subject to the mortgage, and one of them pays the mortgage debt for his own protection, he is entitled, not to have the mortgage assigned to him, but simply to succeed to the lien of the mortgage against the others in equity, to the extent of his claim against them for indemnity, by way of subrogation. This seems to us to be the correct doctrine. The right of the mortgagee originates in the mortgage; and we do not see how, on principle, after the mortgage has been given, any other person, by acquiring an interest in the mortgaged property, can acquire an equity against him at variance with his right, so long as he himself does nothing to create it. 2 Jones, Mort. §§ 1096, 1097.

The bill as originally filed shows only two grounds on which the complainant Julia could claim to have the mortgages assigned to her, namely, first, because the mortgages cover other property than her own; and, second, because certain complications set forth in the bill had arisen in the settlement of the mortgagor's estate. But said divided ownership and said complications are both matters arising after the mortgages were given, and matters with which, so far as appeared by said bill, neither the original mortgagee nor its assignee, the Citizens' Savings Bank, had had anything to do. The bill as originally filed, therefore, did not show any equitable ground on which said Julia was entitled to have the mortgages assigned to her.

The said Julia contends that she is entitled, if not to have the mortgages assigned to her, to redeem them, notwithstanding the sale. She admits that when she filed her bill, and when the sale occurred, she had not paid, or tendered payment of, the mortgage notes then overdue; but her claim is that no tender was necessary, because the Bank, then holding the mortgages, prevented her making tender by informing her that payment of the two $8,000 mortgages would not be received unless she also paid a mortgage for $8,000 given to the Bank by James C. Lester aforementioned, after his father's death, upon the portion of the estate devised to him by his father's will, and therefore covering a part of the homestead estate covered by said two mortgages. If this was so, the effect was, in our opinion, not to defeat the power of sale, but only to make the sale under it offensive and inequitable on the part of the Bank; and a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, would still get a good title. For the purchaser to be affected, he must have had notice. Jenkins v. Jones, 2 Giff. 10; Montague v. Dames, 12 Allen, 307; Oranston v. Oran, 37 Mass. 430.

The question is, therefore, whether the bill as originally filed gave such notice, notice in no other form being alleged. We do not find that it did. It made no mention of the mortgage for $8,000, the same being first set forth in one of the amendments. It did not allege any previous tender or even offer of payment, simply as such, but only an offer to pay the amount due on the mortgages for an assignment of them. It is not clear that the bill itself offered payment unconditionally, though it contained a formal prayer to redeem. Of course, the mere pendency of a bill to redeem would not suspend the power, for that would defeat the purpose of the power, which is to avoid the delay of a suit. Adams v. Scott, 7 Week. Rep. 218, 2 Jones, Mort. § 1797.

We do not think the said Julia is entitled to redeem as against the present owner for the second ground assigned.

The said Julia claims a right to redeem on another ground, namely, a perversion of the mortgage power to purposes for which it was not given. The power is given to the mortgagee for the purpose of enabling him to collect his debt more readily than he could by suit, and if, instead of using it for that purpose, he attempts to use it from an ill motive, to oppress the debtor, or to acquire the property himself, or to serve the purposes of others, the court considers it a fraud upon the power, and may enjoin the sale, or, if the sale has been made, may set it aside, in a proper case. 2 Jones, Mort. § 1801; Robertson v. Norris, 1 Giff. 431; Foster v. Hughes, 51 How. Pr. 20.

But it is a delicate matter for the court to interfere on this ground, where the mortgagee is acting within the letter of his power, and, to warrant it, the perversion should be very clearly and specifically alleged. 2 Jones, Mort. § 1804; Vaughan v. Marable, 64 Ala. 60.

Of course, it does not follow, because some advantage may accrue to the mortgagee from the sale besides the payment of the debt, or because an advantage may incidentally accrue to others, that the power is perverted; and the mortgagee cannot be required to forego the exercise of it simply for that reason. 2 Jones, Mort. § 1802.

The bill as originally filed set forth that John K. Lester, when he died, was indebted to his son John Erasmus in about $21,000; that James C. became executor of the will; and that, as such, and as devisee under it, he procured from John Erasmus a release of said John's claims against the estate in consideration of an agreement on his part to pay to said John certain sums of money, and to deliver to said John the portion of the estate devised to him, at the time appointed by the will for delivery, freed from the mortgages; that said James paid said money in part, but died before carrying out the rest of said agreement; that Warren R. Perce, one of the defendants, who survived him in the administration, has refused to complete carrying it out; and that said Julia has brought suit in equity against him to compel him to carry it out. The bill also set forth that said Perce had collected the rents of the estate to a large amount, and that, though having money enough to pay the interest on the mortgages, he had refused to do so, and suffered the estate to be advertised for sale under them, and that said Julia "is informed and believes, and therefore charges it to be true, that said Perce and others and said Bank have combined together for the purpose of allowing said property to be sold under said mortgages, and thereby defeat the purposes of said former bill brought against said Perce and others."

The charge, it will be observed, is not that the Bank either sold or intended to sell under the mortgage for the purpose of defeating said suit, but that said Perce and others and the Bank combined together for the purpose of allowing the sale to be made, and thereby defeating the suit. It is not clear how far the charge was intended to affect the Bank; for certainly the Bank had no need to combine with any person for the purpose of allowing itself to sell under the mortgages after default. It is not such a charge as would entitle the complainants to relief against the Bank or the present owner; nor can it, in our opinion, amount to notice. For either purpose, it should be more direct and determinate. It is, at best, a mere averment on information and belief, with nothing definite alleged to substantiate it. Indeed, the counsel for the complainants rely in support of this point rather on matter set forth in the amendments than on said charge; but, inasmuch as there is no allegation that the purchaser at the mortgage sale had notice thereof, we have not considered the sufficiency of the matter so set forth.

The demurrer is sustained.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

William HAMSHER, Appt.,

v.

Anna HAMSHER et al.

(.....III.....)

1. A Young Men's Christian Association

not exercising any ecclesiastical control over its members, or prescribing any form of worship for them, or subjecting them to any discipline for failure to conform to its rules, is not a corporation "formed for religious purposes," i. e., for purposes of religious worship, so as to be forbidden by the Corporation Act of 1872 to acquire more than ten acres of land. The association contemplates benevolent and missionary work rather than religious worship.

2. The power of a corporation to acquire and hold title to certain real estate cannot be questioned by any party except the State, where it has power to hold real estate for some purposes.

(March 31, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant William Hamsher from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Macon County dismissing his cross-bill setting up a right in himself to certain lands of which partition was sought by the original bill. Affirmed.

David F. Hamsher, the husband of Anna Hamsher and son of William Hamsher, died testate, February 15, 1889, seized, inter alia, of 180 acres of farm land.

His will, after making a number of special bequests, devised to the board of directors of the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur all the estate then remaining.

The widow and father were the only surviving heirs and next of kin of decedent. The widow renounced under the will and elected to take the one half of all of decedent's property which would remain after payment of debts.

Anna Hamsher in her own right and as executrix, together with Milton Johnson, her co-executor, filed a bill asking that homestead be set off to the widow and that the remainder of the real estate be divided between the widow and executors so that she might have the moiety going to her and the executors might retain the other moiety for the purposes and trusts of the will.

William Hamsher, who had been given an annuity out of the income of the estate, and the other beneficiaries under the will, were made parties defendant. William Hamsher answered and filed a cross bill claiming that the devise to the Christian Association was void and that the land so devised descended to him as heir; that he was tenant in common with the widow of all the real estate; and praying that partition might be made between himself and the widow.

The court dismissed the cross-bill and entered a decree as prayed in the original bill, and William Hamsher thereupon took this appeal. Messrs. Bunn & Park for appellant. Messrs. Isaac R. Mills, Andrew H. Mills and W. C. Outten, for appellees:

The Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., does not come within the limitation of § 42, chap. 82, Ill. Stat. (1 Starr & C. Stat. p. 623), for the reason that it is evident from its organization that it is a corporation of the class "not for pecuniary profit," and because its purposes are, as shown by its charter, educational, humanitarian and charitable rather than those of religious worship.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees in this case make many points, some of which may be stated as follows: First, that the appellant has not, and never can have, a vested interest in the lands in controversy, but that the title, possession and control of the interest claimed by him is vested in the executors, and remains there until after his death; second, that appellant is not a tenant in common with appellee Anna Hamsher, the widow of the deceased, and therefore not entitled to the partition prayed for in his cross bill, but that the widow, as owner in fee of one half of the lands by virtue of her renunciation and election, and the executors, as being vested with the title in fee of the other half by operation of the will, are tenants in common, and the only parties entitled to partition; third, that the right of the board of directors of the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur to receive and hold so much of the real estate devised by item 11 of the will as exceeds in quantity ten acres can only be called in question by the State in a direct proceeding; fourth, that the appellant, by accepting the bequest of $500 per year to himself during his life, is estopped from setting up any right of his own that will defeat the full effect and operation of every part of the will; fifth, that the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., does not come within that class of religious corporations which are forbidden by our Statute to receive by devise more than ten acres of land, including land already held. As the view which we take of the fifth and last point disposes of the material issues involved in the cause, we do not deem it necessary to decide either of the other positions taken by counsel for appellees.

David P. Hamsher died testate, leaving no child, or descendants of a child. His surviving wife, Anna Hamsher, by reason of her renunciation and election under sections 11-13 of the Dower Act, is entitled to take one half of all the real and personal estate, subject to the payment of debts. The theory of the cross bill filed by the appellant in the court below is that item 11 of the will attempts to devise to the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., 160 acres of land, reduced by such renunciation and election of the widow to an undivided one half of 160 acres of land; that such devise is void under section 43 of our Act Concerning Corporations, which is hereinafter set forth; that, by reason of the void character of the devise, the land embraced in it must be regarded as intestate estate, and belongs to the appellant, as the father and sole surviving heir of the deceased testator. Assuming the contention of the appellant to be correct,—that the will devises to the association in question land exceeding ten acres in quantity, including that already held by the association,—we are brought to the consideration of the question whether or not the association can hold the land so devised. Section 43 of the "Act Concerning Corporations," approved April 18, 1872, in force July 1, 1872 (Starr & C. Stat. 639; Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 29, § 43), is as follows: "Any corporation that may be formed for religious purposes under this Act, or under any law of this State, for the incorporation of religious societies, may receive, by gift, devise or purchase, land not exceeding in quantity, including that already held by such corporation, ten acres, and may erect or build thereon such houses, buildings or other improvements as it may deem necessary for the convenience and comfort of such congregation, church or society, and may lay out and maintain thereon a burying-ground; but no such property shall be used except in the manner expressed in the gift, grant or devise, or, if no use or trust is so expressed, except for the benefit of the congregation, church or society for which it was intended."

From an examination of the sections which precede, and of those which follow, section 43, it becomes manifest that the corporations intended to be designated by the latter section are those churches, congregations or societies which are organized for the purposes of "religious worship." Sections from 29 to 34, inclusive, of the Act, have reference to "corporations not for pecuniary profit," providing for the mode of their organization, defining the nature and extent of their powers, specifying the methods of electing their trustees, of effecting their dissolution, of distributing their property, of changing their articles of association, etc. Sections from 35 to 46, inclusive, have reference to "religious corporations." Section 35 begins as follows: "The foregoing provisions shall not apply to any religious corporations; but any church, congregation or society formed for the purpose of religious worship may become incorporated in the manner following, to wit,"

The mode of organizing such a religious corporation is essentially different from that prescribed for organizing a corporation "not for pecuniary profit." In the latter case, three or more persons desiring "to associate themselves for any lawful purpose other than for pecuniary profit," are required to file a certificate of incorporation with the Secretary of State, and to pay a fee of $100. In the former case, the association must first be organized as a church, congregation or society, and then may become incorporated in the manner following, to wit:

The mode of organizing such a religious corporation is essentially different from that prescribed for organizing a corporation "not for pecuniary profit." In the latter case, three or more persons desiring "to associate themselves for any lawful purpose other than for pecuniary profit," are required to file a certificate of incorporation with the Secretary of State, and to pay a fee of $100. In the former case, the association must first be organized as a church, congregation or society, and then may become incorporated in the manner following, to wit:

lary profit" make a certificate stating the name of the association, its business, the objects of its formation, the number and names of its trustees, managers or directors, etc., and file such certificate with the secretary of the State, who thereupon issues a certificate of organization, etc. But, in the organization of the religious corporations referred to in the Statute, the church, congregation or society holds a meeting, and elects or appoints two or more of its members "as trustees, wardens and vestrymen," etc., and adopts a corporate name; and when the chairman or secretary of the meeting has made, and filed in the recorder's office of the county, an affidavit as to the holding of such meeting, and its action as aforesaid, the body politic and corporate is created. The words "such congregation, church or society," as used in sections 36, 41, 43 and 46, refer back to section 36, where the "church, congregation or society," intended to be designated, is described as being "formed for the purpose of religious worship."

The view here expressed has been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In Gilmer v. Stone, 180 U. S. 386 (30 L. ed. 714), that court had occasion to construe the section (43) now under consideration, and Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion in that case, used the following language: "The counsel for the plaintiff in error seem to lay stress upon the more general words, 'formed for religious purposes,' in the 43d section of the Act; but, manifestly, the other parts of the same section, and previous sections, show that the only corporations intended to be restricted in the ownership of land to ten acres were those formed for the purpose of 'religious worship,' and not organizations commonly called 'benevolent' or 'missionary' societies."

It now becomes necessary to inquire whether or not the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., is a corporation organized for the purpose of "religious worship." If it is not such a corporation, then the Legislature, whether wisely or unwisely, has failed to place any restriction upon its receiving, by "gift, devise or purchase," a quantity of land greater than ten acres. The best evidence of the purposes of its formation is the declaration of such purposes as found in its charter or articles of association. These articles are made a part of the cross-bill, and attached thereto as an exhibit. They consist of a certificate, in writing, made, signed and acknowledged as required by section 30 of the Corporation Act, and of a certificate of organization issued by the secretary of state in accordance with section 30 of that Act. From the very nature of these articles, it is apparent that the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., was organized as a corporation "not for pecuniary profit." If it had been organized under the Act as a "religious corporation," the evidence of its incorporation would not be such articles of association as are above described, but would be the affidavit, or a certified copy thereof, mentioned in sections 35 and 36. We agree with counsel for appellant that a corporation whose purpose is to engage in "religious worship" cannot circumvent the statutory restriction of its ownership of land to ten acres by effecting its organization under the sections in relation to corporations "not for pecuniary profit." Hence its character is to be determined not so much by the mode of its formation, as by the object and purposes of its formation. The written certificate filed with the secretary of state states, among other things, that "the name of such corporation is 'The Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Illinois.' The object for which it is formed is to promote growth in grace and Christian fellowship among its members, and aggressive Christian work, especially by and for young men, and to seek out and aid the worthy poor. The management of the aforesaid association shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of the officers of said association and one active member from each religious denomination represented in said association, who are to be elected annually."

It is manifest, from the provision thus made for the composition of the board of directors, that the association is not under the control of one religious denomination, but is made up of representatives from a number of such denominations, while the corporation, which is forbidden by section 43 to receive more than ten acres of ground, is one which embodies the ideas and principles of a single religious or ecclesiastical organization. The written certificate of the association does not state, in express terms, that it is formed "for the purpose of religious worship," nor can we say that the objects of its formation as declared in such certificate are necessarily the equivalents of certain forms of religious worship.

Webster defines "worship" to be "the act of paying honors to the Supreme Being; religious reverence and homage; adoration paid to God, or a Being viewed as God." The association in question seems, however, to contemplate a practical missionary and benevolent work, not only among its own members, but among the young and the poor who may need help outside of its membership. The object for which it was formed, according to the description of such object in its articles of association, does not approach so nearly the definition of "religious worship" as do the announced objects of the two societies mentioned in Gilmer v. Stone, supra. There it appeared that a board of foreign missions was formed "for the purpose of establishing and conducting Christian missions among the unevangelized or pagan nations, and the general diffusion of Christianity," and that a board of home missions had for its object "to assist in sustaining the preaching of the gospel in feeble churches," etc., and "to superintend the whole of home missions in the behalf" of certain churches, and "to receive . . . and disburse . . . funds . . . for home missionary purposes;" and it was there held that neither of said boards was "a church, congregation or society formed for the purpose of religious worship."

It does not appear that the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur, Ill., exercises any ecclesiastical control over its members, or prescribes any form of worship for them, or subjects those who fail to conform to its rules to ecclesiastical discipline. Therefore a limitation upon the extent of its ownership of real estate is not so imperatively demanded by those considerations of public policy which apply to corporations formed for the purpose of public worship. We are of the opinion that said association is not subject to the restriction contained in section 42 of the Corporation Act, and that the devise to it of a greater quantity of land than ten acres is not invalid. It follows that the appellant takes nothing as heir, and that his cross-bill was properly dismissed.

Counsel for appellant claim that, even if the association was properly organized as a corporation "not for pecuniary profit," it can only take and hold so much real estate as is necessary for the purposes of its organization, and that the will gives it more land than it needs for such purposes. By section 31 of the Corporation Act, corporations "not for pecuniary profit" are made capable, in law, "of taking, purchasing, holding and disposing of real estate and personal estate for purposes of their organization." Such corporations are thus clothed with the capacity of holding real estate. If the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur "has exceeded in extent its power of holding real estate, appellant, we conceive, cannot take advantage of the fact." Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 63.

Where a corporation may, for some purposes, acquire and hold the title to real estate, it cannot be made a question by any party, except the State, whether the real estate has been acquired for the authorized uses or not. Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 214.

There being capacity to purchase or to receive by devise, whether the corporation, in so purchasing or receiving, exceeds its power, is a question between it and the State, and does not concern appellant. Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 444.

We perceive no error in the record.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN &
SOUTHERN R. CO., Appt.,

v.

(Ark.)

1. The title to lands covered by rivers which are navigable in fact is in the State, whether the tide ebbs and flows in them or not; hence the holder, under a United States patent of land bordering on such river, cannot maintain an action to recover damages for the removal of gravel from the river bed in front of his land below high-water mark.

2. High-water mark or the dividing line between the proprietors of lands bordering on a navigable stream and the State is the point beyond which the presence and action of water are so common and usual and so long continued in all ordinary years as to mark upon the soil a character distinct from that of the banks in respect to vegetation as well as in respect to the soil itself.

3. A gravel bar in a river bed which is covered by the ordinary stage of high water, at which time steamers pass over it in safety, but which is bare at low water, upon which no vegetation grows and which is not covered by soil, is the property of the State and not of the riparian proprietor.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Independence County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover the value of certain gravel removed by defendant from a river bed and alleged to belong to plaintiffs. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellant;

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees, being the owners, as tenants in common, by inheritance from an ancestor, who derived title under a patent from the United States Government, of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 21, T. 13, N. R. 6 W., on the bank of and bordering on White River, in Independence County, containing according to the patent 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, the patent for which bears date 12th of December, 1828, brought suit against the Railway Company to recover the value of 3088 carloads of gravel, which the appellant took from a gravel bar, which the appellees alleged in their complaint was lying immediately adjacent to and between the high bank and the water in the main channel of White River. They alleged that this bar had formed against said bank by long years of accretion; and that it is not now part of the main or ordinary channel of the river, but it has become a part of their said tract of land by accretion, and lies immediately in front of the same between the banks of said stream.

The appellant answered, admitting the location, as described, of the tract of land, and the taking of the gravel from the bar, but denied that the gravel bar was a part of the tract of land owned by the plaintiffs.

The proof showed that the gravel bar was not a part of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 21, T. 13, N. R. 6 W., but that it laid "in the river bed, in front of the tract of land;" that twenty-five years ago the bed of White River ran where the gravel bar now is; that before that time the river ran along the edge of the bank; that the gravel bar had formed slowly for years, that it is not now above the ordinary stage of high water, and is bare at low water, and that a rise in the river of from six to eight feet would cover it; that from ten to fifteen feet is an ordinary high-water rise, and would leave the gravel bar from five to eight feet under the water, that no trees or soil grow on the bar; that the position is this: first, there is a high bank, then a second bottom, then a gravel bar, and then the water; that the second bottom is five or six feet higher than the bar; that any year, at some time, the water in the river rises from fifteen to twenty-two feet; that in ordinary high water steamboats can pass right over the gravel bar in controversy; that there is a swag between the gravel bar and the bank, in which minnows have often been caught; that the water often rises over this gravel bar in one night.

The cause was submitted to the jury upon the evidence and instructions of the court, and there was a verdict for appellee, which upon motion by appellant for a new trial the court refused to disturb; whereupon appellant, having saved exceptions to the giving and refusing of instructions by the court, appealed.

The main question to be determined is, how far the ownership of the appellees in the land between the banks of the river, in front of their tract, extends, by virtue of their ownership of the land upon the bank of the river, under the patent from the government of the United States.

At common law, "as a general principle, the soil of ancient navigable rivers, where there is a flux and reflux of the sea, belongs to the crown, and that of other streams to the subject, that is to the owners of adjacent grounds, to each respectively as far as the middle of the stream." Woolrych, Waters, 44.

The ebb and flow of the tide in a river was at common law the most usual test of its navigability, but was not a conclusive test. Woolrych, Waters, 40.

The soil under navigable streams, at common law, belonged to the king as parvus patrie, for the same reason that the waters did, that is as a trust for the public use and benefit. Woolrych, Waters, chaps. 1, 2; Angell, Tide Water, 19-67; Hale, De Jure Maris, cited in, note 6 Cow. 589; Chapman v. Kimball, 9 Conn. 33.

Many of the States of the United States have held to the common-law test of the navigability of rivers, and to the doctrine that only those rivers are navigable in a legal sense in which the tide ebbs and flows; and there has been much discussion and conflict of authority upon this question, a majority in number, perhaps, of the courts of last resort maintaining the common law doctrine. But the more reasonable test, as we conceive, of the navigability of a river is its use as a navigable stream, or its capability of being used as such.

The ebb and flow of the tide is merely an arbitrary test, since many waters where the tide flows are not in fact navigable, and many, especially on this continent, where it does not flow, are navigable.

"It is navigability in fact that forms the foundation for navigability in common law." McManus v. Carmichael, 8 Iowa, 1; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 58 U. S. 12 How. 448 [13 L. ed. 1058].

While in England the ebb and flow of the tide is the most convenient, certain and usual test of the navigability of rivers, as the tide in fact does ebb and flow in all its navigable rivers,—it is wholly inapplicable in this country, where there are large fresh-water rivers thousands of miles long, flowing almost across the entire continent, bearing upon their bosom the commerce of the outside world in part, as well as of the continent.

The largest river in England, the Thames, is only about 260 miles, and the Severn is only about 210 miles, in length.

If we apply the principle of the common law, that the soil under the navigable waters belongs to the sovereign for the benefit and use of the public, and are not governed by the common-law test of the navigability of streams, but by their navigability in fact, we are constrained to maintain that the true doctrine is, that the beds of navigable rivers belong to the government, notwithstanding the tide does not ebb and flow in them.

In Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212 [11 L. ed. 565], it is held that "the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution of the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively; and that the new States have the same rights, sovereignty and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States; and Mr. Justice McKinley, delivering the opinion of the court, at page 229 [573], says: "Then to Alabama belong the navigable waters and the soils under them, in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States;" and on page 230 [574] he says: "To give to the United States the right to transfer to a citizen the title to the shores and the soils under the navigable waters would be placing in their hands a weapon which might be wielded greatly to the injury of the state sovereignty, and deprive the State of the power to exercise a numerous and important class of police powers."

Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471 [13 L. ed. 220], affirms the doctrine of this case, and holds that the title to the soil in navigable waters below high-water mark is in the State.

In the case of McManus v. Carmichael, supra, the court said: "By the Acts of the United States relating to the survey and sale of the public lands (see Act of May 10, 1790, etc.), also the laws establishing the general land office, it is well known that the whole bed of navigable rivers is excepted from the surveys, and that the lands of the United States are sold with reference to the plats and field notes of the survey."

It is also held in the same case that the rule that grants are to be construed most strongly against the grantor does not apply to public grants; but that the government being but a trustee for the public, its grants are to be construed strictly. This is familiar law.

In Midleton v. Pritchard, 4 Ill. 510, Mr. Justice Willes in a dissenting opinion says, in regard to the sale of lands by the government: "The land authorized to be sold, and the mode of selling it, are prescribed by law, and all sales in violation of that are void. These surveys and plats are the guides of the land officers in making their sales; they have no authority to sell a single acre that has not been surveyed."

In Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 334 [24 L. ed. 234], Mr. Justice Bradley in discussing this question says, on page 336 [227]: "In this country, as a general thing, all waters are deemed navigable which are really so," and on page 338 [228] he says: "In our view of the subject the correct principles are laid down in Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 367 [10 L. ed. 997]; Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212 [11 L. ed. 565], and Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471 [13 L. ed. 220]. These cases relate to tide water, it is true, but they enunciate principles which are equally applicable to all navigable waters. And since this court in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 58 U. S. 12 How. 448 [13 L. ed. 1058], has declared that the great lakes and other navigable waters of the country, above as well as below the flow of the tide, are in the strictest sense entitled to the denomination of navigable waters, and amenable to the admiralty jurisdiction, (there seems to be no sound reason for adhering to the old rule as to the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such waters. It properly belongs to the States, by their inherent sovereignty; and the United States has wisely abstained from extending (if it could extend) its survey and grants beyond the limit of high water. The cases in which this court has seemed to hold a contrary view depended on the local laws of the State in which the lands were situated."

But it is necessary to a full understanding of the rights of a riparian owner and of the public in the lands between the banks of a river to determine the legal meaning of the phrase "high water."

It does not mean, as has been sometimes supposed, the line reached by the great annual rises, regardless of the character of the lands subject at such times to be overflowed. But, as decided in the case of Houghton v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 870: "High-water mark is the line between the riparian proprietor and the public,—to be regarded as co-ordinate with the limit of the river bed."

Whatever difficulty there may be in determining it in places, this doubtless may be said: "What the river does not occupy long enough to revert from vegetation, so far as to destroy its value for agriculture, is not river bed."

In Howard v. Ingorsoll, 54 U. S. 18 How. 389

[14 L. ed. 189]. Mr. Justice Curtis gave a satisfactory definition of the banks and bed of a river. He says: "The banks of a river are those elevations of land which confine the waters when they rise out of the bed; and the bed is that soil so usually covered by water as to be distinguishable from the banks or both, produced by the common presence and action of flowing water. But neither the line of ordinary high-water mark or ordinary low-water mark, nor of a middle stage of water can be assumed as the line dividing the bed from the banks. This line is to be found by examining the bed and banks, and ascertaining where the presence and action of water are so common and usual, and so long continued in all ordinary years, as to mark upon the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks, in respect to vegetation, as well as in respect to the nature of the soil itself. Whether this line between the bed and the banks will be found above or below or at a middle stage of water, must depend upon the character of the stream."

"But, in all cases, the bed of a river is a natural object, and is to be sought for, not merely by the application of any abstract rules, but as other natural objects are sought for and found, by the distinctive appearances they present, the banks being fast land on which vegetation appropriate to such land in the particular locality grows wherever the bank is not too steep to permit such growth, and the bed being soil of a different character and having no vegetation, or only such as exists where commonly submerged in water."

The owner of land on the margin of a navigable stream in this State holding under a grant from the United States government, does not take ad medium flum aqua, but to high-water mark, as limited and defined above, and the beds of all navigable rivers in the State belong to the State, in trust for the use of the public. Was this gravel bar an accretion to appellee's land?

Accretion to land on a stream navigable or unnavigable belongs to the owner of land; therefore, if appellee's contention that this bar has become a part of his land by accretion has been maintained, the judgment of the circuit court is correct. Warren v. Chambers, 25 Ark. 120; New Orleans v. United States, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 662 [9 L. ed. 578]; Jones v. Souland, 65 U. S. 24 How. 41 [16 L. ed. 204]; Saulet v. Shepherd, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 503 [18 L. ed. 442]; Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, § 3, p. 87, and cases cited. Accretion is the increase of real estate, by the addition of portions of soil by gradual deposition through the operation of natural causes, to that already in possession of the owner. The term "alluvion" is applied to the deposit itself, while accretion rather denotes the act. 8 Washb. Real Prop. 60, 61; Bouvier, Law Dict., title, Accretion; Woolrych, Water, lateral p. 29.

Fleta says: "We acquire a right to things, according to the Law of Nations, by accession. That which a stream has added to our land by alluvion, for instance, belongs to us by virtue of the same law." Fleta, liber 8, chap. 2, § 6.

Does the testimony in this case show that the gravel bar is alluvion added to the land of the appellees by accretion? We think not; on the contrary the evidence shows that the gravel bar is a part of the bed of White River within the above definition.

BUETER, App't.

(....S. D....)

*1. In this case the evidence examined, and held, to sustain the allegation of respondent that she executed the articles of separation between herself and her husband, appellant herein, under menace, entitling her to rescind, and to support the judgment of the court below in annulling and setting the same aside.

2. In this State a wife, justified by her husband's misconduct towards her in living separate from him, may maintain an independent action against him for her support, without regard to the question of divorce.

3. In such an action, if the wife is destitute, the court has power to include in its judgment an allowance of attorney's fees, as necessities for the wife.

(April 1, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lawrence County in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to set aside certain articles of separation and to obtain an allowance for support and maintenance and for counsel fees. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Granville G. Bennett for appellant.

Messrs. McLaughlin & Steele for respondent.

Kellam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by respondent against appellant in the District Court of Lawrence County, to set aside and annul certain articles of separation between said parties, who are husband and wife, and for other specific relief, hereinafter noticed, alleging in her complaint that she signed the articles reluctantly and unwillingly, under menace and duress exercised towards her by appellant; that she revoked and renounced said articles of separation, and claims all her rights as the lawful wife of appellant, and offers to return and be reconciled to him wherever it will be safe for her to do so. The complaint further charges extreme and repeated acts of violence towards respondent for a long time before and at the time of signing such articles; alleges that she is old, infirm and destitute; and that appellant is in possession of all the property accumulated by their joint industry and economy. The other specific relief asked for was a decree requiring the appellant to pay her monthly a reasonable allowance for her support, and a reasonable sum as attorney's fees and expenses of the action. The appellant answered, denying all the allegations of ill treatment and violence, and of menace and duress as to the execution of the articles of separation, and set up such articles as a defense to the action. Upon the trial the court decreed the articles of separation null and void, because obtained from respondent by menace and duress; and, further, that appellant should pay to respondent, or to the clerk of the court for her use, for her support and maintenance, the sum of $40 per month, until the further order of the court, and the sum of $150 for attorney's fees in the action. From this judgment and decree the appellant appeals.

All the alleged errors which are brought to the attention of this court by the assignment and the record may be considered under two distinct heads: (1) Is the evidence sufficient to support and justify the court in its decree setting aside and annulling the articles of separation between appellant and respondent? and, if so, (2) Had the court jurisdiction to entertain so much of this action as sought to compel appellant to make an allowance for the support of respondent?

Does the evidence show that these articles of separation were executed by respondent under the coercion of menace and duress? "Duress" is declared by our Statute (§ 3504, Comp. Laws) to consist in (1) unlawful confinement of the person of the party, or of husband or wife of such party, or of an ancestor, descendant or adopted child of such party, husband or wife; (2) unlawful detention of the property of any such person; or (3) confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained, or fraudulently made unjustly harassing or oppressive.

By section 3505, menace consists in a threat (1) of such duress as is specified in the first and third subdivisions of the last section; (2) of unlawful and violent injury to the person or property of any such person as is specified in the last section; or (3) of injury to the character of any such person.

Much of the evidence tending to show violent and active cruelty towards respondent by appellant did not immediately connect such acts with the execution of this agreement. Indeed, many of them occurred months before, and had no relation to the agreement, or its execution, and can only be considered in connection with their probable, or, rather, inevitable, effect upon respondent, in inspiring a fear of their repetition. A woman who had never known or felt her husband's hand in violence against her would doubtless be less moved by an angry threat than one who, remembering the experience of the past, would at once connect the threat with its execution, and instinctively measure its meaning by the recollection of the bruises she had before received. The testimony of the respondent, Margaret Bueter, Mrs. Rewman, her daughter, and at least five or six other witnesses, establishes beyond doubt the violent and wicked conduct of appellant towards respondent. He had himself educated her to know and appreciate the force and meaning of his threats. The proof of his general ill treatment of respondent is so abundant and convincing that we shall not refer to it in detail. In the examination of respondent, the following questions and answers occur:

Q. What was his conduct just before that [signing articles of separation], for some days, towards you?

A. Cruelness, meanness and violence. He kicked me with his boots that I was black and blue all over, days and days before,—you might say for months.

Q. What was the last time before signing; how long before?

A. That same morning.

Q. (By the Court.) Did he make any threats against you?

A. Yes, sir; he did.

Q. (By the same.) In order to make you sign it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. (By the same.) What threats did he make against you? Did he threaten to do any violence to you if you did not sign it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. (By the same.) What did he say?

A. He knocked me down, and kicked me.

Q. (By the same.) Did he kick you because you would not sign this writing?

A. Yes, sir; that is what he did.

We make the following extract from the testimony of Mrs. Rewman:

Q. What took place between them as to the signing of that [articles of separation] in your presence?

A. I know he abused her when she said she would not sign it.

Q. What do you mean by abuse?

A. Well, he slapped her, and pulled her around.

Q. Do you know who brought these articles of separation to the house?

A. No, sir; I do not. I first saw them—papers handed them to me, and asked me to read them to mamma. I read them to her. I started to read them. I don't know whether I finished them or not; and she said she would not sign them at the time I read it. My mother cannot read English writing. I don't think I finished reading them. I read them over half through, though. She listened to it, and she said she wouldn't sign them, and did not care to hear any more after she had heard half of it.

Q. Tell the judge why she signed the articles after her expressing her unwillingness.

A. Because there was not any peace at home unless she would sign them,—to make peace she signed them. There would be no peace at the house unless she signed them.

Q. (By the Court.) How long after they were brought to the house was it before she signed them?

A. It was two or three days. I think he brought them here on Tuesday, and they were signed on Thursday, I think.

Q. During the interval from the time they came to the house until they were signed by your mother, state what you know about any pressure being brought to bear upon her, either by violence or otherwise, to induce her to sign them.

A. I know he kicked her once when they quarreled about her not signing the paper, and she said she would not sign it, and in the evening of that night, before she signed them, they were quarrelling, and he slapped her, and abused her.

Q. What was the condition of your mother at the time she signed the paper? Was she in good health or unwell?

A. She was feeling very poorly.

There is considerable other testimony in the same line, though possibly not quite so directly connected with the execution of these papers; and while we are not disposed to limit the force, as evidence, of the certificate of the officer who took respondent's acknowledgment, and while her evidence cannot be taken to impeach his certificate, it strongly corroborates the testimony of respondent and her witnesses as to her reluctance to signing the agreement. He says there was much contention and angry talk between them, and that he must have been there an hour, at least, before she agreed. Without more particular discussion, we content ourselves with saying generally that the evidence bearing upon this immediate question, carefully read and thoughtfully considered, impresses us as it did the trial court; and we are fully convinced that the execution of the articles of separation of April 15, 1884, by the respondent, was caused by threats of bodily injury, and accomplished by menace, as alleged in the complaint.

Having reached the conclusion that the court below was right in annulling the articles of separation, we approach the next question with more reluctance, because it involves a question of jurisdiction never before, to our knowledge, presented to the courts of this State or Territory. The proposition is clean cut, and, plainly stated, is this: Can a wife, justified by the conduct of her husband towards her in leaving her home, maintain an independent action against her husband for her maintenance? And can a court of equity entertain such an action, and by its decree compel the husband to make provision for her support during such separation? It must be conceded that little support is found for such an action in the books of the text-writers, and the adjudications of the courts, in number, at least, preponderate against it. The question is important. It is squarely presented in this case, and it must be answered.

Both at common law and under our Statute the wife is entitled, by virtue of the marriage contract, to support and maintenance from her husband, and he, in turn, is under obligation to supply such support and maintenance, commensurate with his ability, until relieved from such duty, either by the law, or by the voluntary act of the parties to the contract. Comp. Laws, § 2538.

But while this mutual and correlative duty and right, as between husband and wife, have been recognized by the courts from an early day, it was never in the English courts, I think, not even the ecclesiastical, allowed as an independent right or cause of action. It was only asserted and allowed as an incident or appendage to some other proceeding, generally for a divorce.

In Poll v. Montgomery, 3 Ves. Jr. 191, Lord Loughborough said: "I take it to be now the established law that no court, not even the ecclesiastical court, has any original jurisdiction to give a wife a separate maintenance. It is always as incidental to some other matter that she becomes entitled to a separate provision;" and this was probably the nearly uniform holding of the English courts, except that upon supplicavit for security of the peace, against her husband, it was said, in the case just cited, the wife might be allowed a separate maintenance, if necessary that she should live apart from her husband; but even this authority was questioned in subsequent cases, and it is very doubtful, if not altogether improbable, that a case like the one at bar could have been maintained in any of the courts of England.

In Bishop on Marriage and Divorce the author declares that the doctrine and practice of the English courts were strongly against it, and to the same purpose is the declaration of Judge Story in the second volume of his Equity Jurisprudence, § 1422.

An examination of the earlier American cases shows a strong disposition to follow the same rule, but it did not command universal obedience. In an early Virginia case (Perrell v. Perrell, 4 Hen. & M. 507), a broader jurisdiction was asserted; and it was there held that if a husband abandon his wife, and separate himself from her, without any reasonable support, a court of equity may, in all cases, decree her a suitable maintenance and support out of his estate, upon the very ground that there is no adequate or sufficient remedy at law in such a case. Mr. Bishop speaks disapprovingly of the chancellor's conclusion as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity in such a case, but Judge Story says of it: "There is so much good sense and reason in this doctrine that it might be wished it were generally adopted." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1423a.

The same doctrine was again recognized and maintained in Virginia in Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. (Va.) 662.

In South Carolina the same rule as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity is asserted in Prather v. Prather, 4 Deansa, Eq. 33; and later, in the same State, in Rhams v. Rhams, 1 McCord, Eq. 197.

In Alabama the rule is broadly stated, in Glover v. Glover, 16 Ala. 440, to be: "Where a husband abandons his wife without just cause, and casts her upon society destitute of the means of subsistence, a court of chancery, as an original ground of equity, will entertain a bill filed against him for alimony;" and this case was followed in Kinsey v. Kinsey, 37 Ala. 308.

In Butler v. Butler, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 202, this question was elaborately reviewed, and in his opinion Judge Mills says: "Suppose the case of abandonment by the husband, and that the separation is complete, without any sentence, and that the wife is left to the humanity of the world, without support, has the chancellor, without the Statute, or in cases not embraced by it, no authority to direct a portion of the husband's estate to be set apart for the support of the wife, leaving the marriage contract as obligatory as ever? This is a question different from the power of separation, and deserves further consideration. . . . It is clear that strong moral obligations must lie on every husband, who has abandoned his wife, to support her. The marriage contract and every principle binds him to this. To fail to do it is a wrong acknowledged at common law, though that law knows no remedy, because there the wife cannot sue the husband. But in equity the wife can sue the husband, and it is the province of a court of equity to afford remedy where conscience and law acknowledge a right, but know no remedy."

In 1869 this precise question was before the Supreme Court of California, in Galland v. Galland, 88 Cal. 205; and, though the case was decided by a divided court, Judge Crockett, in the prevailing opinion, says: "Whatever reason may have prevailed at common law to induce the courts to withhold their aid from the wife under these circumstances [separation and destitution], none exists in this State why a court of equity should refuse to compel an offending husband to provide out of their common property for the support of an ill used wife, who has been forced to seek protection elsewhere than under the husband's roof."

Again, in Galland v. Galland, 80 Miss. 804, after a very thorough examination of this question, and the cases bearing upon it, the court in its opinion uses this language: "Courts of equity in America will always interpose to redress wrongs when the complainant is without full, adequate and complete remedy at law. Here there is no such process as supplicavit, nor a distinct proceeding for the restitution of the conjugal relation. If a wife is abandoned by her husband without means of support, a bill in equity will lie to compel the husband to support the wife without asking for a decree of divorce."

In the case of Graves v. Graves, reported in 88 Iowa, 810, Judge Cole, delivering the opinion of the court, states the question thus: "The main question involved in the controversy is whether a court of equity has the authority or jurisdiction to entertain an action brought for alimony alone, and to grant such alimony where no divorce or other relief is sought;" and after an examination of the question, and the history of its treatment by the courts, both in England and America, he concludes: "It seems to us that, upon well settled equity principles, as well as upon considerations of public policy, the action may be maintained without asking a divorce or other relief."

And very recently this distinct question was presented to the Supreme Court of Nebraska in Earle v. Earle, 48 N. W. Rep. 118. In that case, as in Galland v. Galland, supra, it was affirmed—and the appellant so insists in this case—that the Statute affirmatively authorizing alimony and support to the wife, as an incident or appendage to divorce proceedings, impliedly negatives the power or jurisdiction of the court to make such allowance in other cases, but in neither case was such argument convincing. The syllabus of this case, prepared by the court, says: "The law of the land having made it the legal duty of a husband to support his wife and children, courts of equity within this State have the power, in a suit by the wife for alimony and support, to enforce the discharge of such duty, without reference to whether the action is for a divorce or not."

These cases, while possibly not strictly in line with the prevailing current of judicial decisions, either in England or this country, commend themselves to our judgment. Their reasoning seems to us logical and safe, and their conclusions in harmony with the present legal status of married women. A denial of such jurisdiction would seem to expose the law and the courts to the just criticism of having squarely asserted the wife's right to support from her husband, yet denying her a remedy when such support is refused. Our Statute allows the husband and wife to agree upon terms of immediate separation, and, if such terms provide for the support of the wife by the husband, the courts will enforce such support, at the suit of the wife. But how can this second agreement add to the original obligation, deliberately undertaken and assumed by him, as a part and parcel of his marriage contract? Can a repetition of such agreement, or a further recognition of such obligation, in articles of separation, add anything to its force? A substantial and inseparable part of the marriage contract was his undertaking to support and maintain his wife, and this obligation continued upon him while living in separation, provided such separation was justified by his own misconduct. The law always and without reserve declares this obligation absolute. Is it made more so by his again assenting to it in articles of separation? True, the agreement may fix the amount of support, and how it shall be supplied, but that does not effect the principle upon which her cause of action rests. It only attempts to fix the measure of relief, which would otherwise be left entirely to the court. It is difficult to see how the agreement, which adds no duty in specie to that already imposed by the law, can supply a cause of action in favor of the wife, if none existed before. If the parties to this action had voluntarily agreed upon terms of separation, by which the husband was bound to support the wife, any court of equity would, without hesitation, have entertained her action to compel performance, and the court would not confine itself to the terms of the agreement, but would make such allowance as was equitable. This is nearly the language of Judge Mills in Butler v. Butler, supra.

Marriage being the result of a civil contract between the parties, and the law positively declaring that such contract covers and imposes the obligation of support, we are unable to perceive, on any principle of reason or justice, why a wife who agrees to separate from her husband should be more favored by the law than one who clings to him in spite of his ill usage, until aged in years, infirm in body and broken in spirit, she is finally driven from her home by his unbearable misconduct. It is no adequate response to say that the law makes the husband liable for necessities which may be furnished the discarded wife under such circumstances. What if no tradesman would furnish such supplies, and take the risk of collecting against her husband? It would be extremely improbable that any wife could long maintain herself in that way. Such a support would be too uncertain, precarious and humiliating. It neither meets the rights of the wife, nor the duties of the husband. It is equally unfair, unjust and inequitable to tell the destitute, and possibly unoffending, wife that the law will compel her husband to provide for her if she will couple her application for maintenance with a complaint for divorce. There may be abundant reasons, controlling with her, and which the law ought to respect, why she does not want a divorce. There may be objections in conscience,—a vital and unyielding principle and rule of her religion. She may unselfishly desire to avoid a public notoriety and scandal that would involve her children, or she may still have such affection for, and faith in, her husband as will feed the hope of his reformation and their reconciliation,—reasons, all of them, which the law ought not to ignore or disrespect. The husband owing this duty of maintenance to the wife, we perceive no good reason why she may not, independent of any other ground, maintain an action against him for its enforcement. In this case, the evidence shows such misconduct towards his wife, and illusage of her, by the appellant, as would, and does, in our opinion, justify the separation and the bringing of this action. No complaint is made as to the amount of the allowance decreed by the court, except as to the item of $150 attorney's fees, and as to this the learned counsel for appellant vigorously says: "There is no shadow of legal authority for the judgment awarding plaintiff an attorney fee of $150, or any sum whatever. No attorney fees are ever allowed except when clearly provided by statute, or where they are subject of contract." This allowance cannot be defended as a substitute for statutory costs, and was not so intended by the trial court, and in that sense is not costs at all. The Statute regulates the amount of costs in any action, when allowed. In this case the court had found from the evidence that the wife was justified in living separate and apart from her husband, and was entitled to maintenance during such separation, that the husband was able to furnish such support, but refused; and that the wife was destitute. Upon these facts, it is the husband's undisputed duty to furnish necessities. If it was necessary that this woman have support, and necessary to bring this action to obtain it, then the action, with its proper expenses, was a necessary chargeable against the husband. The law furnishes no inflexible definition of the term 'necessaries.'"

In Shepherd v. Mackoul, 8 Campb. 336, a husband was held liable upon an attorney's bill for services rendered in exhibiting articles of the peace against him. In that case Lord Ellenborough said that the wife "had a right to appeal to the law for protection, and she must have the means of appealing effectually. She might therefore charge her husband for the necessary expense of this proceeding as much as for necessary food and raiment;" and this rule was followed in numerous English cases.

Horrie v. Palmer, 20 N. H. 122, holds the same doctrine in a similar case.

In Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 100, the question was whether the husband was liable for services rendered by an attorney in establishing the innocence of the wife upon a charge of adultery, made by the husband himself, in an action for divorce, and the court says: "In our opinion, he is liable for such services upon an implied promise, which the law raises, to pay therefor as necessaries for the wife;" and, upon a reargument of the case, the court adhered to this opinion.

In Warner v. Holden, 20 Wis. 517, the court held that a husband who prosecuted his wife to compel her to find sureties to keep the peace, and failed to sustain the charges brought against her, was liable for the reasonable fees of attorneys employed by her to defend her against such prosecution, on the ground that such legal services were necessities.

In the case of Graser v. Graser, 38 Iowa, 510, an action very similar to the one at bar, referred to above on another branch of this case, the supreme court of Iowa affirmed a decree of the court below requiring the husband to pay an attorney's fee of $150 for services in bringing the action. These cases are sufficient to illustrate the principle, and to justify our application of it to this case. We think the attorney's fees in this case were properly considered by the court as necessaries, and, as they do not appear to be unreasonable in amount, we are not disposed to disturb the decree in this respect.

The last objection appellant makes to this decree is that it provides that a failure for thirty days, on the part of appellant, to make the payments at the times required, shall be deemed contempt. This objection is not substantial. This provision adds nothing to the force of the judgment. The court makes its decree, and the law provides the means for its enforcement. If non-observance, by appellant, of the requirements of this decree would be contempt, it would be so, not because it was so recited in the judgment, but because it was an act of disobedience which the law made contempt. Punishment as for contempt is not an unusual means of enforcing orders in equity. If at any time appellant is unable to comply with the requirements of the decree, and such disability has not been voluntarily created by his own act, he will not be liable to be punished as for contempt.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

All the Judges concurred.

Petition for rehearing denied.

1. Where one of several judgment debtors, for whom the judgment debt has been secretly purchased in another's name, holds the judgment out to the world as valid, and procures a sale of his own land on execution under it, becoming the purchaser himself in another's name, he is estopped from claiming that the judgment was paid before the sale, in order to prevent the exercise of a right of redemption by another judgment creditor.

2. An execution cannot be said to be issued, within the meaning of a statute requiring it to be issued within one year in order to preserve the lien of a judgment, until it is delivered to an officer to execute.

3. A discharge of a judgment debtor in bankruptcy, although the judgment has ceased to be a lien, does not render it unavailing for the purpose of redeeming the debtor's lands from sale under a prior judgment.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was the original owner of the land. One Chisholm recovered a judgment against him and certain other persons under which an execution was issued and levied on the land in controversy and the land was sold at execution sale. Subsequently Wells, Norton & Walker, judgment creditors of Pease, redeemed the lands from that sale and obtained a sheriff's title thereto. Defendants claimed under the title so obtained.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Cook & Upton and Gregory, Booth & Harlan for appellant.

Messrs. Frederick Ullmann and Charles A. Dupon for appellee.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the facts as they appear from the record, appellant contends that the Chisholm judgment was paid, and as to him a sale thereunder was a nullity, and a redemption thereupon conferred no title whatever on the party seeking to redeem; second, that the Wells, Norton & Walker judgment against him was not a lien on the premises in controversy, because no execution had issued thereon within a year under the Statute, and that, though a judgment may be used to redeem when not a lien, this judgment could not be so employed, because, at the time redemption was attempted, the appellant had obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, and therefore the judgment could not be made the basis of redemption any more than it could be sued over or execution issued thereon, and appellant's property sold, if he insisted on the protection of his discharge, and that Wells, Norton & Walker were not therefore judgment creditors within the meaning of the statute.

Various other questions have been raised and discussed in the argument of counsel, but, in the view we take of the record, it will not be necessary to consider them, as, in our opinion, the sheriff's title obtained by Wells, Norton & Walker under the redemption from the sale on the Chisholm judgment, disregarding all other questions, is conclusive of the rights of the parties.

As respects the first proposition, that the Chisholm judgment was paid, upon an examination of the evidence, it will be found that the judgment was rendered against Pease, Dobbins and others, who were partners. By an arrangement between the partners, the equitable obligation to pay the judgment devolved upon Dobbins and the other defendants, and not upon Pease. On the 30th day of January, 1876, Fuller, on behalf of Pease, purchased the judgment, the latter furnishing the money. On the 1st day of June, 1877, by the direction of Pease, Fuller assigned the judgment to Edward F. Lawrence, and he assigned to Chisholm, the original judgment plaintiff. These assignments were not of record. The transaction was a secret one, known only to Pease and those connected with him acting in his interest. In the schedule attached to Pease's bankrupt proceedings, his oath shows that the judgment was still subsisting against him. The attorneys of Pease sued out an execution, and caused it to be levied on the premises, and caused the premises to be sold on the execution. At the sale Pease had the property bid off in the name of Inslee. A short time before the execution issued, Pease, in answer to a letter of inquiry by appellee Ritchie, in regard to the judgment, wrote as follows: "Yours of 23th received. R. B. Chisholm is the owner of the judgment you mentioned, and I understand Mr. Perry represents him in the matter."

Under the facts, we think Pease is now estopped from claiming that the Chisholm judgment was paid. He held the judgment out to the world as a valid subsisting judgment. He sold the land on an execution issued upon it, and became the purchaser in another name. After having done these acts, and invited the redemption and subsequent sale by a judgment creditor, it is too late now for him to assert that the judgment was paid, and the sale an idle ceremony. If authority is needed to sustain this position, Niantic Bank v. Dennis, 37 Ill. 235, is a case in point. The Statute conferred the right of redemption upon Wells, Norton & Walker, judgment creditors, and in the exercise of that right they had every reason to believe that the sale under the Chisholm judgment was in all respects valid, and obligatory upon Pease and all other persons claiming any interest in the premises under or through him; and, having acted in good faith, they and their grantees ought to be protected.

But it is insisted that, if the sale under the Chisholm judgment is to be treated as valid, it is then claimed that there was no right of redemption in the judgment creditors, Wells, Norton & Walker, because their judgment was not a lien, and the discharge in bankruptcy of Pease was a satisfaction of the judgment. The Statute provides that a judgment of a court of record shall be a lien on the real estate of the person against whom it is obtained, in the county for which the court is held, for seven years from the time it is rendered, provided that, when execution is not issued on a judgment within one year from the time it becomes a lien, it shall thereafter cease to be a lien. Rev. Stat. chap. 77, § 1.

The first question to be considered is whether, within the meaning of the Statute, an execution issued on the judgment in favor of Wells, Norton & Walker within one year from the time it was rendered. As before observed, the clerk made out an execution within the year, but it was never delivered to the sheriff to execute, and when found an indorsement was found on the back of the execution, "Not called for." We do not think what was done here can be regarded as a compliance with the Statute.

The Statute requires something more than the mere writing of an execution by the clerk, and placing it among the files in his office. The word "issued," as used in the Statute, has a more comprehensive meaning, and we think that the fair construction of the word as used in the Statute requires an execution to be made out, properly attested by the clerk, and delivered to the sheriff to be executed by him. The object of issuing an execution is to collect the judgment, but that object cannot be carried out unless the execution is placed in the hands of an officer for collection. The only conclusion we are able to reach, when the purpose of the Statute is kept in view, is that an execution cannot be said to be issued within the meaning of the Statute until it is delivered to the sheriff to execute. From what has been said, it seems plain that the judgment of Wells, Norton & Walker was not a lien from the time it was rendered, and did not become a lien until October 30, 1890, when the execution was issued upon which the redemption was made, but that fact did not prevent them from redeeming.

This court has held that a judgment creditor may redeem from a prior sale, although his judgment may not be a lien. Sherry v. Chandler, 11 Ill. 449.

But while appellant concedes that, in an ordinary case, a judgment creditor may redeem, although his judgment may not be a lien, yet it is claimed that appellant's discharge in bankruptcy rendered the judgment unavailing for the purpose of redemption. It is conceded that, if the judgment had been a lien, the appellant's discharge in bankruptcy would have had no effect upon it. It is no doubt true that appellant's discharge in bankruptcy operated as a bar to any action which might be brought to recover any debt or obligation existing at the time he was declared a bankrupt, and after acquired property was exempted from being taken in satisfaction of any such debts. But, if any creditor had a lien or an equitable claim, by mortgage or otherwise, upon any property of the bankrupt, such right or rights would remain unaffected by the proceedings in bankruptcy.

In Talbot v. Dudley, 5 Ill. 435, the effect of a decree in bankruptcy is somewhat discussed. It is there said: "I take it to be a well settled principle of law that by a decree of bankruptcy the assignee succeeds immediately to all the rights and interests of the bankrupt, to just the same extent that the bankrupt himself had them, subject to and affected by all the equities, liens and incumbrances existing against them in the hands of the bankrupt. The assignee is not a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, but he rather acquires a title by operation of law, and the title comes into his hands in no more perfect a condition than it left the hands of the bankrupt. Indeed, the assignee may be considered rather as a volunteer than a purchaser, and takes the title divested of no lien or equity previously created, either by operation of law or the act of the bankrupt. These are familiar and well-established rules under the English Bankrupt Law, . . . and have been repeatedly recognized and adopted under the Bankrupt Law of the United States."

When appellant was adjudged a bankrupt, the Chisholm judgment was in full force, and a lien on all real estate owned in Cook County by appellant. The assignee succeeded to the title to that lot in question, subject, however, to the right of Chisholm to sell the property in satisfaction of the judgment, and, in the event that the assignee failed to redeem within one year, also subject to the right of Wells, Norton & Walker, judgment creditors, to redeem. These rights of redemption conferred upon judgment creditors by the public laws of the State may be regarded as valuable property rights which have not been taken away or destroyed by the proceedings in bankruptcy. In many cases they may be as valuable as a mortgage.

In Hardin v. Osborn, 94 Ill. 371, it was held that "an assignee in bankruptcy does not take the title to the property of the bankrupt as an innocent purchaser without notice, free from latent equities, etc.; but he takes as a mere volunteer, standing in the shoes of the bankrupt as respects the title, having no greater rights in that regard than the bankrupt himself could assert." The same rule is declared in Jenkins v. Pierce, 98 Ill. 643, and Yastman v. New Orleans Sea. Ins., 95 U. S. 736 [24 L. ed. 500]. Here the right of redemption in favor of judgment creditors was not affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy. The judgment in favor of Wells, Norton & Walker was not paid, discharged or released. It remained in full force and effect. The discharge in bankruptcy released the bankrupt personally from its payment, and operated to protect his after acquired property from being taken in satisfaction of the judgment; but in other respects it remained in full force, and Wells, Norton & Walker had the right to resort to all means conferred by law to enforce its collection, and among these was the right of redemption as judgment creditors.

The decree of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

(February 27, 1883.)

RESERVATION upon agreed statement of facts by the Supreme Judicial Court for Waldo County for the opinion of the full court, of an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid.

Judgment for defendant.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson & Dunton for plaintiff.

Mr. W. H. Fogler for defendant.

Virginia J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assumpsit by a mortgagor of real estate against his tenant under a verbal lease, made after the mortgage, at a rent payable quarterly, for the recovery of two-and-one-half months' rent.

The principal question presented is. When a mortgagor in possession verbally leases the premises at a rent payable quarterly, and the mortgagee, fifteen days before the expiration of a current quarter, duly enters and takes possession for condition broken, whereupon, on demand by the mortgagee, the tenant agrees to pay, and, at the end of the current quarter, does pay, to him the rent for the whole quarter, can the mortgagor recover from the lessee for the two-and-one-half months' use and occupation next preceding the mortgagee's entry and lessee's attornment to him.

We are of the opinion that he cannot.

To be sure, a verbal lease of land creates only a tenancy at will, which can be terminated by the parties thereto only in the mode prescribed by Rev. Stat., chap. 94, § 2. Still, until determined, it is sufficient to establish between them the relation of landlord and tenant, the amount of rent to be paid, and the times when payable. Cameron v. Little, 62 Me. 550.

But, while such a tenancy can be determined by the parties only in the mode mentioned, it may be by one holding the paramount title of mortgagee at any time. Crosby v. Harlow, 21 Me. 400; Hill v. Jordan, 30 Me. 367.

For the legal title vests in the mortgagee upon the delivery of the mortgage, and thereupon he is regarded as having all the rights of a grantee in fee, subject to the defeasance. Hence, in the absence of any express or implied agreement in the mortgage or other writing between the parties, the mortgagee has the right of immediate possession before as well as after condition broken. Wilman v. Wills, 66 Me. 273, Rev. Stat. chap. 90, § 2.

On account of the peculiar relation subsisting between the parties to a mortgage, the mortgagor, though the title be in the mortgagee, cannot be required to pay rent to the latter so long as he is allowed to remain in possession, since his contract is to pay interest and not rent (Chase v. Palmer, 25 Me. 341, 346; Noyes v. Rich, 62 Me. 115; Long v. Wade, 70 Me.

359); "nor has he any power, express or implied," said Lord Mansfield, "to let leases not subject to every circumstance of the mortgage." East v. Hall, 1 Doug. 21, 1 Smith, Law J. Cas. 658, 7th Am. ed. 579; Pope v. Biggs, 9 Barn. & C. 254; Jones v. Mortg. 24 708, 776.

And, if a lease is made by the mortgagor, the lessee becomes liable to the mortgagee for rent accruing due after the latter's entry and the lessee's promise to pay, but not for rent due before such entry and promise, as prior thereto there would be no privity between them. Buens v. Elliot, 9 Ad. & El. 242; Crosby v. Harlow and Hill v. Jordan, supra; McKircher v. Hawley, 16 Johns. 269; Stone v. Patterson, 19 Pick. 476; Smith v. Shepard, 18 Pick. 147; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 2d ed. 181, and cases in notes.

After entry by the mortgagee, the lessee cannot be liable to the mortgagor for rent which should thereafter accrue, for rent payable quarterly is in no part due until the stipulated quarter day. Commons of Plymouth v. Throgmorton, 1 Saik. 65; Fitchburg Cotton Manufactory Corp. v. Mellen, 15 Mass. 304; Wood v. Partridge, 11 Mass. 448; Perry v. Aldrich, 18 N. H. 340; Bussell v. Fabyan, 28 N. H. 542.

And while there may be an apportionment of rent as to estate (Salmon v. Matthews, 3 Mees. & W. 827; Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Ripley, 18 Allen, 421), there can be none as to time (As per se Smyth, 1 Swanst. 287, note a; 2 Greenl. Cruise, title 29, chap. 3, § 3 Kent, Com. 470), for the contract is entire,—the rent for the period of time agreed upon is regarded as an indivisible item. Cameron v. Little, 62 Me. 550.

Hence at common law, if a tenant at will determines the tenancy before rent day, he is bound to pay the whole sum which would have been payable had he continued tenant till that day (Wood's Case, Aleyn, 4); whereas, if the lessor himself determines before the rent day, no rent will be due. Bacon, Abr. 572; Robinson v. Dearing, 56 Me. 637; Cameron v. Little, supra.

But it is urged that the lessor did not terminate this tenancy, and that hence the rule last mentioned does not apply; and furthermore, that the dicta in Fitchburg Cotton Manufactory Corp. v. Mellen, supra, and in Zule v. Zule, 24 Wend. 76, 78, suggesting that a count on quantum meruit might be maintained for use and occupation enjoyed by the lessee prior to the mortgagee's entry, should apply. But the tenancy between the mortgagor and his lessee was completely determined by the mortgagee's entry and the lessee's attornment to him, which was equivalent to an eviction by a paramount title. 3 Kent, Com. 464; Smith v. Shepard, supra; Welch v. Adams, 1 Met. 494; Knowles v. Maynard, 18 Met. 352; Nicholson v. Mungile, 6 Allen, 215; Fuller v. Swett, Id. 219, note.

The tenant's attornment to the mortgagee was no violation of the principle which estops a lessee from denying his lessor's title. Ryder v. Mansell, 66 Me. 107.

By promising to pay to the mortgagee upon rent to him, the mortgagee and the lessee are strangers. Holmes v. Turner's Falls Lumber Co., 8 New Eng. Rep. 177, 142 Mass. 300; Smith v. Shepard, 18 Pick. 147; Nussell v. Allen, 3 Allen, 42; Welch v. Adams, 1 Met. 494; Haven v. Adams, 4 Allen, 90; 6 L. R. A.

Ellis v. Boston, H. & R. R. Co., 107 Mass. 1; Massachusetts H. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 16 Met. 122; Cook v. Johnson, 231 Mass. 222. See note to Cook v. Cooper (Or.) 1 L. R. A. 273.

the latter's rightful entry, the tenant saved the trouble and expense of ejection, which he could not lawfully prevent, and thereby became tenant of the mortgagee, and paid to him the subsequently accruing rent; and neither law nor equity requires him to pay any part of it over again. Kimball v. Lockwood, 8 R. L. 188, 140.

Moreover, the lease having been made after the mortgage, it was subject to it, and to the entry at will by the mortgagee. Still it was an express agreement, and excluded an implied one. It was not mutually rescinded, but so long as it continued the parties were bound by its terms. No rent became due under its provision which was not paid by the lessee to the lessor. For a part of the last quarter's rent there was no express or implied promise on the part of the lessee to pay to the lessor. Knowles v. Maynard, 18 Met. 353, 355, is expressly in point.

Judgment for the defendant.

1. Labels and trade-marks may be sold and transferred by the proprietor of a business together with the plant and good will thereof, so as to prevent him from afterwards using them, as formerly, to the detriment of his vendee; and the fact that such proprietor's name or initials form part of them is immaterial.
2. The breach of a stipulation in an agreement for the sale of the plant, good will, labels and trade-marks of a business, that the seller shall be employed by the buyer for a certain length of time to manage the business, will not cause a forfeiture of the buyer's exclusive right to use the labels and trade-marks.
3. An injunction and accounting will not be granted against one who has wrongfully used labels and trade-marks, in favor of one who has purchased the right to their exclusive use, if the latter has exercised his right in such manner as to mislead the public by causing them to believe that the goods upon which they were placed were the product of his vendor, and had in no way indicated that he had succeeded the original producer and originator of the marks.
4. Prior improper and misleading use of labels, afterwards corrected and made right, will not prevent the maintenance of a bill in equity for the protection of the corrected label, at least in favor of mortgagees in possession, the improper use having been by the mortgagors before they were deprived of possession.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County in favor of complainants in a suit brought to enjoin the alleged wrongful use of certain labels and trade-marks, and the engaging in certain business. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benjamin F. Hamilton and George F. Haley, for appellant:

Complainants by their own fraud and misrepresentation have deceived and misled the public, and thereby have forfeited their right to the trade-mark, and all claim for protection in a court of equity.

The inquiry is not only whether the defendant, from his own showing or by proof, has acted unjustly and inequitably, but also whether the complainants, by their allegations and proof, have shown that they are entitled to relief.

Mr. W. L. Putnam, for appellees:

The evidence in this case shows that the common words "Globe" and "World Renowned," in the connection in which they are here used, answer all the conditions necessary to constitute them proper trade-marks.

Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514 (33 L. ed. 626).

When a person owns a business, the establishment at which the business is carried on and trade-marks which carry his own name, disposition of the establishment, the business and the trade marks in one lump, as was done in this case, will entitle the purchaser to use the name of the seller on the trade-mark, and the seller cannot use the trade-mark with his own name on it.

Jurisdiction to restrain the publishing of notices and the issuing of circulars is merely incidental to the larger jurisdiction to protect trade marks and good will.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an equity appeal. The material facts found by the court are these:

John Winslow Jones, the respondent, for several years prior to 1880 had been carrying on extensively the business of preserving or "canning" meat, fish and vegetables at various factories in Maine, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and had built up a large trade in the canned products in the United States and Canada. The particular process of canning was known as the "Winslow Process," having been originated by one Isaac Winslow. The business above stated was started by Nathan Winslow & Co., and was succeeded to by the defendant, who greatly extended it. Among the labels used by him to designate the products were two in particular. One was known as the "red" label, being of a red color, and bearing the figure of an ear of corn, the words "Winslow's Green Corn," and "John Winslow Jones, Portland, Maine," and also the figure of a globe, with the words "World Renowned" and "Trade-Mark" thereon. The other was known as the "yellow" label, being of a yellow color, and bearing the figure of a globe, with the letters "J. W. J." thereon, and the words "Globe Trade-Mark Brand," "Winslow's Green Corn," "World Renowned," etc. While these particular labels were used on canned corn, the figure of the globe and the various words and phrases on these labels were used on labels for other products, and on the letter-heads and circulars used in the business.

In the latter part of 1879, Jones procured the organization in England of the J. Winslow Jones Company, Limited, for the purchasing, carrying on and further extending the same business; and in pursuance of an agreement he conveyed to the new company, March 1, 1880, all his said factories, machinery and plant generally, and also, as admitted by Jones in his answer, all the labels, trade marks and good will of the business. Jones further admits that such conveyance included the "red" label and the "yellow" label above described.

It was stipulated in the agreement referred to that Jones should be employed by the limited company as its managing director in America, for ten years, at a fixed salary, and should not for the same time carry on a similar business within fifty miles of any factory of the company, nor send any similar canned goods to any part of Europe.

To secure certain debentures, the limited company made to trustees, Bacon and Herring, a conveyance of all the property received from Jones, including the business, good will, labels and trade marks. The limited company, subject, of course, to this trust deed, took possession of all the property and plant conveyed, and carried on the same business, with Jones as managing director in America, until 1882, and during that time made use of the same labels and trade marks to designate their products. In 1882 the limited company, becoming financially embarrassed, transferred all the property, plant and business, including labels and good will, to Charles P. Matlocks, subject, of course, to the trust deed to secure debentures. It was agreed by the company, the trustees and Matlocks that the last-named should take charge of the property and carry on the business, which he did, using the same labels and trade marks to designate the products of the factories so managed by him. This arrangement for Matlocks to take charge of the business was assented to by the debenture holders, including Jones, who was a large holder. In 1883 Matlocks leased the property, plant and good will to the Winslow Packing Company, and gave it written licenses to use, during the lease, the labels and trade marks which had been used in the business. Matlocks was president and manager of this new company. The company used to some extent, these "red" and "yellow" labels, among others, as they had been before used, until 1885, when they had printed across the face of the labels the words, "Winslow Packing Company, Successor to."

December 8, 1886, the original trustees, under the deeds to secure the debentures, transferred the trust, and conveyed all the properties, including good will and labels, etc., to J. W. Symonds and Edward Moore, the complainants, who thereafter held the properties, etc., under the same trusts.

After the assignment of the J. Winslow

Jones Company, Limited, in 1889, Jones was no longer employed as managing director, and subsequently, as early as 1884, he at various places in the United States, and within the limits of the trade or custom of the former business, but not within fifty miles of any of its factories, engaged in the same kind of business. In this new business, to designate his new products, he made use of some labels, similar in color and style to the old "red" and "yellow" labels of the former business. The figure of an ear of corn, the figure of a globe, the words, "John Winslow Jones, Portland, Maine," "Successor to Nathan Winslow & Co.," "Winslow's Green Corn," "World Renowned," "Trade-Mark," "Globe Brand," and the initials "J. W. J.," were used on these new labels. There were some minor differences between the old and new labels, but they were practically similar. Jones also used in his new business practically the same style of letter-heads that he had used in the old business, and which had been used by his assignees, the limited company, and its successors. The letter-heads had on them the words "Winslow's World Renowned Green Corn," and the figure of a globe, with the words "Trade-Mark." Jones also issued circulars, claiming the right to the sole use of the globe trade-mark and the old labels, and denying any right in the assignees of the limited company.

This conduct of Mr. Jones, as to labels, letter-heads, etc., disturbed the trade, and lessened the sale of the product of the old factories, and injured the business of those claiming under his assignees, the limited company. Whereupon Messrs. Symonds and Moore, as trustees for the debenture holders, and joining Matlocks and the Winslow Packing Company as parties, filed this bill in equity against Jones, praying for an injunction to restrain Jones from engaging in a similar business within fifty miles of any of their factories, from selling canned goods in Europe, and from using letter-heads or labels similar to or in colorable imitation of those used by him in the old business, and by him sold to the limited company. The bill also prayed for an account. The court, held by a single justice with the equity powers of a chancellor, sustained the bill, and granted a perpetual injunction as prayed for, but made no order for accounting. The respondent thereupon appealed to the law court, sitting as an appellate equity court.

All controversies over the facts are settled by our finding of facts, as above stated, and it only remains to consider the legal and equitable principles by which, upon the facts found, the case is to be determined.

Every business man feels a natural and honorable pride in the articles produced by him, and in the business he builds up. He naturally gives some particular name to the product of his invention, of his factories, farms, mines or vineyards, to distinguish them from similar products of others, and uses peculiar labels and marks upon his products to identify them as his own. The public come to associate these names labels and marks with the products of some particular origin or ownership, or of some particular factory, farm, etc. It is clear that such names, etc., thus become convenient for the consumer, and valuable to the producer.

and that both the consumer and the producer should be protected against their use by other parties upon other similar products. They become valuable according to the familiarity of the public with them, and the excellence of the product designated by them. The law justly recognizes such names, labels and marks as important attributes or appurtenances of a business, and as proper to be transferred with any sale or transfer of the business and its plant.

Words, descriptive of the article, or indicative of the general locality of its production, cannot, of course, be appropriated by one producer to his exclusive use. Every producer of the same kind of articles can use upon his products any words descriptive of the quality of the articles, or indicative of the county or town where produced, however long time the same words may have been used by others. A man may always describe his products, and tell where they were produced. The same may be said of any color upon a label, for every label must have some color, and the number of colors is limited. Such words and marks, however, as by their own meaning, or by association in the public mind, indicate, not the quality of an article, but its origin or ownership,—the person by whom, or the factory in which, it was produced,—become appropriated in their use exclusively to the originator or owner of such articles. No other person can lawfully use them to designate other similar articles of different origin or ownership. Meloon v. Fleming, 95 U. S. 245 [24 L. ed. 828]; Delaware & R. Canal Co. v. Clark, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 811 [20 L. ed. 591]; Goodyear's India Rubber Glove Mfg. Co. v. Goodyear Rubber Co. 128 U. S. 598 [33 L. ed. 525]; Amesbury Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 102 U. S. 81 [26 L. ed. 904]; Godillot v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 263.

The respondent urges that most, if not all, the words and symbols on the "red" and "yellow" labels in question are such as cannot, under the principles above stated, be exclusively appropriated by the complainants as against him. He claims that such of the words and symbols as are generic, or descriptive, or do not indicate the origin, or that the ownership is in the complainants, are free to all, and that he cannot be restrained from using them. In this class he places "World Renowned," "Trade-Mark," "Only Reliable Brand," etc. The complainants practically concede that such words could not be exclusively appropriated by one producer.

The respondent further claims that the words, "Winslow's Green Corn," do not, under the facts, indicate the origin or ownership of the products, but simply that they are prepared by a process originated by Isaac Winslow, and known to the trade as the "Winslow Process;" that this process was never effectually patented, and was not patentable, and hence anyone could use it, and could use any apt words to indicate that his product was by that process. He argues that "Winslow's Green Corn" are apt words for that purpose, and that they indicate the process only. The complainants concede that the process originated with Isaac Winslow, and was never effectually patented, but they insist that the words "Winslow's Green Corn," under the facts, do in themselves and by association indicate that the articles upon which they are placed are produced from the plant of Winslow or his successors in the business. Many authorities are cited by counsel on each side of this controversy.

The respondent further urges that the words "John Winslow Jones" constitute his name, and that the letters "J. W. J." are the initials of his name, and were intended to represent his name and initials; and that no one else can acquire the right to use them, or to prevent his using them. The complainants insist that the respondent should not use the words "John Winslow Jones, Portland, Maine," since he no longer carries on this business in Portland, Me., and they do carry it on there; that the use by the respondent of these words combined injures their business, in that it tends to mislead the public into believing that the respondent's goods are the product of the old, well known factories. The complainants further reply that, whatever other use the respondent may make of the letters "J. W. J." for him to use them on the figure of a globe has the same injurious effect.

The complainants, however, do not rest their case on the ground that they have appropriated and used these words and symbols on the "red" and "yellow" labels, and that such words and symbols are capable of exclusive appropriation. They place their case on the ground that, whatever the character of these words and symbols, they were devised and used by the respondent as the labels and trade marks of his business, and as such were sold by him for a valuable consideration to the purchasers of his plant and business. The complainants, representing these purchasers, urge, and the facts show, that the respondent—by selling the good will of the business, and the labels and marks used by him to designate the products of the business—promised, for a consideration, not to use such labels or marks for himself, and, for the same consideration, promised that the purchasers should have the exclusive use, so far as he was concerned. It is argued that whatever may be the rights of the complainants against third parties, unaffected by any contract, they have acquired, by valid contract from this respondent, the right to the exclusive use, as against him, of these labels, and the words and symbols upon them; and that his use of them, or of any colorable imitation of them, is a violation of his contract, which an equity court can and should prevent.

What is known as the "good will" of the business is recognized by the law as a proper subject of sale or contract, in connection with a transfer of a business plant. An established business, with plants and products well known to the trade, has a money value often far above that of its mere plant, and this is often the controlling motive for the purchase. Labels, trade-marks, particular words and phrases devised or used to distinguish or identify the products of the plant, and associated with such products in the public mind, are in like manner usually transferred with the plant, and are regarded as valuable acquisitions for the purchasers. They are, equally with the good will, proper subjects of such sale and contract. The name or initials of the originator or owner of the business, when used on labels and as trademarks in the business, may thereby have a value, and so may be included in a sale of the business, so far at least as to prevent the vendor afterwards using them in like manner on other similar products, to the detriment of his vendee.

These propositions are supported and illustrated by authorities.

In Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617 [25 L. ed. 769], S. N. Pike adopted as a trade mark for his whiskey the words, "S. N. Pike's Magnolia Whiskey, Cincinnati, Ohio," inclosed in a circle. He took several partners into the business, but retained his individual ownership of the plant and the trade-mark. The firm, Pike being a member, removed the business to New York, and Pike sold the Cincinnati plant and trade-marks to Mills, Johnson & Co., who entered upon the business with that plant, and used the same label and trade-mark before used by S. N. Pike, and the various firms with which he was associated. Pike dying, his surviving partners undertook to use the trade mark above described. The court held that the purchasers from S. N. Pike had the exclusive right to use the trade-mark, and enjoined the defendants' use.

In Burton v. Stratton, 12 Fed. Rep. 606, two brothers, Stratton, originated a yeast, and adopted as a trade-mark the figures of two heads (portraits of one of them with a twin brother) in an oval setting, with the words, "Twin Brothers' Improved Dry Hop Yeast." The brothers, the proprietors, sold the business and the trade-mark to Burton, who carried on the same business, and used the same trade-mark. Subsequently one of the Strattons began making yeast, and used the words or name, "Twin Brothers' Dry Hop Yeast." The use of this trade-mark by Stratton was enjoined. Brown, J., said that the cases were numerous in which it had been held that a party may lawfully sell, not only a trade-mark indicative of origin in himself, but even the right to use his own name, in connection with a particular business.

In Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed. Rep. 29, the right to use the words "Old Oscar Pepper" was held to pass by an assignment of the plant and business, even as against Pepper himself, the former proprietor, who had set up a separate establishment in another county.

In Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, Oakes had originated a business of making and selling a candy called "Oakes' Candy." He took a partner, Probasco, and the firm carried on the same business. He afterwards sold to Probasco all his interest in the property, business and trade-marks. Probasco's title passed to Skinner. It was held that Oakes should be restrained from using the name "Oakes' Candy," in a new candy business set up by him.

In Hoxie v. Casey, 143 Mass. 502, 8 New Eng. Rep. 700, A. N. Hoxie had originated and carried on a business of making and selling soaps, and used for label and trade-mark the phrases "A. N. Hoxie's Mineral Soap," and "A. N. Hoxie's Pumice Soap." He took Pegram into partnership, and afterwards sold to him all the plant, business and good will. Pegram then formed a partnership with Chaney. It was held that Hoxie, having sold and been paid for the name and marks applied to the soap, could not use them in a new soap business.

In Churton v. Douglas, Johns. Reg. Ch. 174, the complainant and respondent had carried on a manufacturing business under the firm name of "John Douglas & Co." Douglas sold to Churton all his interests in the plant, business and good will, and afterwards formed a new partnership with another person in the same kind of business, under the same firm name, "John Douglas & Co." The new firm was restrained from using that name.

But the respondent contends that this case is not within the above principles, even if they are correctly stated. He contends that any transfer of good will, labels and trade marks by him to the limited company was conditional upon his being employed for ten years as managing director of that company in America, and that his discharge at the end of two years worked a forfeiture of the right to the exclusive use of the labels and trade marks. No such condition of forfeiture was expressed in words in the instrument of conveyance nor in the preliminary agreement of sale, and forfeitures are not favored in the judicial interpretation of writings. We think the agreement for hiring was an independent agreement, so far as the conveyance and transfer of the property, good will and trade-mark were concerned. As well, we think, might Jones claim a forfeiture of all the property conveyed as of this part of it. We do not think it was intended that the property or the business or its good will should revert to Jones, if for any reason he should be discharged from the employ of the limited company before the expiration of the ten years.

The respondent again contends, and stoutly, that the complainants should not have the protection of the law and of this court for these labels, for the reason that they, or the persons managing the property and the business, since he left the employ of the limited company, have so used the labels and marks as to mislead the public into believing that the goods were manufactured or prepared by him. The facts do show that the limited company, and, after it, Matlocks and the Winslow Packing Company, used the "red" or "yellow" labels more or less without change up to 1885, when the latter company printed across the face of such of these labels as it did use the words, "Winslow Packing Co., Successor to." Such use of the labels, without words indicating that Jones had personally left the business, and indicating a change of ownership, would evidently mislead the public as to the manufacturer of the goods, and hence should not receive protection from the court. It would wrong Jones, as well as the public. Stachulberg v. Ponor, 23 Fed. Rep. 430, 128 U. S. 686 [33 L. ed. 500]; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 100 U. S. 318 [27 L. ed. 705].

It is plain that, while thus using the labels, the parties complainant in interest could not maintain a bill for an injunction against their use by the respondent.

The facts further show, however, that, before the filing of the bill, the proprietors of the labels refrained from using them, or made such additions to those they did use as clearly to indicate that the ownership of the business had changed, and that the successors to Jones, instead of Jones himself, were producing the goods. At the time of filing this bill, none of the complainants were offending in this respect, but all seem to have been dealing fairly with the public. Of course they cannot have any damages or accounting for things done by the respondent while they were themselves offending, but, if they are now themselves doing equity, they may ask the court to require the respondent to do equity also.

In Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, supra, the decision adverse to the complainant was put on the ground that the misrepresentation had been and was being continued. We find no authority deciding that a prior improper and misleading use of labels, afterwards corrected and made right, should bar a bill in equity brought for the protection of the corrected label. In this case we think the improper use was inadvertent; and, now that such use has been corrected for several years, it seems to us inequitable that Jones should continue to make use of the labels and trade-marks (or colorable imitations of them) which he sold for a satisfactory consideration to the complainants' predecessors.

In coming to this conclusion upon this question, however, we bear in mind that the improper use complained of was not by the complainant trustees, nor their predecessors in the trust, nor by the debenture holders, but by Matlocks and the Winslow Packing Company, who were practically mortgagors in possession, while the trustees and debenture holders were mortgagees out of possession. The innocent debenture holders have taken possession since the filing of this bill, as will hereafter be stated, and are now asking for protection. Perhaps, had the original complainants or those now prosecuting been guilty of the misconduct, the result might have been different. We do not say.

The respondent also raises a question of equity pleading which we have maturely considered. Pending this suit, the debenture holders have caused all the property held by the original complainants as trustees, including the labels, trade-marks, etc., to be sold by the trustees to enforce the trusts and realize on the assets. At such sale, duly held, Messrs. Davis, Baxter & Davis were the purchasers, and the trustees conveyed to them all the property and rights held by them under the various trust deeds. These purchasers thereupon applied to the court for leave to come in as parties complainant, and further prosecute the suit. Leave was granted, and they were admitted as intervening complainants. To which order the respondent excepted. We do not see any objection to the admission of these new parties. Equity procedure is sufficiently elastic to admit new parties as their interests accrue. The purpose of their admission in this case is not to obtain a declaration of future rights, as argued by the respondent, but to obtain a declaration of present rights, and the prevention of future wrongs. The respondent is not prejudiced. The burden of the defense is not increased. The issues are not changed. The subject matter remains the same, and the judgment must be the same, it being apparent that no accounting can be had in either case.

Our conclusion is that the intervening complainants are properly made parties, and that equity requires in their behalf that the respondent ent should be perpetually restrained by injunction as set forth in the decree appealed from.

We think, however, it is the duty of the complainants to the respondent, as well as to the public, to refrain from using the labels in such manner and form as might lead the public to suppose that the goods packed by them were packed by the respondent. They should strike from their letter-heads, circulars and labels any words indicating that the goods were prepared by John Winslow Jones, and, if they use his name, should add such words as clearly indicate that the goods are not prepared by him, but by them as his successors. This duty should be declared and made imperative in the decree, or in the supplemental decree, modifying the former decree. As the respondent was compelled to appeal to obtain this modification of the decree, so as to prevent improper, misleading use of his name,—a modification we think he is entitled to,—we think he should recover the costs since the appeal, to be set off against the complainants' costs to the time of the appeal.

Decree affirmed, and case remanded for additional decree in accordance with this opinion.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

E. McDANIEL, Appt.,

v.

M. CUMMINGS, Resp't.

(88 Cal. 511.)

1. An easement for the discharge of surface water upon lower land adjoining is not given by Code Civ. Proc., § 801. That section is a mere definition of easements appurtenant, and does not prescribe or regulate the manner of acquiring them.

2. Overflow water from the river may be kept off from land at a distance from the river by a barrier or embankment, although this may set it back on land nearer the river, if the owner of the latter will not co-operate with those behind him in erecting a levee on the bank to protect all the lands from such overflow.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Colusa County dissolving a temporary injunction restraining defend-

*An opinion was handed down in this case September 12, 1889, in conformity to a decision reversing the order of the lower court. A rehearing was subsequently had and the opinion given here handed down. The former opinion is therefore omitted. [Rep.]

NOTE.—Easement and servitude: flowage of water.

An easement is a right which one person has to the use of the land of another for a specific purpose. See note to Nowlin v. Whipple (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 150.

Land on a lower level owes a natural servitude to that on a higher level. See note to Vannest v. Fleming (Iowa) 8 L. R. A. 277.

Easements generally. See note to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Houghton (Ill.) 1 L. R. A. 213.

The term "natural easement" is applicable, especially to the case of flowing water; but an easement, when technically considered, is an interest which one man has in an estate of another, by grant or by prescription. Scriven v. Smith, 1 Cent. Rep. 767, 100 N. Y. 471.

An easement may be acquired by prescription, by which water collecting upon the land of one person must be allowed to overflow the lands of an adjacent proprietor; but a land owner has no right, by digging ditches or tiling drains, to empty out sag holes into this ravine upon the land of an adjacent proprietor; and the latter is entitled to an injunction to restrain the flowage in excess of the natural overflow. Gregory v. Bush, 1 West. Rep. 160, 64 Mich. 37.

ant from maintaining an embankment or dam in such a manner as to cause certain water to set back onto plaintiff's land. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. H. M. Albery, for appellant:

The superior or dominant owner has an easement in the land of the inferior or servient owner for the free and uninterrupted flowage upon and across the lands of the latter of all surface waters naturally collecting or accumulating upon the lands of the former and the interference by either owner with the natural flowage of such waters in such manner as to cause detriment to the other is actionable.

A person having the right of flowage through another's land, while not exercising his right, has no right to interfere with ordinary farm fences maintained by the owner of the servient estate for the protection of his land. Smith v. Langewald, 1 New Eng. Rep. 449, 140 Mass. 205.

The superior owner may improve his lands by throwing increased waters upon his inferior, through the natural and accustomed channels; which is a most important principle, in respect not only to agriculture, but to mining operations also. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 4 Cent. Rep. 481, 113 Pa. 126.

A land owner upon whose lands surface water accumulates by the natural elevation of the land cannot, by means of drains and ditches, concentrate the water and discharge it upon the land of a lower owner to the latter's damage. Weddell v. Hapner (Ind.) May 15, 1890.

Messrs. John H. Harrington and Edwin Swinford, for respondent:

The doctrine of the common law is that there exists no natural easement, or servitude, in favor of the owner of the superior or higher ground or fields, as to mere surface water.

The tendency is to limit the servitudes which a lower field owes to an upper one in respect to water, to such as flows in a defined watercourse, and not to extend it to such as falls upon the surface in the form of rain or melting snow, although from the nature of the surface such water, when it does fall, flows in a uniform course or direction.

In the case at bar the waters came from the Sacramento River, where the adjacent owner has an undisputed right to confine them by means of levees. The adjacent owner has control of the source.

See Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. supra.

Having control over the source, he cannot refuse to prevent the flow himself and then enjoin others from protecting themselves against it.

Beatty, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant owns the west half of a certain section, No. 26, in Colusa County. Plaintiff owns land adjoining on the west. Still further to the west, at a distance of about two miles from plaintiff's land, the Sacramento River flows from north to south. The land next the river is the highest, there being a gradual descent from the river bank to and beyond the land of defendant. When the river rises above the level of its banks, as it generally does several times during every rainy season, the water flows off to the east or southeast, across the land of plaintiff and other lands similarly situated, to and across the land of defendant and other lands in the same relative situation. It does not flow in any narrow or defined channel or channels, but in a broad sheet, covering a wide surface. When the river falls below the level of the banks the overflow cannot, of course, find its way directly back into the stream, and consequently the lands near the river are drained by the spread and flow of water towards the east and southeast, across the lower lands, such as those of defendant. Left unobstructed in their natural and accustomed flow, these waters soon pass beyond the plaintiff's lands, leaving them fit for cultivation. But recently the defendant, without intending to injure the plaintiff, and acting upon the bona fide belief that he had the right so to do, commenced, and was proceeding to complete, a levee or embankment along his west line, the necessary effect of which will be to prevent the flood water from passing over his land, and to set it back upon the plaintiff's land, causing it to cover a larger area thereof, and to remain thereon for a longer period, than it otherwise would. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action to enjoin the defendant from erecting or maintaining said levee. A temporary injunction was issued upon the al-ing of the complaint. Afterwards, on motion of the defendant, and upon affidavits showing the state of facts above set forth, the superior court dissolved the injunction on the ground that the defendant, in erecting and maintaining his levee, was acting within and according to his rights. From this order dissolving the injunction plaintiff appealed and on September 12, 1880, an opinion was filed by this court reversing the order, upon the authority of Ogden v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346.

A rehearing was subsequently granted upon petition filed on the part of the defendant in which the correctness of the decision in Ogden v. Connor is assailed, as is also the construction which we gave to section 801 of the Civil Code.

I think there can be no doubt that we were in error in holding that section 801 of the Civil Code gives to the owner of higher land an easement for the discharge of surface water upon lower land adjoining. That section merely enumerates the different kinds of burdens or servitudes upon lands that may be attached as incident or appurtenant to the other lands, or, in other words, it is a mere definition of easements appurtenant, and makes no pretense of prescribing or regulating the manner of acquiring them. Among the other easements defined are: "(9) The right of receiving water from or discharging the same upon the land. . . . (11) The right of having water flow without diminution or disturbance of any kind."

Undoubtedly these are easements which may exist as appurtenant or incident to the lands of one, and as servitudes or burdens upon the land of another, but the question here is not as to what an easement or a servitude is, but as to how it is created, and when it attaches. In the solution of this question we derive no assistance from section 801 of the Civil Code. That section is no more authority for saying that the plaintiff has an easement for the discharge of surface water according to its natural flow from his land to that of defendant than it is for saying that he has any other of the seventeen kinds of easements enumerated; as, for instance: "(1) the right of pasture; (3) the right of fishing; (8) the right of taking game; . . . (17) the right of burial." How, then, is the existence of an easement in any particular case to be determined? Ordinarily, an easement is created by contract between the owners of different parcels of land,—that is to say, by grant, either express or implied; but with respect to rights such as that in controversy here, the question of easement or no easement depends upon the law defining the mutual rights and obligations of the owners of land in the relative situations of the tracts belonging to the plaintiff and defendant. What, then, was the law applicable to these lands at the date of their acquisition? It does not appear when either of the parties acquired his land, but it is to be presumed it was subsequent to the 10th of April, 1850, at which date it was enacted that "the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the Constitution or laws of the State of California, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this State." Stat. 1850, p. 212.

This rule continues in force. Pol. Code, § 4463.

As there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States, or in the Constitution or statute law of this State, to which the common law rule on this subject—whatever it may be—can be repugnant, it is manifest that the whole question is solved whenever it is determined what the common-law rule is.

In the case of Ogden v. Connor this precise question was presented, and it was then determined that "when two parcels of land, belonging to different owners, are adjacent to each other, and one is lower than the other, and the surface water from the higher tract has been accustomed by a natural flow to pass off over the lower tract, the owner of the lower tract cannot obstruct this flow. The owner of the upper tract has an easement to have the water flow over the land below, and the land below is charged with a corresponding servitude." This, of course, was intended as a statement of the common law rule, for otherwise it could not have been the law of this State. But counsel for respondent contends, and counsel for appellant seems to admit, that it is really a statement of the rule of the Roman civil law, and that it is the exact opposition of the common-law rule. It must be confessed that this proposition seems to be sustained by many of the cases cited in the briefs, and if the question were now to be decided for the first time I should certainly find great difficulty in arriving at the conclusion reached by the court in the case referred to. But that decision was rendered seventeen years ago, following a previous case, not reported, entitled Castro v. Bailey, and has stood unchallenged ever since. Necessarily, it has become the rule of property and of right respecting interests which have vested during that long interval, and it cannot now be disturbed without manifest injustice to all who have acted upon the faith of it. If it be erroneous, it must nevertheless be upheld upon the principle of stare decisis, and so far as our action is concerned, the rule must continue to obtain as it is there laid down.

But counsel for respondent, although originally conceding that the order appealed from must be reversed unless the decision in Ogden v. Connor was repudiated, now contend that the cases may be distinguished, and that this order should be affirmed on the principle applied in Lamb v. Reclamation Dist., 73 Cal. 125.

In that case this court adopted and applied to the flood waters of our large rivers the principle laid down in the English case of Roe v. Sayer Comrs., 8 Barn & C. 355, with respect to the waters of the sea, viz., that they are a common enemy, against which every man has a right to defend himself, regardless of the fact that the barriers he erects for the protection of his land may cause the flood to rise higher, or flow with greater force upon his neighbor. We think this is the true principle to apply to the case of parties in the relative situation of the plaintiff and defendant here, especially in view of the policy of all our state legislation respecting our overflowed lands. If the owner of the land next to the river will not, either by himself, or in combination with those behind him, erect a levee on the bank, he ought not to be allowed to prevent them from protecting themselves merely because by so doing they prevent his higher land from being drained of the flood waters as rapidly as it otherwise would be. Because his land may be cultivated without artificial protection, he ought not to be allowed to prevent others from using proper means to make their lands productive; and what is true of the owner of the river bank is true in the same sense of each successive owner back of him. It is the interest of all to combine and share the expense of placing a levee on the bank, by which all will be protected; but if those in front will not co-operate with those behind, and will do nothing for themselves, they must not be allowed to stand in the way of those whose necessities compel them to act. There is no necessary conflict between these views, or the principles they sustain, and the decision in Ogburn v. Conner. That decision refers to surface water having its sources in springs, or descending from the clouds in the form of rain or snow waters; waters, that is to say, which the owner of the higher land cannot keep out by any practicable means. It does not apply to flood waters which the owner of the higher land can restrain by the same means employed by his neighbor. In this case it does not appear that defendant's dam will cause the plaintiff any injury by holding back the rain water falling on his land, or any water except the overflow of the Sacramento River. As against that, we think the defendant is entitled to protect himself, and that the plaintiff, if he finds it necessary, may do the like.

Order affirmed.

(Spear and Williams, JJ., dissent.)

(b) If, however, the call in the description be to and thence along the margin of the lake, no such presumption arises, and the title of the purchaser will extend to low-water mark only.

WRITS of error to the Circuit Court for Medina County to review judgments in favor of defendants in actions brought to enjoin defendants from trespassing upon property alleged to belong to plaintiff. Reversed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

The plaintiff in error, who was also the plaintiff in the courts below, brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Medina County two actions, one against the defendant E. E. Andrews, and the other against the defendant John Nye, the pleadings in the two actions being substantially alike, if not exact copies, one of the other.

The plaintiff in his petition set forth that he owned in fee simple, and was entitled to the exclusive possession of, the land that underlies and forms the natural bed of Chippewa Lake in Medina County, Ohio, together with a narrow strip of land that surrounds the same; that the lake was valuable for the purpose of keeping boats and fishing tackle for hire to persons who resort to it for recreation and pleasure, that the defendants, who respectively occupy certain lands that border on the lake, in violation of the rights of the plaintiff, have each fitted out and keep for hire boats and fishing tackle, have let the same to excursionists and pleasure seekers for hire and intend to continue to do so, whereby repeated and constant acts of trespass are being committed and will continue to be committed upon his said property by transient, and in many instances irresponsible, persons, that the defendants are each irresponsible pecuniarily, and that the ordinary actions at law would furnish him no adequate remedy. Whereupon he prays for an injunction and general equitable relief.

Each defendant by an answer filed in the action against him denied that the plaintiff owned in fee simple, or was entitled to the exclusive possession of, the premises in dispute, admits that he keeps and lets for hire boats and fishing tackle from the front of his premises to persons who resort to the lake for pleasure, and claims a right to continue to do so averring that the same has been done by himself and predecessors for more than twenty-one years, and that for more than forty years the public has resorted to said lake for boating and fishing.

The record does not disclose any of the proceedings in the court of common pleas, but shows that the two actions were tried in the Circuit Court of Medina County upon an agreed statement of facts and a judgment rendered against the plaintiff in each action, who thereupon instituted proceedings in this court to reverse those judgments.

Excluding certain immaterial matters, the agreed statement of facts shows that the Chippewa Lake has an area of about four hundred acres, is oval in form, its length from north to south being about twice as great as its width from east to west, its principal tributary emptying into it at its northerly end and its surplus water escaping by a stream flowing from its southern extremity; its bottom sloping gradually from the shore to its center, where the depth is "considerable;" that its waters are valuable not only for the purpose of letting boats and fishing tackle to pleasure seekers thereupon for hire, but to gather ice from its frozen surface; that it has never been used for navigation but that from very early times hunters and fishermen have resorted to it without license to fish and hunt, and for more than forty years the public have had free access to it for boating, hunting and fishing; that the defendants and their grantors have for more than forty years occupied continuously their respective lands to the water in all its variations, and have enjoyed the free use of the water, in connection with their lands, for the purpose of watering cattle, washing sheep, boating and fishing, and without license or consent from anyone. That the defendants, Andrews and Nye, have constructed on the premises occupied by each buildings and appliances such as are found at pleasure resorts, to which their places are adapted, and the value of which, for such purposes, is dependent upon their right of access to and use of the lake for the purpose of boating and fishing. They keep for hire a large number of small boats, which they let to pleasure seekers and sportsmen resorting to the place, and they derive some profit from such hiring of their boats. In the use of the lake, in connection with the hiring of their boats, they have constructed a temporary dock, extending from the shore occupied by them, into the lake far enough to get beyond shallow water, and at such docks they keep their boats tied when not in use, and from them the public take such boats for hire. That a public road is opened to the lake along the line between the lands of the two defendants, and they having fitted up their lands for places of resort, and being situated on such public road, resort to the lake was, at the time of the commencement of this action, substantially confined to persons who reached it over the defendants' grounds, they being the only ones having boats for hire and grounds open to the public.

The lands, the title of which is immediately in dispute in these actions, lying between the water's edge of the lake and its center, and in front of the shore land occupied by the defendants, as well as the entire lake and its surrounding lands, as a part of the Western Reserve lands, were, at the time of the division of the Connecticut Land Company, allotted to Samuel Fowler and three others and as early as 1815, by virtue of sundry conveyances of interests and proceedings in partition, the ownership of all such lands was in James Fowler and Samuel Fowler.

That sales of parcels of the entire tract were made from time to time by the Fowlers until all the lands immediately surrounding, or bordering on, the lake were conveyed away by them, the last conveyance thereof bearing date of Jan. 24, 1868. That on Aug. 11, 1876, the Fowlers conveyed to D. H. Ainsworth and A. W. McClure whatever title they then had to the bed of the lake and the lands surrounding it, which title, by subsequent conveyance, is now vested in the plaintiff in error. That the descriptions in the several deeds by which the Fowlers conveyed to purchasers thereof the several parcels of land that surround and border on the lake are not uniform. Some of these descriptions were by metes and bounds only, containing no words referring to, or indicating the existence of, the lake, while others made the margin of the lake a boundary. The descriptions in two of the deeds, however, that to Fred B. Chamberlain and the one to Delanson DeForrest, under whom the defendant Nye claims title by mesne conveyances, expressly make Chippewa Lake one boundary of the land conveyed, though the deed to the lessor of Nye makes the margin of the lake the boundary of the lands which it conveys to him.

Messrs. Boynton, Hale & Herr for defendants in error.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention between the parties to this action is over their respective rights to and in Chippewa Lake, a non navigable body of water in Medina County, in this State, having an area of about four hundred acres, oval in form, though its extension from north to south is about twice as great as that from east to west. It is true that the plaintiff in error claims that the waters of the lake have subsided by reason of the deepening of the channel of its natural outlet, whereby a narrow strip of land entirely around the lake has been recovered; but as this claim is not sufficiently supported by the agreed statement of facts to require any consideration of the principles or authorities upon which he founds his claim to title thereto, it will not be further noticed in the decision of the cause.

The lake is situated in the Western Reserve lands, and upon the division of the lands of the Connecticut Land Company was, together with a body of land entirely surrounding it, allotted to Samuel Fowler and three others, and which by sundry conveyances and certain proceedings in partition became the property, in fee simple, of Samuel Fowler and James Fowler as early as the year 1815, to whom all the parties to this proceeding trace title. By the conveyances and proceedings above noticed, the title to the lake, as well as the title to the lands inclosing it, vested in the Fowlers, if it is susceptible of private ownership, which we think it clearly is. Bristow v. Cormick, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 652.

"A lake which is not really useful for navigation, although of considerable size compared with ordinary fresh-water streams, may be private property." Gould, Waters, § 83; Ledyard v. Ten Eyck, 26 Barb. 103; Hogg v. Bowman, 41 Ohio St. 81.

Many other authorities could be cited in support of this proposition, but it is too well settled to require it to be done, even if controverted, which it is not in this action, although material to its determination.

It is agreed that, from an early period in the history of the State, hunters and fishermen, without license, resorted at will to the lake to hunt and fish, and that for more than forty years the public has had free access to it for boating, hunting and fishing. It is not readily perceived how this early and continued custom can be said to cast any material light upon the intention of the parties in respect of the deeds by which the lands around the lake were from time to time conveyed; it can only be material, therefore, as tending to show a dedication of the lake by its owners to the public, and a consequent extinguishment of their private property therein. These facts may constitute a link in the chain of evidence necessary to prove a dedication of the lake to the public, but fall far short of establishing that fact. In truth, when consideration is given to the early customs of the people of this State in this respect—their well-known habit of hunting and fishing upon all lands and waters where fish or game might be found, irrespective of their ownership, or whether inclosed with fences or not—it is apparent that this class of evidence ought to be received and weighed with extreme caution as proof of a dedication to such uses. Private owners are not to be deemed to have devoted their property to uses of this kind simply because they interposed no objections to their neighbors, or even to strangers, hunting and fishing upon it; other circumstances must appear manifesting that it was his intention to do so. Dedication depends upon the intention of the owner to devote his lands to a public use and should be made to appear clearly and satisfactorily. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 400, 401; Smith v. State, 23 N. J. L. 712; Washb. Easem. 200.

Here the owner did no act indicating an intention to devote the lake to the use of the public; it does not even appear that the owner had any knowledge that the public was using it in the manner that the agreed statement shows it to have been, in fact, used; and as dedication by parol, or in potu, acts by way of estoppel on the proprietor, uses by the public unknown to him can have no appreciable probative force to establish a dedication against him.

The lake, as we have seen, being susceptible of private ownership, and having been allotted to the Fowlers, or to them and others whose title they obtained, upon the division of the Western Reserve lands, and not having been dedicated to the use of the public, passed by the deed made by the Fowlers August 11, 1876, to Alosworth and McClure, under whom the plaintiff derives title, unless it had already passed to some, or all, of the purchasers of the lands surrounding the lake by virtue of the prior deeds of the Fowlers made to such purchasers. This depends upon the descriptions in those deeds and the rules of law that apply to conveyances of lands bounded upon non-navigable inland lakes. By a series of deeds, the first of which bears date of October 16, 1823, and the last of January 24, 1868, the Fowlers conveyed all the lands that surrounded the lake to various parties, under which the same are now held, and such parts of the lake as may have passed by virtue of these conveyances could not, of course, have been conveyed by a subsequent deed of the Fowlers under which the plaintiff in error derives title, and it is therefore of the first importance to ascertain what those conveyances in fact include, which necessitates a construction of their respective descriptions.

These descriptions may be divided into three classes. In the first class are two deeds, one from James Fowler et al. to Delanson De Forrest, the other from James Fowler and wife to Fred B. Chamberlain, wherein the lake itself is made one boundary of the land thereby conveyed; in the second class are four deeds, one from James Fowler to Catharine and Sally Trump, one from James Fowler to Charles Wheeler, one from James Fowler to William Walter and the other from James Fowler to Charles Wright, wherein the margin of Chippewa Lake is made either a corner or one of the boundary lines of the lands conveyed by them respectively; while in the third class are two deeds, one from James Fowler et al. to Abraham Fritz, the other from James Fowler et al. to Conrad Snyder, in which the lands conveyed are described by metes and bounds only, no reference whatever being made to the lake.

The rule that lands, one boundary of which is a navigable river running through this State, extend to the middle of the stream subject to easement of navigation, was laid down by this court as early as the year 1820. Gard v. Chambers, 3 Ohio, 496.

The same rule was applied to calls in a survey bounding lands upon a non-navigable stream, shortly thereafter (Benner v. Platter, 6 Ohio, 303); since which time the doctrine therein announced has been firmly maintained by this court. Curtis v. State, 5 Ohio, 224; Lamb v. Hickets, 11 Ohio, 311; Walker v. Board of Public Works, 16 Ohio, 540; Jane v. Purcell, 20 Ohio St. 388; Day v. Pittsburgh, Y. & C. R. Co., 44 Ohio St. 400, 5 West. Rep. 206.

The rule, however, is otherwise in respect to calls in a deed bounding the lands conveyed by it on the waters of Lake Erie. Beane v. Dismiller, 34 Ohio St. 493.

And in the case of lands bounded on the Ohio River the clear tendency of judicial opinion in this State is to limit the title of the riparian proprietor to low-water mark (Benner v. Platter, 6 Ohio, 303; Blanchard v. Porter, 11 Ohio, 138, 148; Bent v. Hubbard, 8 Ohio St. 347); but the effect to be given to a call in a deed that makes a non-navigable lake one boundary of the lands conveyed by it has not heretofore received the attention of this court. The authorities upon the question are in conflict, and seem to be incapable of reconciliation. In some of the States, and in England, the rule is to limit the operation of the conveyance to the water edge. Gould, Waters, § 80, p. 165; Bloomfield v. Johnston, 1r R. 3 C. L. 68; Bradley v. Rice, 18 Me. 198; Wood v. Kelley, 30 Ma. 47; Wheeler v. Spinola, 54 N. Y. 377.

In other States, notably Indiana and Michigan, the contrary rule may be considered as established. Ridgway v. Ludlow, 53 Ind. 43; Stoner v. Rice, 121 Ind. 51, 6 L. R. A. 207; Cute v. Fisher, 63 Mich. 48, 6 West. Rep. 131.

In this conflict of authority we are at liberty to adopt such rule on the subject as best comports with the presumed intention of the parties, a sound public policy and the analogies of the rules in force in this State respecting boundaries upon running streams. It may be conceded that the numerical weight of authority supports the rule that a call in a deed making a non-navigable lake a boundary only passes title to the land to low-water mark; but, be that as it may, no solid ground is readily perceived for limiting, in that case, the deed to the waters' edge, and in the case of a running stream, extending its operation to the center or thread thereof; and in this State, where the rule is so firmly established that a boundary on a running stream carries the land to the middle or thread thereof, principles of analogy afford strong grounds for applying it to non-navigable lakes. The main reasons for the rule in one case apply equally to the other. The existence of "strips or gores" of land along the margin of non-navigable lakes, to which the title may be held in abeyance for indefinite periods of time, is as great an evil as are strips and gores of land along highways or running streams, the litigation that may arise therefrom after long years, or the happening of some unexpected event, is equally probable, and alike vexatious in each of the cases, and that public policy which would seek to prevent this by a construction that would carry the title to the center of a highway, running stream or non-navigable lake that may be made a boundary of the lands conveyed, applies indifferently, and with equal force, to all of them. It would seem, also, that whatever inference might arise, from the presumed intention of the parties, against the reservation of the land underlying the water, would be as strong in one case as in either of the others.

That practical difficulties in the application of the rule may arise where the lake is so nearly round that it cannot be said to have any length as distinguishable from its breadth, or when the side lines of the respective parcels of land bounding on the lake approach it in such direction that if they should be extended to the center thereof they would cross each other, is apparent.

The latter difficulty is not at all unusual in the case of lands bounding on running streams, but does not prevent the application of the rule. 3 Washb. Easem. 459, star note; Angell Watercourses, § 53,—where the subject is learnedly discussed by those able authors, and this difficulty overcome.

Whether there are in Ohio non-navigable lakes of such shape that no length can be affirmed of them does not appear. If there are any such, and the rule applicable to running streams and to non-navigable lakes distinctly longer than they are wide cannot be applied to them, other appropriate rules must be adopted, which, in the light of all the circumstances, may be regarded as effectuating the intention of the parties, and are consistent with public policy, one main object in all cases of this kind being to adopt and apply such rules as will accomplish those important ends.

Whatever difficulties may be conjectured as liable to arise in possible cases to the application of the rule we have adopted, in fact none do arise in the case before us, for Chippewa Lake is distinctly longer than it is wide, and a prolongation to its center of the side lines of the respective parcels lying along its sides will not cause them to cross each other. The rule, of course, excludes those lands which merely touch the end of the lake and do not at all extend along its sides.

This rule, however, is applicable to but two of the conveyances,—that to Delanson DeForrest and that to Fred B. Chamberlain. While, if the parties to a deed make a running stream, a non-navigable lake or a highway one boundary of the lands conveyed by it, public policy and the presumed intention of the parties will extend the line to the middle of such monument, yet it is competent for them to limit the conveyance to the side of the highway, the top of the bank of the running stream or to the edge of the water of the lake (Blanchard v. Foster, 11 Ohio, 128; Lough v. Mackin, 40 Ohio St. 302), and the question is whether the parties to the other deeds conveying the land surrounding Chippewa Lake have not done so. As has been shown, in four of the conveyances of the Fowlers of the lands bordering on the lake, the "margin" of the lake is made a boundary or corner in stead of the lake itself. "Margin of the lake" is a term of unequivocal import, meaning the line where the earth and water meet around the lake; by the use of these words the parties have declared their intention to make, not the middle, but another part, of the lake,—the edge of the water,—the boundary line. No other construction can be given to the words the parties themselves have chosen, without doing violence to their meaning, and an intention contrary to the one expressed by the very words selected by the parties themselves cannot be presumed. McCullough v. Aten, 2 Ohio, 308; Lamb v. Richards, 11 Ohio, 311; Hopkins v. Kent, 9 Ohio, 13; Gould, Waters, § 199.

In the remaining deeds from the Fowlers to the lands around the lake the lands were described by metes and bounds, no mention of the lake being made. In descriptions of this class only the lands within the bounds pass. "Where lands are granted by metes and bounds all the area within those bounds and no more passes." Lockwood v. Wildman, 12 Ohio, 480.

Indeed, where the parties have by their deed inclosed the land by agreed lines, without any reference whatever to adjacent natural objects, it is difficult to conceive of a principle that would extend those lines to include those natural objects, however convenient they might be to the enjoyment of the land actually conveyed.

From the construction we have given to the descriptions contained in deeds made by the Fowlers conveying away the several parcels of land that surround the lake, it follows,—that the deeds made to Delanson DeForrest and Fred B. Chamberlain make the center of the lake one boundary of the tracts conveyed to them respectively, and that the other deeds carry title so far as the edge of the water, and that therefore the title to all the bed of the lake except what was covered by the De Forrest and Fred B. Chamberlain deeds remained in the Fowlers, and by their deed of Aug. 11, 1876, was conveyed to D. H. Almsworth and A. W. McClure, and is now owned by the plaintiff in error by virtue of means conveyances from Almsworth and McClure, as set forth in the agreed statement of facts.

It also follows that as the defendant Andrews claims title under conveyances which constitute the margin of the lake a boundary, he has no title to any portion of the bed of the lake, nor has the defendant John Nye a title to any portion thereof, for the reason that although the deed from the Fowlers to Delanson DeForrest, and the means conveyances from the latter to J. H. Barrett, conveyed title to the center of the lake, yet the deed from J. H. Barrett to Levi Nye, the lessor of defendant John Nye, limits its operation to the edge of the lake by expressly making the margin thereof its boundary on the side, or end, of the tract abutting thereon. We therefore hold that the plaintiff in error is the owner in fee simple of all that part of the bed of Chippewa Lake not covered by the deeds made by the Fowlers to Delanson DeForrest and Fred B. Chamberlain, and that those two deeds cover such parts thereof as are inclosed by a prolongation, to its center, of those lines of the description that approach the sides of the lake.

The bed of the lake being private property the public has no right to fish in, and boat upon, its waters; nor have the defendants the right to engage in the business of letting for hire boats and fishing tackle to such portions of the public as may resort to the lake to boat and fish for their pleasure and recreation. That the latter right is one that can be acquired by prescription may be admitted, but the facts agreed upon fall short of establishing it by that method, even if that contention was maintained on behalf of the defendants in error, which we do not understand is the fact, in view of the arguments presented in the able brief of their counsel.

The agreed statement of facts in respect to this question is as follows:

"The defendants and their grantors have for more than forty years occupied continuously their respective lands to the water in all its va-stations, and have enjoyed the free use of the water in connection with their lands for the purpose of watering cattle, washing sheep, boating and fishing, and without license or consent from anyone."

This does not show that the enjoyment was adverse or under any claim of right. Both of these elements must exist, according to the current of authority, in connection with the prescribed period of enjoyment, to create a right by prescription. Washb Easements, 180; Toole v. Clifton, 23 Ohio St. 247.

However, conceding that there are not necessary elements of prescription, and that the defendants had acquired a prescriptive right to water cattle, wash sheep, boat and fish in the lake, yet it by no means follows that, because they may do these things, they may also erect docks extending into the water and embark in the business of keeping boats and fishing tackle to let for hire to pleasure seekers who may resort to the lake to boat and fish for recreation upon its waters. The two rights are clearly distinguishable from each other; and the contention is over the latter right only, in respect to which the agreed statement of facts, while it states that the defendants are exercising it, is silent as to the duration of their enjoyment thereof, and therefore does not establish the right by prescription.

That a riparian proprietor by virtue of his ownership to the edge of the water of a private stream or lake has access to and the right to use the water for domestic and agricultural purposes, is not controverted by the plaintiff in error. Such use may fairly be considered as within the presumed intention of the parties.

That the lake is valuable for the purpose of gathering ice from its frozen surface appears from the agreed statement of facts, and the right of the defendant to gather it was asserted on one side and denied by the other in the course of the argument, but the question is not made by the parties in their pleadings and therefore cannot be noticed in the decree.

The agreed statement of facts shows that the defendant Nye is insolvent, and the financial condition of Andrews doubtful; but aside from this, and were they both solvent and fully able to respond to any damages that might be recovered against them in actions of trespass, yet it is apparent from the whole record that such actions would not afford an adequate remedy for the violations of the rights of the plaintiff in error in the past; and those threatened in the future were, and are, during certain seasons of the year, of daily, if not of hourly, occurrence under the claim of a right to do so; besides the injury resulting from each separate act would be trifling, and the damages recoverable therefore scarcely equal to a tithe of the expenses necessary to prosecute separate actions therefor.

It follows from the holding of the court respecting the effect to be given the several descriptions in the conveyances made by the Fowlers and others to the various parcels of land that surround the lake, that neither of the defendants has shown a right to erect docks and let for hire for use thereon boats and fishing tackle. It also follows that in so far as these acts affect those portions of the lake to which the title of plaintiff does not extend, he is not entitled to relief against them, but is entitled to have so much thereof as his title covers protected from those unwarranted violations. There should be a decree, therefore, finding that, as against the defendants herein, the plaintiff in error is the owner in fee simple and entitled to the exclusive possession of all the lands underlying the waters of Chippewa Lake except those parts thereof that, according to the rules hereinbefore laid down, were conveyed by the Fowlers to Delanson DeForest and Fred B. Chamberlain, and restraining the defendants from letting to hire either boats or fishing tackle, to be used on the water overlying the lands so found to belong to him.

Judgment accordingly.

Spear, J., dissenting:

I concur in the foregoing except as to one point. I am of opinion that the title of neither defendant in error should be held to extend to the middle of the lake.

The decision in Griff v. Chambers, 3 Ohio, 486, is the foundation of the doctrine in Ohio that the ownership of lands bounded by an inland stream carries the title of the owner to the middle. It was held in that case to be "vitally essential to the public peace and to individual security, that there should be distinct and acknowledged legal owners for both the land and the water of the country. . . . It cannot be reasonably doubted that, if all the beds of our rivers supposed to be navigable, and treated as such by the United States, in selling the lands, are to be regarded as unappropriated territory, a door is open for incalculable mischiefs. Intruders upon the common waste would fall into endless broils among themselves, and involve the owners of the adjacent lands in controversies innumerable. Stones, soil, gravel, the right to fish, would all be subjects for individual scramble, necessarily leading to violence and outrage."

The rule that the lands covered by such waters should not be public water rests upon the ground of public policy, and it is in recognition of this rule that the lands underlying Chippewa Lake are considered to be the subject of private ownership. This being determined, the only question remaining is, What part of the lake shall be held to be the bound intended when the lake generally is given as the boundary? As to streams, the center, or thread, is the established bound, where the language of the deed does not contradict such construction, because the center is the most conspicuous part. The water is a moving body, and, as to the depth and breadth, is subject to constant change, which produces variations on the opposite sides. The thread, or current, however, shifts but little, and is, in the main, stationary, so that a line running to the thread would be a reasonably certain line, and would be easily ascertained. This is not true as to natural lakes and ponds. Such bodies do not have any thread or current. The water is the most conspicuous portion, but no rule of convenience or certainty requires that the line, where the lake itself is mentioned as the boundary, should be extended to the center. Indeed, the application of such rule would be attended, in most cases, with practical difficulties.

ties in the running of lines beyond the water's edge. If lakes were always found in the shape of a square, or a parallelogram, these difficulties would be slight, perhaps, but more frequently they are nearer a circular shape. The difficulties in such case are apparent. They may be theoretically overcome by an engineer on a diagram, but practically, in the water, they would always exist, and would prove a fruitful source of contention and quarrel.

The rule which, it is submitted, is the true rule, is stated by Gresham, J., in Indiana v. Milk, 11 Fed. Rep. 889, as follows:

"Non-navigable streams are usually narrow, and the lines of riparian owners can be extended into them at right angles without interference or confusion, and without serious injustice to anyone. It was therefore natural, when such streams were called for as boundaries, to hold that the real line between opposite shore owners was the thread of the current. The rights of the riparian proprietors in the bed of the stream, and in the stream itself, were thus clearly defined. But when this rule is attempted to be applied to lakes and ponds, practical difficulties are encountered. They have no current, and, being more or less circular, it would hardly be possible to run the boundary lines beyond the water's edge so as to define the rights of shore-owners in the beds. Beaver Lake is seven and a half miles east and west, and less than five miles north and south. Extending the side and end lines into the lake, there being no current, when would they meet? This rule is applicable, if at all, whether there be one or more riparian proprietors. I do not think the mere proprietorship of the surrounding lands will, in all cases, give ownership to the beds of natural non-navigable lakes and ponds, regardless of their size. It would be unfair and unjust to allow a party to claim and hold against his grantor the bed of a lake containing thousands of acres solely on the ground that he had bought and paid for all the small surrounding fractional tracts—the mere rim."

In my view there is no difference, in law, in the two cases now under consideration, and a like judgment should be rendered in each. But the judgment in the case of Nye is assented to as the best practical solution under the circumstances.

Williams, J., concurs in the above.

STATE OF OREGON, Resp.,

v.

E. J. KAISER, Appt.

*1. Acts and omissions deemed to be contempt of the authority of courts, under the *Head notes by THAYER, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Contempt of court, in presence of court.

Any willful act tending to obstruct justice is a contempt of court. Cheadle v. State, 9 West. Rep. 88, 110 Ind. 301.

A breach of the peace in open court is a direct disturbance and a palpable contempt of the authority of the court. Re Terry, 128 U. S. 289 (32 L. ed. 406).

The court, when in session, is present in every part of the place set apart for its own use and for the use of its officers, jurors and witnesses; and misbehavior anywhere in such place is misbehavior in the presence of the court. Re Savin, 131 U. S. 267 (33 L. ed. 150).

Disorderly conduct, insulting demeanor, etc., in facie curie, constitute a direct contempt. Ill temper of the judge is no excuse for contempt. Holman v. State, 2 West. Rep. 761, 105 Ind. 516.

It is competent for the circuit court, immediately upon the commission in its presence of such a contempt, to proceed upon its own knowledge of the facts and to punish the offender, without further proof and without issue or trial in any form. Re Terry, supra.

Where a man in the court room struck the marshal a violent blow in his face, and thrust his hand under his vest where his bowie knife was concealed, apparently to draw it, it is a contempt of court. Re Terry, 36 Fed. Rep. 419.

A court is not dissolved by a mere recess or necessary adjournment from one day to the next; and misbehavior affecting public justice, in the court-room and in the immediate presence of the laws of Oregon, are only those which are specified as such under the subdivisions of section 860 of the Civil Code, and in other sections thereof, and can be punished only in the mode therein prescribed.

Judge, while he is attending there to resume business when the hour of recess expires, is misbehavior in the presence of the court. Baker v. State, 4 L. R. A. 128, 82 Ga. 776.

When a party is guilty of a contempt by using insulting language to the judge while holding court, he may be punished therefor without any rule being issued against him; and in such case the judge may act upon his own knowledge of what has been said, and absolutely refuse to hear any other evidence as to the language used by said party. State v. Gibson (W. Va.) Sept. 14, 1889.

Where the insulting language was not used in the court room, a rule should be issued, and defendant be allowed to prove by witnesses the actual language used. Ibid.

Where persons disclaimed any intent to use disrespectful language, and asked permission to withdraw the paper, the court allowed them to do so on payment of the costs of the proceedings for contempt. United States v. Late Corporation of Church of Jesus Christ, etc. (Utah) Feb. 1889.

Under the Act of Congress of 1789, the question whether particular acts constitute a contempt is to be determined according to the rules and principles of the common law. Re Savin, 131 U. S. 267 (33 L. ed. 150).

Attempting, while a witness is in the witness-room, or in the hallway of the court room, to deter him from testifying, by offering him money, is a misbehavior in the presence of the court, and punishable, without indictment, by fine and imprisonment, as a contempt. Ibid.

2. A court has no authority to proceed against a party for contempt on account of acts not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, unless the facts constituting the contempt are shown by an affidavit presented to the court.

(May 1, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County finding him guilty of contempt of court and sentencing him to fine and imprisonment. Reversed.

Statement by Thayer, Ch. J.:

Said Circuit Court, at a term thereof held on the 18th day of December, 1889, proceeded of its own motion to make and enter the following order:

"In the Circuit Court for Jackson County, Oregon. Whereas, you, E. J. Kaiser and N. A. Jacobs, as editors and publishers of the Valley Record, a newspaper published at the City of Ashland, Jackson County, Oregon, on Thursday, the 12th of December, 1889, in an issue of said Valley Record published on said day, did publish of and concerning the above court, and the judge and officers thereof, the following, to wit: 'The circuit judge has ordered an investigation into the whys and wherefores of a material witness disappearing in a criminal case, in which his important testimony was needed to convict. While the honorable court is at the investigation business, it might not be more than common justice to go into the wholesale business of investigating itself, and everybody else connected with the management and manipulation of the jurisprudence of southern Oregon. If some of the methods employed could be sifted to the bottom a system of debauchery would be unearthed that may be very warm and interesting to some of the executors. In fact, then, the evidence would be laid bare to the people of southern Oregon, and they would know just why one man can be convicted of murder in the first degree, and 'hung by the neck until he is dead,' on strong circumstantial evidence; and why another crime, of the same foul magnitude, is committed, and the courts fail to find the author, when the circumstantial evidence that made the first man stretch hemp was far less convicting in its circumstantialness than was the case that the blind Goddess of Justice could not find guilty; why attorneys can offer bribes to even such august personages as grand jurors to bring in suitable verdicts; and why—yes, why—a lot of other things, just as queer, irregular and delicate, and too numerous to mention, are occurring as periodically as there are exigencies that make them. In fact the court would have an all year's job on its hands. The practicing condition of jurisprudence in this section of the world is as corrupt and criminal in its methods, in proportion to population, amount and magnitude of crime, and purse of criminals, as it is in the cities where these cases are regularly 'handled' by the political boss who 'makes' the officials, 'fixes' the juries and attends to the case, for a large sum. These irregular methods are becoming so numerous that it seems as though they have encysted themselves upon, and are a part of, the—unwritten—works of Blackstone. This is one of the conditions and dangerous consequences of the political methods in vogue in Jackson County, an immediate result of Approaching a person summoned as a juror, with a view of improperly influencing his actions in the event of his being sworn as a juror in the case, if done in the presence of the court, is a contempt punishable by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, without indictment. Re Cuddy, 121 U. S. 230 (35 L. ed. 164).

An attempt to bribe a juror to bring about a disagreement of the jury is punishable as for a contempt, although no prejudice is shown to have resulted to either party. Langdon v. Wayne Circuit Ct. Judges, 78 Mich. 352.

A contempt committed in the presence of the petit jury while they are engaged in performing the functions devolved upon them by law, and which must be performed out of the sight and hearing of the judge or anybody else, is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court. People v. Barrett, 86 Hun. 251, 30 N. Y. S. R. 728.

Where an attempt was made, according to the affidavit on which the motion was founded, to confer upon the district court, by a false and fraudulent averment, a jurisdiction to which it was not entitled under the Constitution, this was a gross contempt of court. Eberly v. Moore, 66 U. S. 24 How. 147 (15 L. ed. 612).

Any attempt, by a more colorable dispute, to obtain the opinion of the court upon a question of law which a party desires to know for his own interest or his own purposes, when there is no real and substantial controversy between those who appear as adverse parties to the suit, is an abuse which courts of justice have always reprobated, and treated as a punishable contempt of court. Lord v. Venia, 49 U. S. 8 How. 321 (12 L. ed. 1007), 6 L. R. A.

Contempt; power to punish for.

Power to punish for contempt is inherent in courts of superior jurisdiction. It is not regulated by statute alone. The Legislature can neither create nor destroy the power. Holman v. State, 2 West. Rep. 761, 105 Ind. 516; Re Terry, 128 U. S. 239 (33 L. ed. 405); Re Robinson, 36 U. S. 19 Wall. 612 (23 L. ed. 204).

So United States courts have power to punish for contempt. Re Savin, 131 U. S. 267 (33 L. ed. 140).

So have the district courts of Colorado. Cooper v. People, 6 L. R. A. 420, 18 Colo. 302.

The superior courts of New Jersey, modeled after the English courts of common law, have authority to punish summarily by proceedings for contempt. Re Chessman, 4 Ont. Rep. 376, 40 N. J. L. 115.

Under the Revised Statutes, courts of the United States have power to proceed summarily for contempt. Re Savin, supra.

Under the Act of Congress of 1789, the question whether particular acts constitute a contempt is to be determined according to the rules and principles of the common law. Ibid.

The courts of the United States have power to punish for contempts of court committed in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice. Ibid.

But territorial courts are not United States courts, within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 753, defining the power of United States courts to punish for contempt. Territory v. Murray, 7 Mont. 251.

U. S. Rev. Stat. invest the district courts of Mon-which is shown in the shameful way in which its representative officials are allowed to sell out their constituency for a beggarly fee. Another direct result of this condition of affairs has placed an indebtedness of from $100,000 to $150,000—such a magnitude that no one does know the actual amount—over the county, that is bearing practically ten per cent interest (mighty large returns and safe investment for big capital); and no effort is being made to stop it from climbing right along up. When will the cupidity, indifference and lack of courage of the people in public affairs cease, and an effort made to at least put a check to these grasping vultures? It is therefore now hereby ordered that you, and each of you, do and appear before said court, at the courthouse in Jacksonville, said county and State, on Monday, 18th December, 1889, at 9 o'clock in the forenoon, then and there to show cause, if any you have, why you should not be punished for contempt of said court for having so published and circulated the matter above set out as aforesaid. Done in open court on Friday, 18th December, 1889. Lionel R. Webster."

A certified copy of the order and citation having been personally served upon the said E. J. Kaiser on the 17th day of December, 1889, he appeared in accordance with the requirements thereof, and filed an answer duly verified by him, of which the following is a copy.

"E. J. Kaiser comes, and, in answer to a citation issued out of the above-entitled court, and heretofore served on him, says that he is engaged in publishing a newspaper of general circulation at Ashland, Or.; that, in publishing said article that appears in said citation, he did not make any reference to any action or proceeding then pending in said court, or before any grand jury, nor was there any grand jury in session at said time, as defendant is informed; that said article was, so far as the same relates to the courts of this county, a criticism of past acts therein, and the same was not intended to have, and would not have, any tendency to interfere with the proper and unbiased administration of the law in any case or cases then or now pending in said court; and that said article was published only, as the defendant believed, in the interest of society, and defendant earnestly disclaims any intentional disrespect towards said court, or the officers thereof, in the publishing of said article. And, further answering, defendant avers that said court has no jurisdiction of the person of this defendant under this proceeding, and denies that this court has any jurisdiction to punish this defendant, or to adjudge him in contempt, for the publishing of said article set forth in said citation."

The said circuit court, upon the said order, citation and answer, adjudged the said Kaiser guilty of contempt of the court in the publication of said article, and sentenced him to pay a fine of $50, and also that he be imprisoned in the county jail for the period of fifteen days, from which adjudication the said Kaiser brought this appeal.

Mr. H. K. Hanna, for appellant:

In the proceeding had in this cause before the lower court no jurisdiction whatever had tains with all the chancery power which formerly belonged to chancery in England; and they are not limited to the punishment provided by the statutes of the Territory. Zimmerman v. Zimmerman, 7 Mont. 114.

The Legislature may aid the jurisdiction or enlarge the powers of courts by declaring certain improper conduct to be contempt, and may regulate the practice in proceedings for contempt. Chandle v. State, 8 West. Rep. 48, 130 Ind. 301.

While the power to punish contempts ought to be exercised promptly, yet it is an arbitrary power which ought to be kept within prudent limits, especially in regard to indirect contempts in any way involving the freedom of the press. Ibid.

Summary punishment for contempt.

There is a distinction between a commitment by precept for the nonpayment of money and a commitment upon a conviction and fine as punishment for a contempt in misconduct punishable by fine and imprisonment. In the latter case the prisoner is not entitled to the jail liberties, and in the former "he is in execution in a civil action," and is entitled thereto. People v. Cowles, 8 Abb. Summary punishment for contempt is held not to be an infringement of the Constitution, which guarantees to every citizen a trial by jury. This power, however, is to be exercised only where no other adequate remedy can protect public justice from obstruction. Gandy v. State, 18 Neb. 451; State v. Doty, 22 W. J. L. 428; *State v. An attempt by wanton publication to prejudice the rights of litigants in a pending cause, degrade the tribunal, and impede, embarrass, or corrupt the due administration of justice, is a contempt of court. Cooper v. People, supra; Re Chesman, 4 Cent. Rep. 576, 49 N. J. L. 114.

Thayer, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions are presented for our consideration upon this appeal: first, whether the matter published by the appellant was punishable as a contempt of the circuit court; second, whether said court had authority of its own motion to cite the appellant to appear before it, and inflict punishment upon him for the alleged offense.

The Civil Code of this State, section 650, prescribes what acts and omissions in respect to a court of justice, or proceedings therein, shall be deemed to be contempts of the authority of the court. They are as follows: Disorderly, contemptuous or insolent behavior towards the judge, while holding the court, tending to impair its authority, or to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceedings, a breach of the peace, boisterous conduct or violent disturbance tending to interrupt the due course of a trial or judicial proceeding; misbehavior in office, or other willful neglect or violation of duty, by an attorney, clerk, sheriff or other person appointed or selected to perform a judicial or ministerial service; deceit or abuse of the process or proceedings of the court by a party to an action, suit or special proceeding; disobedience of any lawful judgment, decree, order or process of the court; assuming to be an attorney or other officer of the court, and acting as such, without authority, in a particular instance; rescuing any person or property in the custody of an officer by virtue of an order or process of such court; unlawfully detaining a witness or party to an action, suit or proceeding while going to, remaining at or returning from the court where the same is for trial, any other unlawful interference with the process or proceedings of a court; disobedience of a subpoena duly served, or refusing to be sworn or answer as a witness; when summoned as a juror in a court, improperly conversing with a party to an action, suit or other proceeding to be tried at such court, or with any other person, in relation to the merits of such action, suit or proceeding, or receiving a communication from a party or other person in respect to it without immediately disclosing the same to the court; disobedience by an inferior tribunal, magistrate or officer of the lawful judgment, decree, order or process of a superior court, or proceeding in an action, suit or proceeding, contrary to law, after such action, suit or proceeding shall have been removed from the jurisdiction of such inferior tribunal, magistrate or officer. There are various other acts in the Code which are specially declared punishable as contempt; and it authorizing in its presence that he will go to jail before he will obey its order, is guilty of contempt. Ex parte Robinson, 71 Cal. 608.

But it is not a contempt to disobey an order of court which is not authorized by law. Lester v. People (Ill.) Jan. 21, 1900. See note to Com. v. Perkins (Pa.) 2 L. R. A. 238.

It is not contempt for defendant in a divorce suit to refuse or fail to obey an order to pay temporary alimony. Allen v. Allen, 72 Iowa, 502.

But it has also been held that a person refusing to pay alimony as ordered is guilty of contempt where he had been advised not to pay, and it is evident that he did not intend to pay. Potts v. Potts, 19 West. Rep. 147, 66 Mich. 428.

So nonpayment of alimony, as ordered, by a defendant who absents himself from the State and renders personal service impossible, is punishable as contempt, where service is made upon his solicitor. Fairchild v. Fairchild (N. J.) 11 Cent. Rep. 150; Ford v. Ford, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 78.

A husband who refuses to comply with an order of the court to give security for alimony may be adjudged guilty of contempt. Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 428.

In a divorce suit, a district court in Montana has power to order a defendant's answer stricken from the file, in punishment of his disobedience of an order to pay alimony, where the defendant is a nonresident and absent from the Territory, and no other punishment can be resorted to. Zimmerman v. Zimmerman, 7 Mont. 114.

Under the California Code of Civil Procedure, proof of inability of a person imprisoned for contempt in refusing to pay alimony as directed by the court, to comply with such order, entitles him to his discharge. Re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580.

A failure to pay alimony as directed by the court is a civil contempt; and a person imprisoned therefor is in custody as under an execution. Ibid.

An assignee in insolvency who refuses to comply with an order to pay into court the money in his hands may be punished for contempt. Buhler v. Superior Court, 73 Cal. 87.

The failure to produce the body of the person named in a writ of habeas corpus, who was in the custody of the person served with the writ, is a contempt committed in the face of the court. Ex parte Starnes, 77 Cal. 158.

A sheriff who refuses to release a prisoner ordered to be discharged on habeas corpus is guilty of contempt of court. Re Vanvaver (Tenn.) Jan. 10, 1900.

A party to a suit, who is bound by the decree, may be guilty of contempt by a pertinacious opposition to it, or by a refusal to obey it, and asserting a different right or title from the one alleged and enforced by him in the suit. Texas v. White ("Re Chiles") 88 U. S. 23 Wall. 127 (25 L. ed. 615).

authorizes every court of justice, and every judicial officer, to punish contempt by fine or imprisonment, or both, but provides that such fine shall not exceed $200, nor the imprisonment six months, and that, when the contempt is not one of those mentioned in subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 650, or subdivision 1 of section 916, which empowers every judicial officer to preserve and enforce order in his immediate presence, etc., it must appear that the right or remedy of a party to an action, suit or proceeding was defeated or prejudiced thereby before the contempt can be punished otherwise than by a fine not exceeding $100. § 651.

Section 652 of the Code provides that "when a contempt is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court or officer, it may be punished summarily, for which an order must be made, reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, determining that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt, and that he be punished as therein prescribed;" and section 653 provides that "in cases other than those mentioned in section 652 [649], before any proceedings can be taken therein, the facts constituting the contempt must be shown by an affidavit presented to the court or judicial officer, and thereupon such court or officer may either make an order upon the person charged to show cause why he should not be arrested to answer, or issue a warrant of arrest to bring such person to answer in the first instance.

Section 655 provides that, "in the proceeding for a contempt, the State is the plaintiff. In all cases of public interest the proceeding may be prosecuted by the district attorney on behalf of the State; and in all cases where the proceeding is commenced upon the relation of a private party, such party shall be deemed a co-plaintiff with the State.

Violation of injunction.

The power to punish for the violation of an injunction is incident to the power to grant an injunction. Mourer v. State, 8 West. Rep. 397, 397 Ind. 399. See Re Nichols, 34 N. Y. 72; People v. Campbell, 40 N. Y. 126; Albany City Bank v. Schermerhorn, 3 Paige, 472, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 735; Re Smet-Burst, 4 How. Pr. 303.

The purpose of the Statute for the punishment of contempt is to enforce obedience to the orders of the court, not to punish, but only after the contempt is proved to imprison the delinquent until the order of the court is complied with or he is discharged according to law. Ex parte Wright, 66 Ind. 612; McCredie v. Senior, 4 Paige, 373, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 477.

In a proceeding for contempt for violation of an injunction, it is the satisfaction of the offended dignity of the law and the vindication of the respect due to tribunals of justice which call for the interposition and punishment. Conover v. Wood, 3 Abb. Pr. 33.

Courts exercising both common-law and chancery jurisdiction may issue final orders of injunction which cannot be disputed and their validity brought into question in proceedings on an attachment for contempt. Central U. Teleph. Co. v. State, 9 West. Rep. 242, 110 Ind. 333.

Although an injunction be irregularly obtained, it is still an order of the court, and must be discharged before it can be disobeyed. Hove v. Wil-

These various sections of the Code not only provide what acts shall be deemed contempt, and point out the mode of procedure for their punishment, but strongly indicate that, when the act constituting the contempt is not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court or officer, it must be such an one as is calculated to affect the right or remedy of a party in a litigation.

Section 651, which limits the punishment to a fine not exceeding $100, unless it appear that the right or remedy of a party to an action, suit or proceeding was defeated or prejudiced by the contempt, clearly shows this. If this view be correct, it follows, then, that, unless the matter published by the appellant constituted a contempt under subdivision 1 or 2 of said section 650, or under subdivision 1 of section 916, or affected, or tended to affect, the right of a party to a litigation pending in said court, or before the judge thereof, it does not come within the purview of the Code. But counsel for the respondent urge that a court of justice has power to punish for contempt, and that its power in that respect cannot be limited by statute. This is undoubtedly true, so far as it is necessary to maintain order in the conduct of its business, and in the enforcement of its jurisdiction. The Legislature could as well abolish the courts outright as to deprive them of the power to punish for contempt those who impeded, obstructed and embarrassed the administration of the law. It would paralyze their functions, and render their process, orders, decrees and judgments mere brutum fulmen. But whether they possess inherent authority to punish as contempt acts which do not affect causes actually pending before them, although the acts tend to degrade the court, and bring the administration of justice into disrepute, has never been conceded in this country. Counsel for respondent have cited in support of that doctrine from the American decisions, State v.

However hastily or improvidently an injunction may be granted, it is valid until annulled by the court granting it, or reversed on appeal, and until such time it is entitled to obedience. If it is disobeyed the party can be punished for contempt. Erie R. Co. v. Ramsey, 46 N. Y. 334.

That he was advised by counsel and believed that the order of injunction was null and void, and that he acted upon such advice and belief, is not an answer to the proceeding for contempt. Roosevelt v. Edson, 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 260; People v. Edson, 19 Jones & B. 267; People v. Compton, 1 Duer, 333; Lanning v. Boston, 7 Paige, 284, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 180; Rogers v. Peterson, 4 Paige, 456, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 614; Hawley v. Bennett, 4 Paige, 163, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 337; Re Fenny, 4 Nat. Banker Reg. 70.

In equity a party may be punished as for a contempt when he has knowingly and designedly done acts which he knew, at the time, the court had, by an order, prohibited him from doing, although at the time no order had been served, or in fact entered, but had only been directed to be entered. People v. Brower, 4 Paige, 405, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 401; Hull v. Thomas, 3 Edw. Ch. 220, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 640; State v. Dwyer, 41 N. J. L. 10; Livingston v. Swift, 22 How. Pr. 2; Stafford v. Brown, 4 Paige, 200, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 472; Vanmadou v. Ross, 3 Jon. & W. 224; Hodgson v. Mathis, 3 N. J. Eq. 110; Cape May & R. L. R. Co. v. Johnson, 22 N. J. Eq. 334; People v. Compton, 1 Duer, 333.

Morrill, 16 Ark. 224, and Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. 405; but it is well understood that the courts of the latter State have since held quite to the contrary. Storv v. People, 79 Ill. 43.

In State v. Anderson, 40 Iowa, 207, the Supreme Court of that State held that the publication by an attorney of an article in a newspaper criticizing the rulings of a court in a cause tried and determined prior to the publication did not constitute contempt punishable by the court, and referred approvingly to Dunham v. State, 6 Iowa, 246, in which it was held that the publication of articles in a newspaper reflecting upon the conduct of a judge in relation to a cause pending in court, which had been disposed of before the publication, however unjust and libelous the publication might be, did not amount to contemptuous or violent behavior towards the court, under chapter 94, Code 1851, of that State, nor that such articles were so calculated to impede, embarrass or obstruct the court in the administration of the law as to justify the summary punishment of the offender under that chapter. The inherent power of a court of justice to punish for contempt one who commits acts which have a direct tendency to obstruct or embarrass its proceedings in matters pending before it, or to influence decisions regarding such matters, is undoubted; but it can hardly be maintained, from the adjudications had upon the subject in the various States, that such power is broad enough to vest in the court the authority to so punish anyone for criticizing the court on account of its procedure in matters which have fully terminated, however much its dignity and standing may be affected thereby, however unjust, rude or boorish may be the criticism, or whatever may be its effect in bringing the administration of the law in disrepute. In any event, it seems to me that the Legislature has authority to limit the power of courts in regard to matters of contempt to the punishment only of such acts as are specified in the sections of the Code above set out. Nor can I discover any reason why the Legislature does not possess authority to prescribe the mode of procedure to be observed by the courts in the exercise of their power to punish in such cases. The proceeding is not a personal matter of the court. The State is a plaintiff in all cases of that character. But, when the acts constituting the contempt are committed in the presence of the court, it may take judicial cognizance of them, and inflict summary punishment. It is, however, required to make an order reciting the acts as occurring in its immediate view and presence, and determine that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt and that he be punished, etc. As I view the said sections of the Code, they are little more than declaratory of the law upon the subject of contempt as understood by a large portion of the courts of the several States at the time of their adoption. They provide every means necessary to the preservation of order and decorum in the presence of the courts of the State, while engaged in the transaction of their business, for the enforcement of obedience to their lawful judgments, decrees, orders and processes, and for the performance of official duty upon the part of their officers. Whether, therefore, the said matter published by the appellant constituted a contempt depends upon whether it falls within any of the cases specified in said sections; and whether the circuit court had authority, of its own motion, to cite the appellant to appear before it, and inflict upon him the punishment imposed, depends upon whether the offending was done in the immediate view and presence of the court.

For what purpose or with what intent the appellant published the said matter, unless it were to create an idle, silly sensation, is an enigma. His doing so probably resulted from a freak or spleen. He certainly could not have expected to gain any advantage from such a profusion of extravagancy, nor have supposed that a half-witted person, even, would give any credence to his grotesque account of the affairs of Jackson County referred to in his production. Why any man other than an addle-brained lunatic should print such absurd, ridiculous stuff in a newspaper is difficult to imagine. The indulgence in such shilly-shally by managers of newspapers indicates a mania on their part to abuse, vilify and insult officials selected to administer the affairs of government, however devoted and faithful to the public interests those officials may be. Such a course only tends to incite anarchy, the most dangerous and dreaded enemy with which a republican government has to contend. It is well known to this court, and to the community generally, that no such condition in the judicial matters of "southern Oregon" as the appellant endeavored to represent exists, and that no such abuses as he depicted prevail there, but, upon the contrary, that justice is as well and faithfully administered in that locality as in any other part of the State. Yet the appellant, the editor of the newspaper, whose duty should only be to have upright and competent officials in the administration of the local affairs of his section, where he consistently can take pride in having them so regarded by the community and the world at large, makes use of his position to traduce and degrade them. Instead of attending to his business of imparting useful information,—instead of assisting in building up the community and its institutions,—he acts the part of an iconoclast. The course pursued by such persons is a positive damage and injury to society. It is a poor requital for the faithful services of the learned judge who presides in the first judicial district, and whom the people thereof selected to determine the law in their matters of difference, to subject him to a wholesale charge of dereliction of duty, coming from whatever source it may.

The publication, according to the general definition given by Blackstone, and by some of the more modern law-writers, upon the subject, would probably constitute contempt, but, under the Code of this State, it does not; nor do I think it would according to the weight of decisions made under the Constitutions of the various States. If it had reflected upon the conduct of the court with reference to a pending suit, and tended in any manner to influence its decision therein, it would unquestionably have been a contempt; but it was not shown that any suit was then pending by which the rights of any litigant were, or could have been, affected by it. The article itself states that the court had ordered an investigation into the "whys and wherefores" of a material witness disappearing is a criminal case, in which his testimony was needed to convict; but it does not appear in the proceeding for contempt that such was the fact, nor, as I can see, that it was calculated to influence the decision in that matter. It appears to have been a vague, wanton fault-finding in regard to the general manner in which official duty in that part of the State had been performed, not arising to the dignity of a criticism, nor entitled to any notice whatever. If the publishers of such contemptible articles are left alone to breathe and vent their own fetid exhalations, it will be the most suitable punishment which can be inflicted upon them. If the act were such an one as could have been in the immediate view and presence of the court, it would doubtless have been what is termed a "direct contempt;" but, it not having been so committed, and not involving a direct disobedience to any order of the court, it comes within the class denominated "constructive contempt." 20 Am. Law Reg. 147.

In proceedings to punish that class of contempt, it is necessary that a proper information should be filed before the court is authorized to act in the matter. Said section 653 of the Code, above set out, makes it imperative that the facts constituting the contempt in such cases must be shown by an affidavit presented to the court, etc., before the proceeding can be taken. "The power of a court," said Wallace, J., in Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 414, "to punish for an alleged contempt of its authority, though undoubted, is in its nature arbitrary, and its exercise is not to be upheld except under the circumstances and in the manner prescribed by law."

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the court was not authorized to proceed in the matter of its own motion; nor was the court empowered to punish the appellant by imprisonment. Section 651 of the Code, above referred to, is decisive upon that point.

The decision appealed from must therefore be reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (3d Div.).

James T. VOUGHT et al., Appts.,

v.

Joseph S. WILLIAMS, Resp.

(.....N. Y.)

1. A provision in a contract for the sale of real property that the title is to be passed upon by the purchaser's lawyer or conveyancer does not make his decision that the title is good a condition precedent to the vendor's right to enforce the performance of the contract.
2. A stipulation that the title to real estate shall be "first class" means nothing more than it shall be marketable.
3. The presumption of death of one who left home for causes unknown and has not been seen or heard of by his family or friends for upwards of twenty-four years, and who, when last seen, was about twenty-three years old, unmarried, dissipated, in feeble health and in destitute condition, being in want of clothing, is not sufficiently strong to make marketable a title to real estate which depends on his death.

(April 15, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe Equity Term in favor of defendant in an action to enforce specific performance of a contract for the purchase of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

Appeal from a judgment of the General Term of the Fifth Department affirming a judgment entered upon a decree of the Special Term. The action was for the specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. In March, 1858, Giles B. Richardson died intestate, seized of the property in question, leaving, surviving him, his widow, Mary P. Richardson and two sons, William H. and Giles B., Jr. Giles B., Jr., was born on May 16, 1840, and lived with his mother at Pittsford, Monroe County, until 1868. At that time he was unmarried, was in poor health, was very dissipated and had no business. In May, 1863, he left home and about a week thereafter was seen by an acquaintance in the City of Albany. He was then in a destitute condition, and in want of clothing, and stated that he was going to Troy to procure work. From that time until the trial of the action he had not been seen, and none of his friends or members of his family ever heard anything of him. In April, 1876, his mother and brother, by deed, conveyed the property in question to the plaintiff's grantors. The deed recited that the grantors were the sole heirs at law of Giles B. Richardson, deceased, and that it was intended to vest the absolute title to said lands in the party of the second part; that the deed was executed upon the assumption that Giles B. Richardson, Jr., was actually dead. The contract between the parties to this action for the sale of the land provided that the title was to be "first class," and was to be passed upon by a lawyer or conveyancer to be designated by the defendant. The defendant refused to take the property on the ground that the title was not a marketable one.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. James Brock Perkins, for appellant:

The Statute says (Code, § 841) that a person who absents himself for seven years is presumed to be dead, unless it is affirmatively proved that he was alive within that time.

The legal presumption is apart from any statutory rule, that as Richardson has not been heard from for seven years and more, by persons, who, if he had been alive, would naturally have heard of him, he is presumed to have died.

Lawson, Presump. Ev. Rule 42, pp. 200-205.

And, having been unmarried when last known to be alive, he will be presumed to have died without lawful issue.

Lawson, Presump. Ev. Rule 41, p. 197; Phillips, Ev. pp. 288, 290.

The presumption alone is enough to make a title merchantable.

Mr. George F. Yeoman, for respondent:

Where it does not appear what the intent was at the time of leaving, the court will not presume the intent of returning in order to be able to presume the death. A presumption will not be made to base a presumption upon.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The provision that the title was to be passed & L. R. A.

upon by the defendant's lawyer or conveyancer did not make the decision of the conveyancer that the title was good a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to enforce the performance of the contract. If a decision to that effect was refused unreasonably, the failure to obtain it would not defeat a recovery; and it would have been unreasonably refused if in fact, and beyond all dispute, the title was good. Folliard v. Wallace, 2 Johns. 295; Thomas v. Fleury, 26 N.Y. 30; Brooklyn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 47 N.Y. 475; Bowery Nat. Bank v. New York, 68 N.Y. 336; Duplex Safety Beller Co. v. Garden, 101 N.Y. 888, 3 Cent. Rep. 870; Doll v. Noble, 116 N.Y. 230.

The stipulation that the title should be "first class" could mean nothing more than that it should be marketable. The trial court refused to find that Giles B. Richardson, Jr., was dead, and it did find that there was no evidence "as to whether or not he was dead, except the presumption, if any, which is raised from the facts heretofore stated with regard to him." It found as conclusion of law "that the title of the plaintiff to said premises, depending, as it does, upon the disputed question of fact, is not a marketable title, and that the defendant was entitled because of said defect to refuse to carry out the said contract."

It is an established principle of law that every purchaser of real estate is entitled to a marketable title, free from incumbrances and defects, unless he expressly stipulates to accept a defective title. Burnell v. Jackson, 9 N.Y. 535; Dalman v. Dunham, 49 N.Y. 495.

A marketable title is one that is free from reasonable doubt. There is reasonable doubt when there is uncertainty as to some fact appearing in the course of its deduction, and the doubt must be such as affects the value of the land, or will interfere with its sale. A purchaser is not to be compelled to take property, the possession of which he may be compelled to defend by litigation. He should have a title that will enable him to hold his land in peace, and, if he wishes to sell it, be reasonably sure that no flaw or doubt will arise to disturb its market value. Brooklyn Park Comrs. v. Armstrong, 45 N.Y. 234; Striver v. Striver, 86 N.Y. 575, and cases cited; Haltrigal v. Manning, 97 N.Y. 56; Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N.Y. 1, 1 Cent. Rep. 267; Ferry v. Sampson, 113 N.Y. 415; Moore v. Williams, 115 N.Y. 380; Seayne v. Lyon, 67 Pa. 436; Delbo v. Norcross, 24 N.J. Eq. 327.

"If a title depends upon a fact which is not capable of satisfactory proof, a purchaser cannot be compelled to take it." Striver v. Striver, supra.

It was said, however, in Ferry v. Sampson, supra, that "the rule is not absolute that a disputable fact not determined by the judgment is in every case a bar to the enforcement of the sale. It depends in some degree upon discretion. If the existence of the alleged fact which is supposed to cloud the title is a possibility merely, or the alleged outstanding right is a very improbable and remote contingency, which, according to ordinary experience, has no probable basis, the court may compel the purchaser, in such a case, to complete his purchase."

In that case the decisions of the general and special term were reversed, and the purchaser was compelled to take the title, although one to whom the property had been devised by his father's will was not shown to be dead, or, if dead, that he had not left a widow or children surviving him. It was shown, however, that he had not been heard from for forty years before the trial of the action, and if living would have been about sixty-one years of age. If the reasoning of the opinion in the case just cited is to be applied in this case, it would lead to a reversal of the judgment appealed from. In respect only to the length of time that had elapsed since the absent owner was heard from do the cases differ. Here we have a young unmarried man, of feeble health, and of dissipated habits, leaving home from causes unknown. When last seen, he was in a destitute condition and in want of clothing; and for upwards of twenty-four years no one of his family or friends have seen or heard of him. Is it reasonable to suppose that, if living, he would have made no effort to obtain the property that he left behind? The presumption of death does not depend on length of time alone.

Here, as in Ferry v. Sampson, there was a valuable interest in property which, according to common experience, the owner would, if living, have probably asserted and claimed. These circumstances all point to Richardson's death, as in the case cited they indicated the death of Armstrong, the devisee. Ferry v. Sampson is not an authority, however, for anything further than that forty years' absence, under the circumstances there proven, raised a presumption of death. In that respect it is like the case of M'Comb v. Wright, 5 Johns. Ch. 263, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1077, where Chancellor Kent made a similar ruling.

But I am not prepared to decide that a purchaser of real estate should be compelled to take title when there is an outstanding right in a man who, if living, would be only forty-seven years of age, and of whose death there is no evidence except the presumption arising from an absence from his friends of twenty-four years, and his failure to communicate with them and to claim property which he left behind him upon his departure from home. It is very probable that the man is dead. The chances are very largely in favor of that conclusion. But his death is not proven, and the plaintiff's title to the real estate, which necessarily depends upon his death, cannot be said to be free from a reasonable doubt. Why should we compel the purchaser to take all the risk involved in that doubt? There is no title by adverse possession. The only act of his cotenant hostile to his title that appears in the record before us is the deed of his mother and brother, which purported to convey the whole land in April, 1875; and if there has been adverse possession it dates from the delivery of that deed. Culver v. Rhodes, 87 N. Y. 848.

No decision made in this action can bind Richardson or his descendants, if he left any. The cloud on the title would remain, whatever decision the court might make upon the question whether Richardson was or was not living; and the title cannot be made marketable by determining that fact in this action.

In Fleming v. Burnham, supra, it was said: "It would be unjust to compel a purchaser to take a title, the validity of which depended upon a question of fact, when the facts presented upon the application might be changed on a new inquiry, or are open to opposing inferences." That statement is very applicable to this case. Richardson, or some descendant of his, might appear at any time and destroy all the reasoning built upon his absence and abandonment of his property. The parties contracted with reference to a "first-class title." They did not rely upon the agreement which the law would imply to that effect. They expressly stipulated for it. The consideration to be paid for the land was based upon it; and the court should not compel the defendant to execute the contract unless it is clear, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he will receive what he contracted to buy. There must be some point of time, of course, when the presumption of death would arise; but we have been referred to no case in this State in which that presumption has prevailed where the absence was less than forty years. We do not think that it should prevail in this case. The circumstances do not point unequivocally to Richardson's death, and the special term decided correctly in refusing to enforce the contract.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur, except Bradley and Haight, JJ., not sitting.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI, INDIANAPOLIS, ST.
LOUIS & CHICAGO R. CO., Appt.,

v.

Mary O. HOWARD.

(....Ind....)

1. An objection to the admission of evidence in answer to a question propounded to a witness on the ground that it is "improper and incompetent" or that it is "irrelevant and immaterial and does not rebut anything" is too general to raise any question for the consideration of the appellate court.

2. Where a railroad company for the purpose of showing that a train sounded a whistle when it approached a road crossing at which an accident occurred, gives evidence that there were other crossings in the vicinity at which the whistle was also sounded, witnesses living near such other crossings may be permitted to testify that no whistle was sounded near them.

3. A person who was present when others started out upon a drive, during which they came into a collision with a railroad train upon a railroad crossing and were injured, may be permitted to testify as to where they were going, such testimony being part of the res gesta.

4. A party who has answered interrogatories propounded before trial, under a

Rev. Stat. 1891, cannot object to the introduction of the answers in evidence at the trial upon the ground that they are irrelevant.

5. In order to entitle a person injured by a collision with a railway train at a highway crossing to recover damages for such injuries from the company he must show by a preponderance of evidence that both he and his driver vigilantly used their eyes and ears to ascertain if a train was approaching; he has no right to assume that no train is approaching, if his view is obstructed, from the fact that no whistle is sounded, and such fact cannot be considered in determining the question of his negligence.

6. When a person crossing a railroad track is injured by collision with a train the fault is prima facie his own and he must show affirmatively that his fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury before he can recover therefor; this is done, however, if all the facts and circumstances illustrating his conduct at the time of the accident are shown and the inference that he exercised proper caution arises therefrom.

7. The fact that a train is behind time and is running faster than its usual speed does not excuse one attempting to cross the track from exercising all the care and caution required of him when the train is on time and running at its usual speed.

8. Obstructions to sight or hearing in the direction of an approaching train as a traveler upon a highway nears a railroad crossing require increased care on his part, the care required being in proportion to the increase of danger that may come from the use of the highway at such place.

9. An instruction which has no application to the evidence in the case should not be given, although it contains a correct statement of the law in the abstract.

(June 2, 1903.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for Marion County affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servant. Herreed.

The injury resulted from a collision between plaintiff, who was traveling upon a highway, and defendant's train, and was alleged to have been the result of the negligent running of the train.

It was shown at the trial that another road crossed the railroad track about a mile north of the one where the accident occurred, near which was a whistling post. Oliver Klingensmith, who lived about a quarter of a mile from that crossing, was asked by plaintiff, against defendant's objection, with reference to the train which caused the accident:

Q. 27. I will ask you to state whether that train did or did not whistle at the first crossing north of the crossing where the accident occurred?

A. I never heard none.

Mrs. Sarah F. Howard was asked by plaintiff, against defendant's objection, with respect to the parties who were injured:

Q. 17. Where were they going?

A. Well, they started to church.

Q. 18. To what place?

A. To Crooked Creek, to the Baptist Church. The other material facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Morris, Baker, Hord & Hendricks, for appellant:

If there are obstructions to sight the duty exists to use increased care in the use of the sense of hearing.

Bellefontaine R. Co. v. Hunter, 33 Ind. 335; St. Louis & S. N. R. Co. v. Mathias, 50 Ind. 65; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Graham, 95 Ind. 286.

When a person has been killed at a railroad crossing, and there are no witnesses of the accident, the circumstances must be such as to show that the deceased exercised proper care for his own safety. When the circumstances point just as much to the negligence of the deceased as to its absence, or point in neither direction, the plaintiff should be nonsuited.

Cordell v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 75 N. Y. 890; Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co., 84 N. Y. 56.

The burden was upon the plaintiff to establish that there was no contributory negligence.

The fact that a train was behind time, and was running faster than its usual speed, at the crossing, to make up time, did not excuse the plaintiff or her father from exercising the care and caution required of them, when the train was on time and running at its usual rate of speed at that crossing.

If there were any obstructions to sight or hearing in the direction of the approaching train, as the plaintiff and her father neared the crossing, the obstructions required increased care on the part of the plaintiff and her father on approaching the crossing.

28, cited and approved in Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, supra.

Berkshire, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee was the plaintiff below and the appellant the defendant. The gravamen of the action is negligence, and in the complaint there is the proper negation of contributory negligence. The appellant answered in general denial. The cause was submitted to a jury for trial, a verdict returned in favor of the appellee and over a motion for a new trial judgment was rendered upon the verdict. From the judgment at special term an appeal was taken to general term, and from its judgment affirming the judgment in special term this appeal is prosecuted.

Several errors have been assigned, but we are only concerned with certain questions arising out of the court's action in overruling the motion for a new trial. It is not our province to determine whether the 26th question put by the appellee to the witness, John Kissel, and his answer thereto, were or were not improper, for the reason that no specific objection was made to the same. It has been held time and again that a general objection to the admission of evidence in answer to a question propounded to a witness raises no question for our consideration. The objection which we find in the record is that the evidence "is improper and incompetent." This is a stereotyped objection to the admission of offered evidence that is without value for any purpose.

There is no available error in the record as to the ruling of the court in allowing the witness Oliver Klingensmith to answer question 27, propounded to him by the appellee. The objection made was: "We object to it as not rebutting anything, and as incompetent and irrelevant and immaterial, and having nothing to do with the matter."

The objection is too general, but in view of the testimony as to the distance the road crossings were from each other, introduced by the appellant, and the further testimony introduced by the appellee as to the different points at which the whistle was sounded, we are of the opinion that the question and answer were proper.

The illustrations given by counsel for the appellant in their original briefs are not parallel cases. What we have said as to the question put and the answer given thereto by the witness Oliver Klingensmith, applies equally to the question propounded to Francis Mathia, and his answer to the same. The objection to the 21st question asked of Mrs. Sarah F. Howard and her answer thereto is that the evidence "is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial. The objection is unavailing. The objections to questions 17 and 18, propounded to this witness, and her answer thereto, are unavailing. The testimony was not improper. The witness was the mother of the appellee and the wife of Dr. Howard, who lost his life in the accident involved in this controversy. When the husband and daughter left their home, which was also the home of the witness, on the fatal evening, she was present. What was said when they were about to depart as to their destination was not mere hearsay, but was a part of the res gesta. It was pertaining to what afterwards happened. Such testimony is always competent.

The appellee was permitted by the court to introduce in evidence certain answers given to certain interrogatories propounded by the appellee to the appellant.

Section 859 entitled the appellee to propound interrogatories to the appellant relative to the matter in controversy, and required the appellant to answer the same. After the interrogatories had been answered, by virtue of the same section of the Statute, it was the appellee's right to introduce the answers in evidence if she so desired. If the interrogatories were not relevant the appellant should have moved their rejection; if the appellant gave irrelevant answers to the interrogatories that was its own fault, and it cannot complain that they were introduced in evidence.

This brings us to the questions arising in the record because of the instructions given to the jury by the court and those refused.

This is an action to recover damages because of injuries to the appellee occasioned by an accident occurring at a point where appellant's railway crosses a certain highway located in Marion County, Indiana. The appellee and her father, Dr. Howard, were in a buggy drawn by one horse, and were in the act of passing over the railroad track when struck by one of the appellant's locomotive engines pulling a train of cars along its said railroad and across said highway. The correctness of the instructions depends upon the duties and liabilities of the parties under the recognized rules of law in such cases.

And at this point, as well as at any other, we may say that there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the whistle was sounded and the bell rung, as the statute law of the State then required, and, the jury having found that they were not, we are concluded by the finding, and in the further consideration of the case shall take it for granted that the appellant was guilty of negligence contributing to the disaster. This will leave but the one main fact and the questions which are involved relating to it,—the want of contributory negligence on the appellee's part.

In Pathaway v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co., 46 Ind. 25, the following instruction was held to be correct as a statement of the law: "When a person crossing a railroad track is injured by a collision with a train the fault is prima facie his own, and he must show affirmatively that his fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury, before he is entitled to recover for such injury."

Dweller, 108 Ind. 81, 1 West. Rep. 110, it is said: "In cases where contributory negligence may be claimed it is settled in this court that the absence of contributory negligence is part of the plaintiff's case both as to averment and proof."

In Lyons v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 101 Ind. 419, it is said: "It is too well settled to admit of debate that a party who sues for an injury to person or property resulting from negligence must prove that he was himself without negligence. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. v. Hillbauer, 90 Ind. 496, and cases cited."

In Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene, 100 Ind. 279, 3 West. Rep. 883, it is said by this court: "It may suffice to say, since it is the established rule of this court, as it is of the courts in a large majority of the States, that it must be affirmatively shown that the injured party was in the exercise of due care at the time the accident occurred. At least it must be made to appear that want of care on his part in no way contributed to bring about the injury or helped to produce the accident for which compensation is sought."

In view of these authorities the following instructions asked by the appellee and given by the court were erroneous:

"No. 3. A traveler upon a public highway in this State has a right to assume that a railroad company, whose track crosses such highway, will obey the law and give the signals required by law upon the approach of trains to such crossing, and (although the failure to give such signals does not release the traveler from exercising due care), if no such signals are given, and the view is obstructed and there are no indications to the contrary, the traveler is not guilty of contributory negligence in assuming that no train is advancing upon such crossing within eighty rods thereof."

"No. 4. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that there was no negligence upon her part contributing to the injury complained of; but this need not necessarily be shown by directly affirmative evidence, but may be shown by proving the facts and circumstances from which it may be inferred. If all of the circumstances under which the said injury occurred are put in evidence, and upon the examination of them nothing is found to acts or omissions showing contributory negligence, or grounds for suspecting or inferring such negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the inference of care upon her part may be drawn from the absence of all appearance of fault, either positive or negative, on the part of plaintiff, in the circumstances under which the injury was received; and in considering the question of due care on her part, you have a right to take into consideration, together with the other facts and circumstances in the case, the instinct of self-preservation and the known and ordinary disposition of all persons to guard themselves against danger."

"No. 5. It was the duty of the defendant, by its employes in the charge of such train, in approaching said crossing, when not less than eighty (80) nor more than one hundred (100) rods distant therefrom, to sound the whistle on such engine distinctly three (3) times, and to ring the bell upon such engine continuously from the time of sounding such whistle until such engine had fully passed said crossing, and although the failure to give such warning of the approach of such train did not relieve the plaintiff from exercising due care to avoid the injury, yet if no such warning was given, the absence of such warning is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether such care was exercised by the plaintiff."

The second instruction could have led the jury to no other conclusion; if the view was in some way obstructed between that part of the highway over which the appellee was approaching the crossing and the railroad, and there had been a failure to sound the whistle attached to the locomotive engine or ring its bell within eighty rods of the crossing, and if she could have crossed in safety had the approaching train been eighty rods away, she was not guilty of contributory negligence, even though she drove upon the crossing without stopping to look or listen for an approaching train. In other words, from a slight obstruction of the view and a failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle the jury might infer want of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the railroad track under any circumstances which would have made it reasonably safe on the supposition that the engine and train were eighty rods away.

By the fourth instruction the jury are told substantially that if there is nothing in the evidence tending to show contributory negligence they may without proof infer that there was no such negligence.

By the fifth instruction the jury are told that if the whistle was not sounded nor the bell rung, this was a circumstance tending to show want of contributory negligence; and as a logical sequence, if it was a circumstance in that direction, then the jury might have found therefrom that it was sufficient to establish the fact, as it was for them to determine as to the weight of the evidence. This very instruction may have misled the jury and caused them to find want of contributory negligence.

The court should have given instructions numbered three, eight and eleven, or their equivalent, asked by the appellant, as they stated the law correctly and were applicable to the evidence.

"No. 8. The burden is on the plaintiff to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that she and her father vigilantly used their eyes and ears to ascertain if a train of cars was approaching, and if this has not been shown to you by a preponderance of the evidence the plaintiff cannot recover."

"No. 9. When a person crossing a railroad track is injured by collision with a train, the fault is prima facie her own, and she must show affirmatively that her fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury, before she is entitled to recover for such injury."

"No. 11. The fact that the train was behind time, and was running faster than its usual speed, at the crossing to make up time, did not excuse the plaintiff or her father from exercising the care and caution required of them, when the train was on time and running its usual rate of speed at that crossing."

In Allen v. Boston & A. R. Co., 105 Mass. 77, it is said: "Mere proof that the negligence of the defendant was a cause adequate to have produced the injury will not enable a plaintiff to recover, as it does not necessarily give rise to the inference of due care upon his part, proof of which is essential in the case." See Sherlock v. Alling, 44 Ind. 184, 204.

In Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene, supra, it is further said: "The facts and circumstances illustrating the conduct of the injured person at the time of the accident must be made to appear. If from these the inference can be drawn that proper caution was exercised it may then be said the presumption of contributory negligence has been affirmatively removed."

The trial court in that case gave the following instructions: "The allegation that the injury occurred without fault or negligence of the plaintiff's intestate must be proved by the plaintiff; but at the same time it is a negative averment, and if the plaintiff has shown by evidence that the injury occurred as charged, resulting in the death of the plaintiff's intestate, and that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant as charged, without showing any contributory negligence or ground for inferring or reasonably suspecting such negligence, she will be entitled to recover without making direct or affirmative proof on that subject. In the absence of circumstances to show or suggest it there is no presumption of contributory negligence."

This instruction was held to be erroneous, and the court said, speaking of the appellant: "He must show the facts, as well those which relate to his share in the transaction as those which relate to the defendants, and if upon the whole case the inference of negligence arises against the defendant, and of due care on his part, he may recover. The fact that a person traveling on a highway comes in collision with a train on a railway crossing is of itself sufficient to suggest a presumption of contributory negligence against him in a suit for compensation." Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, and Hathaway v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. supra. See Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Bressanum, 78 Ind. 420, upon the last proposition above.

It is the rule that a person before crossing a railroad track must stop, look and listen, and applies to pedestrians as well as to others. Allen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 130 Pa. 250; Butler v. Gettysburg & H. R. Co. 126 Pa. 160.

In Allen v. Maine Cent. R. Co. (Me.), 19 Atl. Rep. 105, it is said: "The evidence shows that at twenty-five or thirty feet from the crossing the approaching train from Bath might have been seen by the plaintiff several hundred feet distant from the crossing. The plaintiff did not look in that direction until his horse's fore feet were between the rails. Was the neglect on his part to look in that direction a want of ordinary care and prudence? Is a traveler justified in traveling upon a railroad crossing in the absence of safety signals giving him the right to cross without looking for an approaching train? It has been many times decided by this court that the traveler before crossing a railroad must look and listen? If the crossing at which the plaintiff was injured is so constructed that an approaching train cannot be seen until a traveler comes very near to the railroad track, common prudence requires him to approach at such speed that when an approaching train may be seen he may be able to stop and allow such train to pass." To the same effect are our own cases. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, supra, and cases cited; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene, supra. See, upon these different propositions, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hodges, 118 Ind. 5; Conas v. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. 114 Ind. 328, 14 West. Rep. 101; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Hill, 117 Ind. 56; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pinckin, 112 Ind. 509, 11 West. Rep. 347; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hammock, 118 Ind. 1, 12 West. Rep. 297.

In the light of these authorities the following instruction requested by the appellee and given by the court was erroneous:

"No. 8. There is no rule of law which requires a traveler upon a public highway in approaching a railroad crossing to stop his team still. But, in determining the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence it is for you to say whether the course pursued by the plaintiff was such as would have been adopted by an ordinarily cautious and prudent person, in the exercise of reasonable care to avoid injury, under the facts and circumstances in this case as disclosed by the evidence. And I leave it for you to say whether there were such obstructions to the view of the train that did the injury, and such lack of warning on the part of defendant of its approach, as would lead an ordinarily cautious and prudent man, in the exercise of reasonable care to avoid injury, to believe that no train was approaching within such distance of the crossing as to make his endeavor to pass the same dangerous."

From this instruction the jury could well infer, if it appeared that there was some lack of warning, that the train was approaching the crossing and that the view between the appellee and the approaching train was obstructed, that it then became a question for their determination as to whether such lack of warning, together with the obstructed view, were sufficient to lead a person of ordinary prudence and judgment to the conclusion that there was no train approaching within such a distance as to render it unsafe for the appellee and her father to attempt to pass over the track, and if so, then they were not guilty of negligence in attempting to pass over without first stopping and exercising their senses of hearing and sight. In our opinion instruction number fifteen, asked by the appellant, contained a correct statement of the law, and should have been given. This instruction reads thus:

"No. 15. If there were any obstructions to sight or hearing in the direction of the approaching train, as the plaintiff and her father neared the crossing, the obstructions required increased care on the part of the plaintiff and her father on approaching the crossing. In such case the care must be in proportion to the increase of the danger that may come from the use of the highway at such a place."

When applied to the evidence in the case all of the foregoing instructions asked by the appellant were exceedingly pertinent as well as proper.

While we do not condemn instruction numbered one, asked by the appellee, and given by the court in the abstract, we think that there was no evidence which made it pertinent, and that it was calculated to mislead the jury. The said instruction is as follows:

"No 1. If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by the defendant's train while traveling upon a public highway, as alleged in her complaint, that the whistle was not sounded and the bell rung as required by law, as said train approached said crossing, and that plaintiff was misled by defendant's failure to give such warning, and without fault or negligence on her part, and, without notice of the approach of said train, was placed in a position of great peril, and, in the excitement of that peril, and in the effort to escape, made a mistake as to the proper course to be pursued, and injury resulted, such error of judgment is not contributory negligence, and will not bar a recovery by her for the injury sustained."

We may add further that we find no evidence tending to rebut contributory negligence on the appellee's part,—in view of the authorities, not a circumstance.

As to the circumstances which found the appellant and her father on the crossing when the misfortune overtook them, the evidence is an entire blank. Whether or not they saw the train approaching, or heard the sound which a moving train gives out, and were deceived as to the distance it was from them and attempted to cross the track notwithstanding, we do not know. The rate of speed at which they approached the crossing, and whether or not they stopped and exercised their senses of hearing and sight, are facts which do not appear in the evidence.

In view of the authorities which we have cited, and especially the cases of Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene and Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, supra, the case at bar seems to have been tried upon a theory entirely erroneous.

The case of Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Martin, 113 Ind. 476, and relied upon by the appellee, is not in harmony with our earlier cases and is out of line with those more recent, the later cases following the earlier ones, and upon the questions involved in the present case cannot be regarded as authority since the case of Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, supra.

The judgment must be reversed.

LUCKY COAL MINES, Pl. in Rev.,
v.
CHICAGO, WILMINGTON & VERMILION COAL CO.
(231 Ill. 6.)

1. No exception can be made from the right allowed by Rev. Stat., chap. 77, § 22, of redemption from sale under execution, decree, etc., in the case of a sale, on a creditor's bill, of both the real and personal property of an insolvent mining corporation, at least where the severance of the personal property from the real estate will not materially impair its value or usefulness, although the property is more available and valuable when in combination, and although a large expense will be necessary to keep the mines from deterioration during the period of redemption, when no one can be permitted to operate them.

2. A court, by requiring conveyance to its receiver in a creditor's suit of real property which might have been seized and sold on an execution at law, cannot thereby take it out of the operation of the Statute in relation to redemption.

WILSON, J., dissents.

(October 31, 1888.)

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Second District, to review a judgment affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Will County directing the sale of defendant's property without privilege of redemption. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Monroe and George H. Locey, for plaintiff in error:

The sale of the entire property of the corporation without redemption would be improper.

Rev. Stat. chap. 77, §§ 16-18; Stone v. Gardner, 20 Ill. 209; Switzerland v. Com. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 20 Ill. 463; Wetherbee v. Misch, 4 West. Rep. 220, 117 Ill. 67; Pavia & S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 108 Ill. 187; Hammock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. 105 U. S. 77 (26 L. ed. 1111).

Mr. George S. House, for defendant in error:

Where property will sell for more as a unit than if sold separately, it may be sold together.

McLean County Bank v. Flagg, 31 Ill. 200; Rev. Stat. 1845, chap. 57; Hammock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. 105 U. S. 77 (26 L. ed. 1111).

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a creditor's bill, brought by the Chicago, Wilmington & Vermillion Coal Company against the Locey Coal Mines, to enforce the collection of a certain judgment at law against the defendant.

It appears from the bill, which, for want of an answer, was taken pro confesso and from the proofs adduced at the hearing, that on the 8th day of February, 1887, the complainant obtained a judgment against the defendant by confession for $8,908.65 and costs, and that execution issued on said judgment has been returned wholly unsatisfied.

It further appears that the defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of this State for the purpose of carrying on the business of mining and selling coal, and that, in the prosecution of its business, it had acquired, and at the time of filing said bill held and owned, certain mining lands situate in Bureau County, consisting of 280.81 acres, and, in addition thereto, the coal under 211.71 acres of other land adjoining, and had sunk upon said land a coal-mining shaft and an escapement or air-shaft, and erected some thirty dwelling-houses, a boarding-house, a store house, and various other buildings, and set a steam-engine, steam boiler, coal-boasting apparatus and machinery, pumps, coal-car tracks, railroad and switch tracks, screens, pit scales and car scales, and constructed on the Illinois River a loading dock, and procured for the transportation of coal one coal boat and a steam barge or towing boat,—all of which were desirable and necessary for carrying on its business of mining and selling coal. This property was owned by the defendant subject to a trust deed executed by the defendant to Charles S. Hinchman, to secure the payment of $30,000 and interest, and also a mortgage to Edward Lewis to secure the payment of $1,888.85.

The bill further alleges that the defendant has carried on its business at a large expense, and has acquired a valuable trade for its mining products and a standing in the market which should not be lost, that the defendant's property is of that character that its chief value consists in maintaining it as it now exists, for the transaction of the business for which it was brought together, and that the interests of all concerned will be better promoted by preserving all of said property as a unit; that the defendant is greatly embarrassed financially, and is unable to meet its debts due and to become due, and that the interests on said incumbrances remain due and unpaid; that the defendant is about $7,000 in arrears in the payment of the wages of its miners, and has no means with which to pay the same; and that, by reason of such nonpayment, said miners have quit their work and refuse to resume the same until proper arrangements are made for the payment of their wages.

Upon the filing of said bill an order was entered, the defendant by its counsel consenting thereto, appointing a receiver and requiring the defendant to turn over to such receiver all its assets and property, and by the same order the receiver was directed to continue the defendant's business of mining and selling coal. In pursuance of said order, the defendant conveyed and transferred to the receiver all of its said property, and the latter thereupon entered into possession and undertook to carry on the business of operating the mine. To enable him to commence operations, an order was entered, on his petition, authorizing him to borrow $10,000 and issue receiver's certificates therefor; and the money thus borrowed was expended in paying the operatives their arrearages and in defraying the expenses of continuing the business.

On petition of the defendant, the receiver was authorized to buy 800 acres more of mining rights, which purchase was accordingly made at a cost of $8,200. Subsequently the complainant, having become the owner of the indebtedness secured by the $30,000 deed of trust, and also all of the certificates then issued by the receiver, filed its petition asking for an order authorizing the receiver to borrow a further sum, to be expended in improvements of said property, and offering in advance the same on receiver's certificates; and, the defendant consenting thereto, an order was entered in accordance with the prayer of said petition, and in pursuance of said order the receiver borrowed of the complainant the sum of $15,900.

Said cause coming on for hearing on the bill taken as confessed, a large amount of evidence was introduced as to the value of the property and assets of the defendant in the hands of the receiver, said evidence being to a very large degree conflicting. The decree found "that the property is of that kind and character, all so related to the other, and thus gathered together and obtained for the transaction of the business of the mining and sale of coal.

that the said property cannot well be sold separately without manifest injury to the interests of all interested therein, and that all said property, including the personal property on hand at the time of sale, of every kind and character, should be sold as an entirety and as one property,—as a unit,—to better conserve the interests of all parties interested therein, that the value of all of said property rights does not exceed the sum of $80,000, and that the said corporation defendant is entirely insolvent and wholly unable to pay its debts, that the claims now existing against the said corporation defendant, now proven in this cause, together with the expenses, costs and charges still likely to accrue and arise under the receiver, will reach the sum of at least $85,000, and the property is of that kind and character that, for its proper preservation, its operation as a coal mine is absolutely necessary and essential, that its continued operation under a receiver is not only unwise and injudicious, but may be greatly prejudicial to the rights and interests of the creditors of said corporation, and that all said property, both real and personal, should be sold without unreasonable delay, and on account of the property and its value, as compared with the claims due, and the scant security thus afforded for such claims, it should be sold without redemption and free and clear of any and all claims of any and all parties to this cause, whether intervenors or otherwise."

Said decree has been affirmed by the appellate court, and the record is now brought here by writ of error. The errors assigned in this court relate, first, to that portion of the decree which orders the sale of the real estate in question without redemption; and, second, to that portion of the decree which finds the value of all the property in question to be only $80,000. The second assignment of error does not seem to be insisted upon; and the only question, therefore, presented for our consideration is whether the circuit court properly ordered the sale of the real estate without redemption.

There can be no question that the property transferred to the receiver, and which the decree ordered to be sold, is, in the main, real property. Such is, of course, the character of the 280.81 acres of land to which the defendant had obtained the title in fee, and that character appertains, not only to the soil and the buildings erected thereon, but to the coal lying beneath the surface, and the various shafts and mines by means of which the coal is reached and the mining operations carried on. The right which the defendant had acquired prior to the filing of the bill to the coal under the 211.71 acres is an interest in land, and is in its nature real property. The same is true of the mining rights acquired by the receiver under the order of the court. The thirty dwelling houses, the boarding house, the store house and the other buildings are all, presumptively at least, parts of the realty. The same thing may perhaps be said of the engine and boiler, railroad and switch tracks, coal tracks, docks and most of the other apparatus and machinery erected upon and attached to the land for the purpose of carrying on the defendant's mining operations. There is, it is true, a considerable amount of property owned by the defendant, and procured by it for use in and about its mines, which is in its nature personal property. Of this character is its machinery, not so attached to the soil as to become fixtures, its tools, boats, mules and the stock of goods in the defendant's store. All of these, however, constitute relatively but a small portion of the entire mining establishment, as the inventory of the movable property shows that the goods in the store amounted only to $1,915.31 in value, the mining property to only $1,924, and the boats only $682.40. The bill alleges, and the decrees find, that the various portions of the entire property are so related to each other, and the business purpose for which it is chiefly valuable is such, that the best interests of all concerned will be best promoted by having the entire property kept together and treated as a unit. This is because its principal value consists in its being operated as a coal mine. Upon this feature of the case there was no controversy at the hearing, and there need be none now. We are of the opinion, however, that the conclusions sought to be drawn from it do not necessarily follow.

It need not be questioned that a division of the mining lands embraced in the decree into a number of parcels, and selling them in such parcels, would not be the best course to pursue in order to realize the highest price. Such division would doubtless greatly impair, if not altogether destroy, the value of said lands as mining lands. The expense of sinking the necessary shafts, and erecting and supplying proper machinery and appliances, is doubtless too great to make mining profitable if limited to a small tract of land. In case the lands in question should be divided, and go into the hands of several proprietors, this large expense would need to be incurred upon each tract, in order to make it available as mining property. It may therefore be admitted that, in order to obtain the highest price, the mining lands of the defendant, including the shafts, mines, buildings, machinery and other improvements appertaining to the realty, should be sold together, and not in parcels. But, so far as we are able to perceive, the same considerations do not necessarily apply to the comparatively small amount of personal property of the defendant which it has purchased and brought together for use in and about the mines. If that should be sold separately, and thus go into the hands of a purchaser different from the one who buys the mines, there would be no material injury thereby occasioned to the mines, or to the parties interested therein, more other personal property equally serviceable could doubtless be obtained in the market at its fair cash value. Such would unquestionably be the case with the stock of goods, the tools, portable machinery, mules, and indeed all the goods and chattels which may be said to form a part of the property appurtenant to the mines. It does not necessarily follow, therefore, that the case presents any such combination of real and personal property into an indissoluble unit as will make it impracticable to sell each species of property separately, and in accordance with the general rules of law applicable thereto, without destroying or greatly impairing the value of the entire property.

Our present Statute provides that, when any real estate is sold by virtue of an execution, judgment or decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, or enforcement of a mechanic's lien or vendor's lien, or for the payment of money, it shall be the duty of the sheriff, master in chancery or other officer making the sale to deliver to the purchaser a certificate entitling him to a deed in case the property is not redeemed within the statutory period of redemption. Rev. Stat. chap. 77, § 18.

The language of the Statute is imperative, and seems to contemplate no exceptions. Why, then, should the real estate, which constitutes the great bulk of the property in question, be sold without redemption? In support of the decree authorizing such sale, we are referred to Hammock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 105 U. S. 77 [20 L. ed. 1111], and Perris & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 108 Ill. 187. These were suits in chancery, each brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by a railway company, conveying its railroad, with the appurtenances, franchises, equipments, tools, incomes, assets and property belonging thereto, then possessed or thereafter acquired by the company, and in each case a decree for the sale of the entire mortgaged property as a unit, and without redemption, was sustained. This conclusion was reached upon the theory that, while a railway track, considered by itself, was real estate, yet, when viewed in connection with its public character and the franchises usually connected with it, it could not be regarded as lands and tenements within the meaning of the Statute. On this point, in Perris & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, it is said: "A number of reasons suggest themselves to us why they should not be so considered. In the first place, when a railway, its appurtenances, privileges and franchises, are mortgaged as a whole, there is, in our opinion, no power or authority to sell them separately. From the very nature of the property, one would be useless without the other. The franchise could not be used at all without the road, and the road could not lawfully be used, as against the State, without the franchise. Under such circumstances, to avoid the possibility of conflicting ownerships, the law has wisely determined that both must be sold as an entirety."

Again, "While a railroad franchise, when considered by itself, will be treated as personal property, and the road itself, when so viewed, will be treated as realty, yet, when considered as an entirety, as they must be when so mortgaged and sold, they are, strictly speaking, neither the one nor the other, within the meaning of the law pertaining to redemptions. From a sale of land a redemption is allowed; from a sale of personal property no such redemption is permitted. And since the two are indissolubly combined, by virtue of the mortgage, decree and sale, there is just as much reason, so far as the question depends upon the two kinds of property, when separately considered, for contending the right of redemption is denied, as there is that it is given."

A further consideration bearing upon the question is drawn from the public character of railway companies. On that point it is said: "In view of the public character of the road, it will not be questioned that the public generally have a direct interest in keeping it continuously open, without any material diminution of its capacity to meet all the legitimate wants of the public. It is therefore but just and proper that the foreclosure proceedings should be conducted in such a manner, having due regard to the private interests of all parties concerned, as to cause the least possible injury or inconvenience to the public, and we are of opinion that this will be more effectually accomplished by the method adopted than it can be in any other way. To have ordered a sale of the personal property separately, from which it is conceded there would be no redemption, and a sale of the realty with the right of redemption, as is claimed should have been done, it would most likely have resulted either in a sacrifice of the property, or some portion of it, or in embarrassing complications seriously affecting, at least for a while, the public interests."

It is clear that very little, if any, of the foregoing reasoning can have an application to the present case. Here there is no question of a franchise, the existence and exercise of which are essential to the legal use and enjoyment of the tangible property. No personal property is involved, the severance of which from the real estate will materially impair the value or usefulness of the latter. No question arises of any public use, nor has the public any interest in the continued operation of the mines, beyond what it has in the continued prosecution of any other private business enterprise. Every circumstance which may be held to take the case out of the operation of the statutory mandate, which requires judicial sales of real property to be made subject to the statutory right of redemption, seems to be wanting. While we are disposed to adhere to the doctrine of the cases above cited, we are not inclined to extend the rule there laid down to cases which do not come clearly within the reasons upon which the rule is based. The mere fact that real and personal property are so brought together in a particular business enterprise, and are so related to each other, as to be more available and more valuable in combination than when taken separately, will not of itself authorize the sale of both as a unit without redemption. If this were otherwise, the right of redemption which the Statute gives in all ordinary cases of judicial sales of real property might be denied or set aside almost with impunity. Thus, in case of a farm well stocked with domestic animals, agricultural implements and other chattel property specially adapted to its profitable tillage, we might have a combination of real and personal property more valuable when treated as a unit than when separated. A well-furnished house, with carpets, furniture and other belongings specially purchased, adapted and fitted for use in such house, would constitute a combination of real and personal property more valuable to the proprietor, and more available, perhaps, for sale, if it could be sold as a single item of property. But it has never been held that in either of these cases the real estate becomes anything but real estate, and subject to judicial sale as such. Nor has it ever been held that a separation of the personal from the real property would be unauthorized, even though its effect would be to essentially diminish the market value of both. So long as the law recognizes the distinction between these two classes of property, and subjects them to different rules, those rules must apply, and cannot be dispensed with by the courts, even though their application may work some inconvenience.

It is suggested as a further argument ad inconveniens, in support of the decree, that, if the statutory redemption is allowed, neither the receiver, the defendant nor the purchaser can be permitted to mine coal after the sale, and while the period of redemption is running; and that, in order to keep the mines from deterioration and injury during that period, the water must be kept out, fresh air supplied, etc., at a cost of about $400 per month. This expense should not be borne by the receiver, as he can no longer work the mines, since his doing so would simply be a subtraction or taking away of a portion of the property sold. The defendant, being insolvent and presumably unable in any event to redeem, would have no inducement to incur such expense, since, for the same reason above stated, it could not be permitted to operate the mines during the period of redemption. The purchaser, on the other hand, would be entitled to possession only after the period of redemption has expired, and so could not legally enter upon the mines for the purpose of protecting them from deterioration. Those inconveniences doubtless may arise, but they do not, in our opinion, justify the court in disregarding or overriding a plain and positive mandate of the Statute. Inconveniences the same in character, though perhaps less in degree, not unfrequently grow out of the possession and use of real estate during the period of redemption; but the Statute is general in its terms, and makes no exceptions because of them.

Counsel also seek to sustain the decree on the ground that the court, through the receiver, had the entire control of both the equitable and legal title to the real estate in question, and could dispose of it in such manner as it saw fit. Said property was conveyed to the receiver by the defendant in obedience to an order of the court requiring such conveyance. It is true, said order was entered with the consent of the defendant; but the validity and effect of the order, and the power of the court to enter it, in no way depended upon such consent. The control which the court obtained over the property was no different or greater than it would have been if the order had been entered as the result of adversary proceedings, and against the opposition and protest of the defendant. The question then arises, whether, on a creditor's bill, a court, by requiring real property, which might have been seized and sold on an execution at law, to be conveyed to a receiver, can thereby take it out of the operation of the Statute in relation to redemption. A creditor's bill may be viewed as a species of process for the execution and enforcement of a judgment at law, and it is difficult to see why real property seized and sold in that proceeding should not be subject to redemption the same as when sold on execution. Our present Statute is somewhat broader than the one previously in force. The former Statute seemed to limit the right of redemption to sales upon execution upon foreclosure decrees, and proceedings to enforce mechanic's liens; but by the Revision of 1874 it is made to apply to all cases of real estate sold "by virtue of an execution, judgment or decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, or the enforcement of a mechanic's lien or vendor's lien, or for the payment of money;" and it is made the duty of the sheriff, master in chancery or other officer making the sale to execute to the purchaser a certificate of purchase made expressly subject to the right of redemption. It seems very clear that the Statute, since the Revision, is broad enough to embrace cases like the present. The sale ordered by the decree is to be made by an officer of the court, viz., the receiver, and is to be made for the payment of money, viz., the amount due on the complainant's judgment. In no view we are able to take of the case can the decree be sustained. It should have provided for the sale of the real estate separately, and subject to the statutory right of redemption.

The judgment of the Appellate Court and the decree of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the latter court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Wilkin, J., dissenting:

I do not concur. I think the evidence in the record fully justified the finding of the circuit court, and that in such a case a court of equity may properly order property belonging to a corporation, used by it in carrying on its corporate business, to be sold as a unit, and without redemption, notwithstanding a part of such property may be real estate. It is unlike a case in which individual property is ordered sold.

Petition for rehearing denied.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANAPOLIS NATURAL GAS CO. of al.

(....Ind....)

1. Pipes for the transportation of natural gas cannot be laid in a country road without making compensation to the owner of the fee, although the right to do so has been granted by the board of county commissioners.

2. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the use of pipes laid in a highway for the transportation of natural gas, at the instance of the owner of the fee, who has received no compensation, where he knowingly permitted the work to proceed under a license from the board of county commissioners until large sums of money had been expended and it would be ruinous to the company to stop it, and where many citizens have acquired rights on the faith of the successful completion of the work, especially where compensation can be recovered by the land owner in an appropriate action for that purpose.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the use of pipes laid in a country road for the transportation of gas without making compensation to the owner of the fee. Affirmed.

NOTE.—See Opinion of the Justices (Mem.) ante, 591.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. New, S. E. Urnston and Stephenson & Fertig for appellant.

Messrs. Kane & Davis for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of commissioners of Hamilton County granted to the Indianapolis Natural Gas Company the right to lay pipes in a free gravel road constructed under the Statute of this State at the expense of the land owners. The appellant is an abutting owner in fee of land along the line of the highway. Prior to the time this suit was brought the Company had constructed a system of gas works and had laid in the highway a line of pipes for the purpose of supplying the citizens of the City of Indianapolis and others with natural gas. In the prosecution of this work the Company had expended many thousands of dollars. To make the system effective and to successfully supply gas, as it had undertaken to do, it became necessary for the Company to extend its line of pipes so as to connect its main line and system with additional gas wells, which it had drilled and of which it was the owner. This it was undertaking to do at the time the appellant sued out the injunction issued in this case. The trial court dissolved the temporary injunction and refused to grant a perpetual injunction. From this judgment the appellant prosecutes his appeal.

The license granted by the board of commissioners was effectual to convey the right of the county, such as it had, in the highway, but it did not affect private property rights. Burham v. Lawrenceburg (this term).

The owner of the fee in a suburban highway has a special proprietary right distinct from that of the public, and this right cannot be taken without compensation. In a case decided in 1855 it was held that abutters have a private right distinct from that of the public, which even the Legislature cannot take away except to appropriate to a public use upon payment of compensation. Indianapolis v. Orcas, 7 Ind. 9.

This doctrine has been steadily adhered to by this court. Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 88; Cas v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 48 Ind. 179; Pettie v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 139; State v. Berdette, 78 Ind. 185; Ross v. Thompson, 78 Ind. 90; Cummins v. Seymour, 79 Ind. 491; Logansport v. Shurt, 80 Ind. 568; Indianapolis v. Kingsbury, 101 Ind. 211; Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Bissell, 108 Ind. 113, 6 West. Rep. 263; Rensselaer v. Leopold, 108 Ind. 29, 8 West. Rep. 374; Lafayette v. Nagle, 118 Ind. 435, 12 West. Rep. 687.

The rule declared by our own cases is in harmony with the very ancient and well-settled rule that the public acquires, except in cases where the seizure of the fee is authorized, nothing more than a right to pass and repass, and the great weight of authority sustains the doctrine laid down by our decisions.

There is an essential distinction between urban and suburban highways, and the rights of abutters are much more limited in the case of urban streets than they are in the case of suburban ways. We note the distinction between the classes of public ways and declare that the servitude in the one class is much broader than it is in the other, but it is not necessary to bear mark with particularity the difference between the two classes of public ways, for we are here concerned only with suburban ways.

Subject to the right of the public the owner of the fee of a rural road retains all right and interest in it. He remains the owner, and, as such, his rights are very comprehensive. Brookville & M. Hydraulic Co. v. Butler, 31 Ind. 130; Shelbyville & R. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 60 Ind. 214; Donelson v. Payne, 2 Ill. Bl. 537; Pick v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103; Presbyterian Society v. Auburn & R. R. Co. 3 Ill. 567.

That the appellant has a special private interest in the lands upon which the highway is located, which cannot be taken from him without compensation, is quite clear upon principle and authority.

The appropriation of the land for a rural highway did not entitle the local officers to use it for any other than highway purposes, although they did acquire a right to use it for all purposes legitimately connected with the local system of highways. A use for any other than a legitimate highway purpose is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, inasmuch as it imposes an additional burden upon the land; and whenever land is subjected to an additional burden the owner is entitled to compensation. The authorities, although not very numerous, are harmonious, upon the question that laying gas pipes in a suburban road is the imposition of an additional burden, and that compensation must be made to the owner. Bloomfield & R. N. Gas Light Co. v. Calkins, 63 N. Y. 186, 1 Thomp. & C. 349; Bloomfield & R. N. Gas Light Co. v. Richardson, 63 Barb. 437; Stump's App 116 Pa. 35, 3 Cent. Rep. 119; Wabash v. Ohio Gas Fuel Co. 16 West. L. Bull. 121.

The same principle is declared in the cases which hold that drainage pipes cannot be laid in rural highways except for public drainage purposes connected with the system of highways. Murray v. Gibson, 31 Ill. App. 428; Indianapolis, R. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 37 Ill. 439; Board of Trade Tel. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507.

The cases to which we have referred are well reasoned and are founded on solid principle. We have no hesitation in concluding that the laying of the pipes in the highway was a taking of the appellant's property within the meaning of the Constitution, and that he is entitled to compensation.

It does not follow, however, that a land owner entitled to compensation for property appropriated to a public use can always maintain injunction. It remains, therefore, to inquire and decide whether the appellant can maintain this suit, for if he is not entitled to an injunction he cannot succeed.

The use to which the line of the highway was appropriated was a public one. There can be no doubt that the work of supplying cities with natural gas is a public one for which property may be appropriated under the right of eminent domain. State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & M. Co. 120 Ind. 575; Overthurs v. Philadelphia Co.

118 Pa. 408, 11 Cent. Rep. 48; Pennsylvania Natural Gas Co. v. Cook, 128 Pa. 170; Johnston's App. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 561.

There was an assertion of a right to use the highway, and the Gas Company had expended large sums of money on the faith of the license granted to it by the board of commissioners. It had assumed to use the highway for a public purpose, and many citizens had acquired rights upon the faith of the successful and effective prosecution and conduct of the work and business undertaken by the Company. The appellant, with knowledge of the facts, made no objection until the completion of the main line and system, but delayed until they had been completed and then asked for an injunction. To grant the relief he seeks will, it is clearly inferable, seriously impair the rights of the public as well as those of the Gas Company. We are satisfied that, upon the case made by the evidence, the appellant is not entitled to an injunction. In adjudging that he has no right to an injunction we do not hold that he may not in a proper case recover damages for the invasion of his legal rights. What we here decide is that the case made is not one justifying resort to the extraordinary remedy of injunction. The effect of our decision is that he has mistaken his remedy.

The work in which the Gas Company is engaged is one in which the general community have an interest, and to arrest the work by injunction would do great injury to many citizens. Persons other than the Gas Company have an interest, and they are so numerous that it is the duty of the courts to protect that interest where it can be done without materially impairing the rights of any private citizen; and that can be done in this instance, for the appellant, in the appropriate action, and upon making a proper case, can be fully compensated in damages for all injury that he may have suffered. There is present here an element of public policy which exerts a controlling influence. The good of the community forbids that one who occupies such a position as the appellant does should be permitted to arrest work essential to the successful discharge of the Company's duty to supply the community with fuel in the form of natural gas. Public policy, as has been demonstrated in analogous cases, requires that the rights of the community should be protected and the land owner left to his remedy at law. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Beck, 119 Ind. 124, Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Soltschella, 116 Ind. 259; Brasard v. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. 115 Ind. 1, 14 West. Rep. 817; Sherlock v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 115 Ind. 22, 14 West. Rep. 843; Midland R. Co. v. Smith, 118 Ind. 203, 12 West. Rep. 600, Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 119 Ind. 581, 12 West. Rep. 987.

Nor does this rule operate unjustly, for the land owner is not deprived of compensation; on the contrary, the right to compensation is left open to him, and it is his own fault if he does not recover full compensation for all the loss he has actually sustained. Blended with the element of public policy is another influential one, and that is this: The appellant, without objection, knowingly permitted the work to proceed until it reached a stage at which it would be ruinous to the Company, which had invested such large sums of money, to stop it by injunction. These two elements in their combined strength certainly make a case in which an injunction should, upon plain principles of equity, be denied. Lepansport v. Uhl, 90 Ind. 534-544; Dodge v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 48 N. J. Eq. 851, 10 Cent. Rep. 635, 36 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 180.

Judgment affirmed.

MIDLAND R. CO., Appt.,

v.

JAMES FISHER.

(...Ind....)

1. A purchaser, at a foreclosure sale, of a railroad company's interest under a deed granting it a right of way over certain lands in which is incorporated, as part of the consideration therefor, an agreement by the company to build a fence, is bound to carry out the agreement; and its liability to do so may be enforced by a subsequent grantee of the fee in an action of covenant, although the company merely accepted the deed without acknowledging it.

NOTE.—Deed-poll defined.

A deed made by one party only, as a sheriff, the edges of the instrument being "polled," or shaven even, is a deed-poll. Anderson, Dist. Sec. 2 Ill. Com. 200; Otis v. Pratt, 3 Hill, L. 488.

A deed-poll is designed simply to transfer the grantor's interest, and is executed by him alone. 3 Washb. Real Prop. 811; Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Mich.

A deed-poll is in the first person, while deeds of indenture are in the third person; but although the deed is in the form of an indenture, it will be good as a deed-poll if the grantor executes it alone. Hallett v. Collins, 31 U. S. 10 How. 174 (23 L. ed. 578); Hipp v. Huchett, 4 Tex. 28.

A deed-poll releases all the estoppels necessary for the protection of the grantor's interest. Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 604.

It seems that the grantee in a deed-poll is bound by covenants therein to be performed by him; and an action of covenant may be maintained against him. The acceptance of the deed and enjoyment of the estate estop him and those claiming under him from denying his covenants, and from denying that the seal attached is his as well as that of the grantor. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 64 N. Y. 28.

In some of the States where the common-law pleading still prevails, the action of the grantor for nonperformance of the duties reserved in a deed-poll must be assumpsit, and the promise, being raised by the law, is not within the Statute of Frauds. Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass. 510; Jackson v. Matadorf, 11 Johns. 91; Jackson v. Mills, 12 Johns. 402; Jackson v. Morse, 16 Johns. 197; Allen v. Pryor, 2 A. K. Marsh. 208; Hills v. Elliot, 12 Mass. 28; Fletcher v. McFarlane, 12 Mass. 48; Nugent v. Riley, 1 Met. 117; Newell v. Hill, 3 Met. 180; Kinsdale v. Humphrey, 18 Conn. 611; Johnson v. Muzzy, 4 Vt. 419; Maule v. Weaver, 7 Pa. 203. But see Black v. Black, 4 Pick. 234; Boyd v. Stone, 11 Mass. 343.

But in the code States this distinction has passed away with the abolition of specific forms of action. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 64 N. Y. 28.

Whether covenant can be brought in any case against a person who has not become a party to the deed by signing and sealing, see Harper v. Burgh, 3 Lev. 208; Burnett v. Lynch, 4 Barn. & C. 208.

2. A deed-poll, when accepted by the grantee, becomes the mutual act of the parties, and the grantee is as much bound by its covenants as the grantor is.

3. The acceptance, by the grantee, of a deed-poll gives it the effect of a written contract in respect to the obligations assumed by him, and it will be so regarded in determining the bar of the Statute of Limitations.

(June 18, 1880.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce an alleged agreement to build a fence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry Crawford and M. A. Chipman for appellant.

Messrs. Stephenson & Fortig for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In May, 1873, the then owners of the land described in the appellee's complaint conveyed to the Anderson, Lebanon & St. Louis Railway Company a right of way. In consideration of the grant of the right of way the company, by an agreement incorporated in the deed, promised to construct a board fence five boards in height on each side of the railroad as soon as it should be completed. The deed conveying the right of way was signed by the grantors, but not by the grantees. The railroad was completed in 1876, and the action was brought in 1886. In 1876 the company mortgaged all of its property and rights, and in 1883 the mortgage was foreclosed by a decree of the circuit court of the United States. A sale of all of the property and franchises of the company was made upon the decree of foreclosure, and the Midland Railway Company purchased all of the rights of the mortgagor. Under the title thus acquired the Midland Company entered into possession and began to operate the road purchased by it as soon as it acquired title. No fence had been erected as provided in the deed granting the right of way. Fisher became the owner of the land in August, 1884.

The contention of the appellant's counsel is that its client did not become liable for the general debts of its predecessor, and that the debt which the appellee seeks to enforce is a general debt. We agree with counsel that the rule is that a corporation which succeeds to the property and rights of another corporation through the medium of a sale upon a decree of foreclosure is not responsible for the general debts of the corporation whose property and franchises it acquires. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Ind. 493; Hoard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 123 U. S. 223 [31 L. ed. 180]; Gilman v. Shaboyon & P. du L. R. Co. 37 Wis. 817.

But we cannot agree that the assumption that the claim of the appellee is a mere general debt is valid, for we regard the performance of the agreement to build a fence as a condition of the right to enjoy the easement granted by the owners of the land. The right which the appellee seeks to enforce is more than a general claim for money, for it is a right blended with that of the appellant to use and occupy the land with its track. The appellant's liability does not rest upon the claim against the old company, but upon the duty which arises out of the occupancy of the land. It cannot, in equity, be permitted to enjoy the easement and yet refuse to perform the agreement which created and conferred the easement.

We think the principle declared in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, supra; Bloomfield R. Co. v. Van Sike, 107 Ind. 480, 5 West. Rep. 655; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 484, 5 West. Rep. 807; Bloomfield R. Co. v. Grace, 119 Ind. 125, 11 West. Rep. 368, Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 119 Ind. 304, 12 West. Rep. 910, and Donald v. St. Louis, K. O. & N. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 411,—governs this phase of the case. The appellant is in the possession of the right of way as the grantee of the original contractor, and it must take the benefit it enjoys subject to the burden annexed to it by the contract which gave existence to that benefit. It cannot enjoy the benefit and escape the burden, for the burden and the benefit are so interlaced as to be inseparable. The right to the benefit is so blended with the burden that equity and justice forbid a severance.

One who takes a privilege in land to which a burden is annexed has no right to assert a claim to the privilege and deny responsibility for the burden. A party who acquires such a privilege acquires it subject to the conditions and burdens bound up with it, and must, if he asserts a right to the privilege, bear the burden which the contract creating the privilege brought into existence. The one he cannot have at the expense of the other.

In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Power, 119 Ind. 260, we said of a railroad company: "Holding the land under the deed as it did it was bound to perform its contract. To permit it to retain the land and repudiate the deed would be against equity and good conscience."

In this instance the covenant written in the deed was an essential part of it, and the agreement to construct the fence was part of the consideration for the land. The case is near akin to that of a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, for here the deed upon its face exhibited the contract, and the facts open to observation showed that the covenant had not been kept. The facts open to observation did more than put the appellant upon inquiry, but had they done no more than put it upon inquiry it could not justly claim the rights of a purchaser without notice. It must be held that the covenant in the deed through which the appellant claims and the facts open to observation imparted notice of the covenant, and notice also of its nonperformance.

The covenant is, as we have indicated, an integral part of the deed upon which rests the rights of the appellant. The deed which creates the asserted right discloses the covenant which burdens the right. In excepting the right under such a deed and asserting a claim to the privileges conferred by its subsequent grantees the original covenantor became bound to perform the agreement. The covenant passed with the land. The easement which burdened the fee was an incumbrance, and the party that took the land took it subject to the incumbrance, but in taking subject to the incumbrance of the easement that party acquired the benefit interwoven with the incumbrance. Both the burden and the benefit—the easement and the covenant—essentially inhere in the land. One burdens the estate, the other benefits it. The party who acquires the estate necessarily acquires it with both the burden and the benefit. He must submit to the one, but he has a right to the other.

In Hastett v. Sinclair, 76 Ind. 468, the question was examined with care, the authorities collected and the judgment of the court was that a covenant very similar to the one under consideration was a real covenant running with the land. In the case referred to the court quoted with approval from the case of Carr v. Leary, 27 Pa. 237, the following statement of the law: "The liability to perform and the right to take advantage of this covenant both pass to the heir or assignee of the land, to which the covenant is attached. The covenant can by no means be considered as merely personal or collateral and detached from the land."

In Hastett v. Sinclair the case of Black v. Isham, 28 Ind. 87, was shown not to rule such a case as this. The question in Junction R. Co. v. Sagers, 28 Ind. 818, must for many reasons be regarded as radically different from that here presented, but it is enough to say that in that case the burden was not annexed to the easement conveyed, but was created by an independent agreement. The question received careful attention in the case of Conduitt v. Ross, 102 Ind. 100, and the rule there declared is substantially the same as that laid down in the case of Hastett v. Sinclair, supra.

In Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, the authorities are reviewed at great length and a covenant such as that here under consideration was held to run with the land, so that the earlier cases in that court, conceding them to be in point, are not of controlling force.

The very fully considered and strongly reasoned case of Hurbank v. Pillsbury, 49 N. H. 475, adjudges that a covenant to build a fence around granted estate will create an incumbrance on the land, and this doctrine harmonizes with that of the cases to which we have referred. If it be true, and it is true, that the agreement constitutes a real covenant against incumbrances, then it must be true that it runs with the land. It is a covenant inhering in the granted easement of a right of way, and as such runs with that estate. Applying this doctrine to the case before us, and it clearly results that the estate in the land which the appellant's grantor took—the easement of a right of way—was burdened with the incumbrance created by the covenant to fence the granted property. The ultimate conclusion, therefore, is that the covenant to fence binds the appellant and inures to the grantee of the servient estate in which the easement with its incumbrance inheres. In addition to the cases we have here cited and those collected in Hastett v. Sinclair, may be cited the following: Huston v. Cincinnati & Z. R. Co 21 Ohio St. 238, Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 80 Barb. 186, Duffy v. New York & H. R. Co. 9 Hill. 400, Woolworth v. Norton, 16 Wis. 108.

The authorities are well agreed upon the proposition that a deed poll when accepted by the grantee becomes the mutual act of the parties. Newell v. Hill, 2 Met. 180, Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass. 510; Huff v. Nickerson, 27 Me. 106; Tripe v. Marcy, 20 N. H. 420; Stevens

v. Moras, 47 N. H. 509; Burbank v. Pillsbury and Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, supra.

The appellant's grantor by accepting the deed made its covenants binding upon it, and acquired the estate incumbered and burdened by the agreement, and the appellant, as the deed is in his chain of title, took the grantee's easement with its burden and its incumbrance. Tripe v. Marcy, Stevens v. Moras and Burbank v. Pillsbury, supra.

The promise of the appellant's grantor is not a verbal one, and the case is not governed by the provision of the Statute of Limitations respecting verbal contracts. The acceptance of the deed by the grantee named in it made it a written contract, and the obligations created by the deed are therefore express and are evidenced by a writing. The adjudged cases very fully and satisfactorily sustain this doctrine. In one case it was said "Nor is it material that this contract is not signed by the grantor. The acceptance of the deed makes it a contract in writing binding upon the grantee just as the acceptance by a lessee of a lease makes it a written contract binding upon such lessee, and suit can be maintained upon it as though it were also signed by the grantor." Salmuster v. Sbert, 18 Kan. 104.

The rule thus stated is sanctioned by many other cases. Ricard v. Chandonson, 41 N. Y. 170; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 54 N. Y. 98, 18 Am. Rep. 556; Rogers v. Eagle Fire Co. 9 Wend. 616; Spaulding v. Hollenbeck, 25 N. Y. 306; Newell v. Hill, 2 Met. 180, Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass. 510, Huff v. Nickerson, 27 Me. 106; Burbank v. Pillsbury, supra.

The doctrine is a very ancient one. In Shepard's Touchstone it is said: "If feoffment or lease be made to two, and there are divers covenants in the deed to be performed on the part of the feoffees or lessors, and one of them doth not seal, and he that doth not seal doth notwithstanding accept of the estate and enjoy the lands conveyed or demised, in these cases as touching all inherent covenants, they are bound by these covenants as much as if they do seal the deed."

Some of the authorities deny that the technical action of covenant will lie against the grantee of a deed-poll, but an English author who favors the technical rule concedes that the weight of the English decisions is the other way, saying: "Perhaps, however, the doctrine has been too long sanctioned to be now reversed. At all events, it is an introduction of an equitable principle into a court of law, the acceptance of a deed being considered equivalent to an actual execution by the grantor." Platt, Covenants, 18.

The equitable rule has much to commend it, while the technical rule is the product of the slavish adherence to forms which did so much to deform the common law, and is without any merit entitling it to favor. But we need not discuss this question at length, for it has been discussed again and again and the better reasoned cases support the equitable doctrine. Finley v. Simpson, 22 N. J. L. 231; Harrison v. Freeland, 26 N. J. L. 300, Sparkman v. Goss, 44 N. J. L. 253, Maynard v. Moore, 76 N. C. 158, Brown v. Beck, 64 N. Y. 86; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, supra; Maine v. Cushman, 98 Mass. 217; Martin v. Drinan, 126 Mass. 514. Judgment affirmed.

STATE of Indiana, et al. Simon W. TAYLOR, Appt.,

v.

Board of Commissioners of WARRICK COUNTY.

(....Ind....)

The fact that a county superintendent of schools was elected by means of corruption cannot be relied upon to prevent the issuance of a mandate to compel the board of county commissioners to approve his school-book bond. If, upon his receiving the required number of votes, a certificate of election has been issued to him, and he has duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, his right to hold the office cannot be inquired into except by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.

(June 24, 1890.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warrick County in favor of respondents and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to compel the approval of relator's school-book bond. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. D. B. Kumler, J. A. Heminway and John L. Taylor for appellant.

Messrs. G. H. Hason and Gleichrist & DeBruler for appellees.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator was duly elected county superintendent of schools in Warrick County by the trustees of said County on the 8th day of June, 1889.

He immediately filed his bond, to the approval of the county auditor, took the oath of office and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office as such superintendent. The appellant did not file the bond required by the Statute, known as the school-book bond, acting under the belief that it was not necessary to file such bond until after the governor of the State should issue his proclamation, as provided for in section 10 of said Law. The governor issued his proclamation on the 20th day of July, 1889, and on the 8th day of August following the relator tendered to the Board of Commissioners of Warrick County a good and sufficient bond under the terms of said Law, and demanded its approval, which was refused. This suit was brought to compel, by mandate, the approval of said bond.

The Board of Commissioners answered in substance that prior to his election as county superintendent the relator was trustee of one of the townships in Warrick County; that at said time the County had ten trustees, five of whom were of one political faith and five of another political faith, that the relator belonged to one political party and the auditor of said County to another; that the relator and said auditor entered into a corrupt agreement, by the terms of which the relator was to resign his said office of trustee and the said auditor was to appoint a trustee as his successor of the same political faith as said auditor; and that in consideration of his resigning his said office of trustee it was agreed that the relator should be elected by the trustees of said County superintendent of the schools of said County; that pursuant to the terms of said corrupt agreement the relator did resign his said office of trustee, said auditor did appoint his successor and the relator was elected by the trustees of the several townships of said County superintendent of the schools thereof; that the relator was elected by means of said corrupt agreement, and without it he could not have been elected.

Upon issues formed the cause was tried by the court, resulting in a finding and judgment for the appellees over a motion for a new trial.

We are not favored with a brief by the appellees, and are not advised of the ground upon which the court based its judgment, but in our opinion the court erred in overruling the appellant's motion for a new trial.

In all of its essential features this case is like the case of Knox County v. Johnson (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 684 (decided at last term), except in the matter of defense set up by the appellees. The appellant, at the time he tendered his special bond to the Board of Commissioners of Warrick County, had been duly elected, qualified and was acting as county superintendent of schools; was in the possession of the office and was discharging the duties pertaining thereto. Such being the case, the appellees could not attack his title in the collateral manner attempted by their answer. The public have an interest in the discharge of the duties of the office, and until such time as the appellee shall be ousted by a proper proceeding for that purpose, everyone must recognize him as the legally elected and qualified county superintendent. Leach v. Cassidy, 28 Ind. 449; State v. Jones, 19 Ind. 356; Redden v. Covington, 29 Ind. 118; Gumberts v. Adams Exp. Co., 28 Ind. 181; Creighton v. Piper, 14 Ind. 182; Kisler v. Cameron, 89 Ind. 488; McGee v. State, 108 Ind. 444, 1 West. Rep. 467; Farmster v. State, 102 Ind. 90; Mannis v. State, 115 Ind. 245, 18 West. Rep. 109.

The certificate of election issued to the appellant and his qualification as county superintendent bar all inquiry into his right to hold the office, except in a direct proceeding for that purpose. Farmster v. State, supra.

It is not denied that the appellant was elected county superintendent by the votes of a majority of the trustees of Warrick County, and that he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office. No one is contesting his election and no proceeding is pending to oust him.

It is settled by the case of Knox County Coura. v. Johnson, supra, that he was entitled to have the bond in question approved at the time it was tendered. The appellees could not go behind his election and inquire into his title to the office. It was their duty to approve his bond. Having refused to do so, mandate is the proper remedy to compel them to perform that duty. Gulich v. New, 14 Ind. 93, McGee v. State, supra.

The circuit court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the Circuit Court to grant a new trial.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSOURI, Resp.,

v.

Gustus P. HOPE, Appt.

(....Mo.....)

1. Objections to the admission of testimony in criminal as well as in civil cases must state opportunely the reasons therefor in order to preserve the rulings for a review.
2. A party cannot in general demand the exclusion of evidence called out in fair response to questions asked without objection.
3. The fact that a witness testified on behalf of the State in a criminal case without having first been sworn is not ground for error, where no objection was made at the hearing before he was fully cross-examined.
4. A statute permitting a verdict when defendant is voluntarily or willfully absent does not violate his constitutional right to be present at the trial.

(March 22, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Scotland County sentencing him for the crime of unlawfully assaulting, stabbing and wounding another. Affirmed.

Statement by Barclay, J.:

This cause is here upon an indictment, in the usual form, charging defendant with an assault upon Walker Hale with intent to kill. He was convicted of unlawfully assaulting, stabbing and wounding Hale, and was sentenced in accordance with that verdict. He then appealed to this court, after the customary motions. The evidence on the part of the State tended to prove that defendant and Hale had an altercation on the public road, during the course of which defendant inflicted certain wounds on Hale with a knife. That there was abundant testimony to support the verdict is not denied. The defendant relied upon self-defense, and, furthermore, offered evidence of good general reputation as a peaceable and quiet boy, as well as for veracity. In this branch of the case, during the examination of a witness for defendant, the following questions on his behalf were asked, and answers given:

"B. Riley, sworn on the part of the defendant. Direct examination. (1) Do you live in the neighborhood of Mr. Hope? A. Yes, sir. (2) Are you a relation of his? A. No, sir. (3) How long have you lived there? A. I have lived there, within half of a mile, for ten or twelve years. (4) Have you been acquainted with the family? A. Yes, sir. (5) Are you acquainted with his reputation for truth and veracity in the neighborhood? A. Yes, sir. (6) Is it good or bad? A. I think it is good. (7) Are you acquainted with his reputation as being a quiet and peaceable boy? A. It is considered good."

NOTE.—Exceptions to ruling; when must be taken.

Exceptions in criminal prosecutions stand on the same footing as those in civil causes. State v. Day (Mo.) Nov. 12, 1889; State v. Meyers, 39 Mo. 107.

Exceptions must distinctly present the ruling of the court, or they cannot be considered. Young v. Martin, 75 U. S. 3 Wall. 264 (19 L. ed. 418); Springfield P. & M. Ins. Co. v. Ben, 38 U. S. 21 Wall. 168 (28 L. ed. 511).

Objections to the admission or rejection of evidence must be taken at the trial, or by bill of exceptions. Thomson v. Madison B. & A. Assn., 1 West. Rep. 229, 100 Ind. 279; Roberts v. Hershler, 20 Neb. 524; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heck, 103 U. S. 120 (26 L. ed. 55); Zeller v. Eckert, 48 U. S. 4 How. 229 (11 L. ed. 979); Phelps v. Mayer, 66 U. S. 16 How. 100 (14 L. ed. 642); Bryan v. Forsyth, 60 U. S. 19 How. 234 (15 L. ed. 674); Barton v. Forsyth, 61 U. S. 20 How. 522 (15 L. ed. 1012); Campbell v. Boyreau, 68 U. S. 21 How. 222 (18 L. ed. 96); Dredge v. Forsyth, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 563 (17 L. ed. 253); Houghton v. Jones, 64 U. S. 1 Wall. 703 (17 L. ed. 809); Hutchins v. King, 65 U. S. 1 Wall. 52 (17 L. ed. 544); Belk v. Meagher, 164 U. S. 279 (26 L. ed. 735).

Assignments of error to the admission of testimony, which do not state that the objection was made at the time of the trial, cannot be considered on appeal. Griffin v. Johnson (Ga.) Jan. 17, 1890.

A ruling made during the progress of a trial, either admitting or excluding evidence, is not an order, and it must therefore be excepted to when made. McGuire v. Drew, 68 Cal. 225; Abbey v. Ferris, 31 N. Y. S. R. 59; Denepe v. Wash, 38 Kan. 407.

A point not brought to the attention of the court at the trial cannot be raised in the supreme court for the first time. Talbot v. Taunton, 1 New Eng. Rep. 616, 140 Mass. 592; Keith v. Wells (Colo.) March 22, 1890; Chapman v. Moore, 5 West. Rep. 270, 107 Ind. 222; Thomson v. Madison B. & A. Assn. supra; Miller v. Bradish, 69 Iowa, 279; Shafer v. Ferguson, 1 West. 6 L. R. A.

Rep. 129, 107 Ind. 90; Miles v. Albany, 2 New Eng. Rep. 473, 69 Vt. 78.

Where a question was not objected to until the answer had been given, and there is nothing to show that it could not have been, the objection will not be considered. State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 122.

An exception to the admission of evidence is not available, where the objection was not made until after it had gone to the jury, and where there was no motion to strike out. Haugen v. Hachembler, 5 L. R. A. 127, 114 N. Y. 208; Wright v. State, 61 Ga. 745; United States v. Breitling, 61 U. S. 20 How. 222 (15 L. ed. 600); Scott v. Lloyd, 84 U. S. 9 Pat. 415 (9 L. ed. 178).

In such case the right to make the objection is waived. Roberts v. Graham, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 576 (19 L. ed. 791).

Where improper testimony was admitted without objection, it is too late to make the objection for the first time on a motion for a new trial. Feldner v. Mora, 42 Kan. 519; Steffy v. People, 130 Ill. 25.

Where the grounds for excluding testimony appear by cross-examination, which is followed by a motion to exclude such testimony, the objection is taken in time. Combs v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 75 Iowa, 201.

General exceptions not considered on appeal.

Vague and general exceptions make no issue of law that can be passed upon by this court. Central R. Co. v. Freeman, 75 Ga. 231; Curtis v. Westfield, 24 S. C. 457; Cohn v. Cohn, Id. 597.

Objections presented by bill of exceptions, when too general, present no question for review on error or appeal. Peck v. Chouteau, 8 West. Rep. 218, 91 Mo. 128; Clark v. Conway, 23 Mo. 426.

To a general objection to evidence, the only question is whether it is admissible for any purpose. Dow v. Merrill, 66 N. H. —.

A general objection to evidence is sufficient only

In rebuttal, the State offered some evidence regarding defendant's reputation, in the course of which the question (referred to in the opinion) arose on a motion to exclude a part of the testimony of witness Zugg. The passage from the record presenting this point is as follows:

"Ernest Zugg, recalled, on the part of the plaintiff. (1) Are you acquainted in the neighborhood in which the defendant, Gustus P. Hope, resides? A. Yes, sir. (2) Are you acquainted, in the neighborhood in which he resides, with his general reputation as to being a quiet, law-abiding boy? A. Yes, I guess I am. By the Court. Is his general reputation good or bad? A. I don't know what general reputation is. I don't know what you mean. By the Court. It is the estimation in which he is held by the people generally. Is that general reputation good or bad? A. I don't know what you call good or bad. (3) What is the estimation of him? A. It is quarrelsome. (Objected to.) By the Court. That will not do. By the Court. General reputation consists in the estimation in which a man is held by the people generally. (4) They were relatives of Mr. Hale's? A. Not all of them wasn't. (5) Wasn't it a fact that this talk was from the relatives of Mr. Hale? A. I don't know that it was; it wasn't all from them. (6) Wasn't the principal talk that you heard from them? A. I don't know but one family that were relatives. Here Mr. Smoot (counsel for defendant) asked that the court exclude all this testimony from the jury, as not being founded on any time with reference to this difficulty. By the Court. Objection overruled. To the said action of the court, in not excluding the said testimony from the jury, the defendant, by his counsel, did then at the time except."

Another witness (Mr. Gsalin) for the State was examined on the same subject, and the following questions asked, and answers made, without any objection or exception. "(5) Are you acquainted with his general reputation for peace and quiet in the neighborhood in which he lives? A. Yes, sir; I am. (6) Is it good or bad? A. It is bad."

The opinion states the other facts bearing upon the questions discussed in it.

Mrs. Smoot & Pettingill and E. F. Walker for appellant.

Mr. John M. Wood, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Barclay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The points made by the defendant upon the rulings of the trial court on the evidence are not well taken.

1. Most of these rulings were made over objections to testimony which assigned no ground or reason for excluding it. Section 1907 of our Statutes concerning criminal procedure (Rev. Stat. 1879) declares that "the provisions of law in civil cases, relative to compelling the attendance and testimony of witnesses, their examination, the administration of oaths and affirmations, and proceedings as for contempt, to enforce the remedies and protect the rights of parties, shall extend to criminal cases, so far as they are in their nature applicable thereto, subject to the provisions contained in any statute."

where the evidence is inadmissible in its nature. Toner v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 7 Cent. Rep. 222, 105 N. Y. 689; State v. Meyers, 90 Mo. 107; Everdon v. Mayhew (Cal.) April 25, 1889; Chicago & N. L. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 740, 120 Ill. 607.

Where the objection could not be obviated by any means within the power of the party offering the evidence, in order to raise the question of its admissibility it is sufficient to make a general objection thereto. Holcombe v. Munson, 5 Cent. Rep. 403, 103 N. Y. 632.

A general objection to evidence only saves the right to specific rulings on the defects that are called to the court's attention before the case is submitted to the jury. Willard v. Pike, 4 New Eng. Rep. 601, 39 Vt. 222.

A party cannot, on appeal, under a general objection to the admission of evidence, object to its admission on grounds not specified, and which, if they had been specified, might have been obviated. Earl v. Laffur, 48 Hun, 10; Farman v. Wilmington, 48 Hun, 47.

A general exception to the admission of testimony, unless the whole of it is incompetent, will not be considered. The objectionable portion must be specifically pointed out. Smiley v. Pearce, 38 N. C. 165. See Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard (Ind.) ante, 622.

Objections to evidence too indefinite to raise question for review.

An objection to evidence that it is incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant, is not sufficient to present any question on appeal. Stringer v. Frost, 2 L. R. A. 614, 116 Ind. 477; Clark Civil Twp. v. Brookshire, 13 West. Rep. 379, 114 Ind. 437; Chicago & N. L. R. Co. v. Holland, 11 West. Rep. 61, 122 Ill. 401; Vickery v. McCormack, 117 Ind. 594; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 1 West. Rep. 378, 104 Ind. 8 L. R. A.

400; McCullough v. Davis, 8 West. Rep. 579, 108 Ind. 302; Byard v. Harkrider, 8 West. Rep. 857, 104 Ind. 378; Metzger v. Franklin Bank, 119 Ind. 309; Bundy v. Cunningham, 5 West. Rep. 540, 107 Ind. 300.

That a question is "irrelevant and inadmissible" will not raise the question of its competency, where it is relevant to a certain point in issue. Burke v. Koch, 78 Cal. 222.

Blending an objection to the admissibility of evidence in the same application which questions its sufficiency is not proper. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 27 U. S. & 3 Pet. 25 (7 L. ed. 224).

An objection to evidence as incompetent must state the reasons which make it incompetent. Melons v. Albertson, 3 Mont. 492.

An objection to evidence as "incompetent and immaterial" is sufficient to apprise the court of the real nature of the objection, when it immediately succeeds eight previous objections to similar evidence, made upon the ground that the witness was not competent to testify to transactions and conversations with a deceased person. De Ryman's Will, 3 L. R. A. 626, 118 N. Y. 62.

Exceptions must be specific.

Exceptions to the admission of evidence must be specific. Fuller v. Smith, 74 Ga. 585; Brunswick v. Moore and Hall v. Huff, 74 Ga. 407; Houge v. Alexander, 3 West. Rep. 514, 105 Ind. 100; Landwerien v. Wheeler, 3 West. Rep. 622, 108 Ind. 522; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hasseltt, 2 West. Rep. 622, 108 Ind. 512; Smythe v. Scott, 3 West. Rep. 720, 108 Ind. 544; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Grantham, 3 West. Rep. 531, 104 Ind. 570.

A particular objection is necessary to raise the question of the admissibility of evidence as part of the res gesta. Hughes v. State, 27 Tex. App. 127.

The appellate court cannot consider an error in the admission of evidence to which no specific ob-

This has been a part of the law of Missouri from a date as early, at least, as 1805. It has been re-enacted repeatedly in the various revisions of the statutes that have taken place since then. Its language to-day is substantially, if not identically, the same that it has been for some fifty years. Rev. Stat. 1835, 3d ed. p. 400, § 15; Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 890, chap. 133, § 16; Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 1191, chap. 137, § 16; Gen. Stat. 1865, p. 660, chap. 213, § 17; Rev. Stat. 1879, § 1907; Rev. Stat. 1880, § 4207.

In civil cases it has been uniformly ruled by this court, from a very early period of its history, that it is not sufficient, for the purposes of review, to object generally to improper testimony when offered, but that the grounds must be stated to the court with the objection. Fields v. Hunter, 8 Mo. 128; Rovania v. St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. 15 Mo. 244; Clark v. Conway, 23 Mo. 435; Western & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 33 Mo. 456; Lohari v. Buchanan, 80 Mo. 201.

That rule has thus become a fixed part of our jurisprudence governing the trial of civil causes, and must be regarded as having been in contemplation of the law makers when the revision of the Statutes alluded to occurred. Section 1907, Rev. Stat. 1879, should therefore be considered as having been re-enacted from time to time with the then prevailing rule relative to the examination of witnesses in civil cases as part of it, in accordance with an established principle of interpretation of laws. Sanders v. St. Louis & N. O. Anchor Line, 97 Mo. 27, 8 L. R. A. 690.

We hence consider it necessary in criminal, as well as in civil, causes for a party objecting to the admission of testimony to state opportunely the reasons for the objection in order to preserve the ruling for review, should it be adverse to the objector. If the ruling be favorable to the latter, however, and thus the evidence be excluded, generality in the objection would furnish no cause for reversing the ruling of the trial court. It would be sustained, if defensible on any grounds.

In State v. O'Connor, 66 Mo. 374, views are expressed somewhat at variance with those above indicated. In so far as they conflict, that decision should no longer be regarded as authoritative.

2. Referring to the other rulings of the trial court on the evidence, as to some no exceptions were saved, which precludes reviewing them, as this court has often held; and as to others the objections were interposed too late,—that is to say, after the testimony had been admitted, unchallenged, in response to pertinent questions. A party cannot, in general, demand the exclusion of evidence called out in fair response to section was made, and which is not within the purview of a general objection. Wilson v. Kings County Elevated R. Co. 114 N. Y. 467.

Objections to evidence must be reasonably specific, to be available on appeal. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Walker, 12 West. Rep. 721, 123 Ind. 192; Smith v. James, 73 Iowa, 514.

An exception to evidence which does not point out the particular part objected to is not sufficient, where some of the evidence is competent. Prindle v. Campbell (D. C.) 18 Wash. L. Rep. 364.

A party objecting to a certain class of evidence need not object specifically to each question and answer, to raise the question on appeal. Oppenheimer v. Barr, 71 Iowa, 525.

The overruling of objections to evidence which are not specific will not be reviewed on appeal. Boston v. Murray, 13 West. Rep. 261, 94 Mo. 175; Hinford v. Young, 13 West. Rep. 514, 115 Ind. 174.

A general objection will not be considered on appeal, when evidence was received, without specific objection, to prove the allegations wanting in the complaint. Bowman v. Eppinger (N. D.) April 1, 1900.

A general objection to testimony is not sufficient where it is admissible as to one defendant, but not as to another. Taylor v. Devereil (Kan.) April 4, 1900.

Insufficiency of evidence will not be considered on an assignment that the decision is against law, without specifying the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient. Malone v. Dal Norte County, 77 Cal. 317.

Grounds of objection must be stated.

The only mode to get evidence or objections to evidence in the record is by a bill of exceptions. Thomson v. Madison B. & A. Assn. 1 West. Rep. 329, 108 Ind. 379.

An exception can be reserved only by having it embodied in a "bill of exceptions," or by having it noted in the record of the decision to which it relates. State v. Leach, 71 Iowa, 84.

Objections to evidence must specify in a direct and positive manner the ground which was presented to the court below on the trial. Cole v. Byrd 8 L. R. A.

(Ga.) April 20, 1898; Woodbury v. District of Columbia (D. C.) 8 Cent. Rep. 726, 5 Mackey, 127; Adler v. Land, 4 West. Rep. 203, 21 Mo. App. 616; Safety Fund Nat. Bank v. Westlake, 4 West. Rep. 221, 22 Mo. App. 606; Talbott v. Padgett, 20 S. C. 167; Bray v. Parker, 66 Ga. 284; Wilhelm v. Burleyson (N. C.) May 18, 1893; Dale v. Sen, 6 L. R. A. 322, 61 N. J. L. 372; Tucker v. Jones, 6 Mont. 226.

They must be stated, by pointing out some definite or specific defect in its character, or it will be without weight before an appellate court. Camden v. Doremus, 44 U. S. 3 How 315 (11 L. ed. 705); United States v. McMaster, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 690 (18 L. ed. 311); Moore v. Bank of Metropolis, 20 U. S. 13 Pet. 508 (16 L. ed. 173).

Without specifying the ground, an exception will not be sustained. Mooney v. Peck, 8 Cent. Rep. 627, 49 N. J. L. 223; Merkle v. Donnington, 12 West. Rep. 514, 68 Mich. 128.

Nor will it be ground for reversal, unless the testimony is wholly inadmissible. Turner v. Newburgh, 12 Cent. Rep. 214, 109 N. Y. 301.

Nor will the objection be considered on appeal. Hughes v. Griswold, 22 Ga. 300; L'Honniedieu v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. 120 Ind. 424.

It is the right of the court to know upon what ground the objector relies. Blackmore v. Fairbanks (Iowa) Feb. 2, 1899.

Rulings of the court, admitting or rejecting evidence, can be brought to this court for review only by a bill of exceptions. They cannot properly be included in a special verdict or in an agreed statement of facts. Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S. 30 How. 427 (15 L. ed. 578); Pomeroy v. Bank of Indiana, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 302 (37 L. ed. 604); Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lanier, 35 U. S. 171 (34 L. ed. 203); Bushner v. Scully, 4 West. Rep. 726, 107 Ind. 364.

Rulings not the subject of a bill of exceptions will not be reviewed. Passenger Conductors L. Ins. Co. v. Birebaum (Pa.) 7 Cent. Rep. 435.

Rulings of the trial court cannot be brought into the record by mere reference to them in a bill of exceptions (State v. Griffin, 28 Mo. 612); nor can they be preserved in the record by a recital by the clerk that exception was taken thereto. Steffy v. People, 120 Ill. 64.

questions asked without objection. Nothing exceptional is shown here affecting the application of that rule. When the legal objection to testimony is not apparent from the question that elicits it, but is developed later in any way (for instance on cross-examination), the omission to object, at the time it came in, is no waiver of the right to have it excluded. It is only when the exceptional nature of the testimony has become apparent that the failure to object may constitute a waiver of objection. The reason of this rule is thus stated in a recent case: "To allow a party to permit, without objection, the admission of evidence, and for the first time make his objection is instructions, would be intolerable practice. If he had an opportunity to interpose an objection, he cannot take the chances that the testimony will be favorable to him, and when it turns out otherwise raise his objection, but must be held to have waived it." Maxwell v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 85 Mo. 98.

The rule itself merely involves an application of the principle, frequently declared of late, that, on appeal, parties are bound by the theories of law they asserted or acquiesced in at the trial. Whether such theories take the form of instructions asked (M. Foster Vinegar Mfg. Co. v. Guggemos, 98 Mo. 391), or of instructions unexcepted to (State v. Griffin, 98 Mo. 672), or of rulings on evidence, the nature of which is clear at the time, we think the principle equally applies. In the case before us it appears that defendant's objection to the testimony of witness Zugg in rebuttal (to the effect that defendant was generally reputed to be quarrelsome) was that the question eliciting it did not fix any time with reference to the difficulty. The objection itself was not valid. The question, by the use of the present tense, did fix the time as that of the trial; but construing it broadly as an objection to receiving the testimony because it did not fix the time as that of the difficulty, then it was too tardy for recognition, under the rule we have discussed. Moreover, defendant made the same inquiry, as that against which his objection under discussion was directed, during the examination of his witness, Mr. Riley, and interposed no objection to the same question when asked Mr. Goalin, a prior witness for the State. (The statement preceding this opinion presents the exact language used in each of these instances). There is respectable authority for holding that either of these

Bill of exceptions; what should show.

A bill of exceptions failing to show the objections made to the evidence cannot be considered on appeal. Goforth v. State, 23 Tex. App. 408.

Specific grounds of objection must be embodied in the bill of exceptions. Ringsberger v. Hartman, 3 West. Rep. 398, 108 Ind. 597.

It should point out the evidence complained of. Wiley v. Logan, 66 N. C. 328; Clements v. Rogers, 75 N. C. 348.

It should show enough of the evidence rejected to make its relevancy apparent. Indiana, R. & W. R. Co. v. Adams, 11 West. Rep. 608, 113 Ind. 808.

A bill should show what the evidence excluded would have been. Moss v. Cameron, 66 Tex. 412; Vance v. Upson, 66 Tex. 476.

A bill of exceptions to the exclusion of testimony should show that the testimony would have benefited the party excepting (McKay v. Overton, 66 Tex. 88), and that the party was actually injured by the exclusion of the testimony of a witness. Warren v. Spencer Water Co. 3 New Eng. Rep. 338, 145 Mass. 155.

On exception to admission of evidence it must appear from facts shown that the evidence was admitted to the injury of the excepting party. Noyes v. Smith (Me.) 4 New Eng. Rep. 784.

The mere statement, in a bill of exceptions, of an objection made to evidence, does not establish that the ground of objection existed, but it must be made to appear that it in fact existed. Huffman v. State, 23 Tex. App. 174.

Evidence or statements of fact not contained in the bill of exceptions nor made a part thereof, though appended thereto, will not be regarded by the court. National Bank of Metropolis v. Kennedy, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 19 (21 L. ed. 554); Hend v. Gardner, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 429 (21 L. ed. 585).

A bill of exceptions to the admission in evidence of certain small slips of paper "written in bad Spanish and without names or any signature," without showing what was written on them, is insufficient. Lever v. State, 23 Tex. App. 118.

Where documentary evidence is excluded, or a portion admitted, it must be made part of a bill of exceptions, so the court can judge of its admissibility. People v. Coughlin, 11 West. Rep. 659, 97 Mich. 488.

Record on appeal; what must show.

The record must set forth the objections specifically. Grubbs v. Morris, 1 West. Rep. 187, 108 Ind. 188; Shaffer v. Ferguson, 1 West. Rep. 120, 108 Ind. 80; Osburn v. Sutton, 6 West. Rep. 328, 108 Ind. 442; Ketchum v. Barbour, 3 West. Rep. 304, 108 Ind. 578; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Jones, 7 West. Rep. 23, 108 Ind. 651; Chapman v. Moore, 6 West. Rep. 290, 107 Ind. 228; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 3 West. Rep. 398, 107 Ind. 448.

Where the record fails to show what ruling was made, or any exception to it, no question as to such ruling can be presented on appeal. Burns v. People, 126 Ill. 228.

The record on appeal must specify the particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient, or that ground for setting aside the verdict will not be considered. Alpers v. Schammel, 75 Cal. 380.

An objection as to the competency of evidence will not be considered on appeal, where the record shows that the lower court did not certify that ground of objection to be true. De Vaughn v. McLeroy, 22 Ga. 387.

Errors in admitting or rejecting testimony will not be noticed, unless the evidence is set up with the record. Wilson v. Gerhardt, 9 Colo. 588; First Nat. Bank v. Leppel, Id. 594.

Where no exceptions appear in the transcript, except such as appear from the minutes of the clerk, this court cannot take any notice of them. Young v. Martin, 75 U. S. 3 Wall. 554 (19 L. ed. 418).

A stenographer's report of the evidence, not signed or attested by the judge, is not a part of the record. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Kano, 120 Ind. 140.

Excluded evidence which derives its materiality alone from parts of a plea stricken out need not be considered on appeal, when not set forth in the record except by an exhibit of a long extract from the stenographic report of the trial. McGee v. Long (Ga.) July 8, 1893.

acts on defendant's part was a waiver of the objection in question. Hinds v. Langworth, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 206 [6 L. ed. 455], Hayden v. Palmer, 2 Hill, 206; Gale v. Shillock (Dak.) 20 N. W. Rep. 631; McCormick v. Laughran, 16 Neb. 87.

But, without expressly deciding that point, we think the trial court committed no reversible error in the ruling, considered in all its bearings.

3. The next assigned error rests on the claim that a witness testified on behalf of the State at the trial without having first been sworn. No objection on this ground was made at the hearing. It appears for the first time in the motion for a new trial, and nothing in the record shows when the fact was discovered by defendant or his counsel. Had the point been suggested when the witness began his statement or during his examination, the irregularity or oversight of permitting him to testify, unsworn (if it existed), could have been easily and promptly rectified. But it was not suggested. After the witness had been examined in chief he was fully cross-examined on the part of defendant. Thus was he treated by both parties as in all respects fully qualified to testify. It has been held by other courts, as well as our own, that where an oath is requisite to qualify a person as a trier of the facts or of law, it may be waived by the competent parties in interest, either expressly (Howard v. Sexton, 4 N. Y. 157; Tucker v. Allen, 47 Mo. 486, Grant v. Holmes, 75 Mo. 100), or by going forward in the matter without inquiry or objection. Arnold v. Arnold, 20 Iowa, 275; Merrill v. St. Louis, 53 Mo. 244, Castro v. Bartle, 91 Mo. 636, 8 West. Rep. 707.

We think the principle on which these rulings are based is applicable also to the case of a witness in the circumstances here shown. Lawrence v. Houghton, 5 John. 120.

This assignment of error has been considered on the assumption that the facts alleged were as claimed by defendant, but it is not thereby conceded that an affidavit accompanying a motion for new trial, though uncontradicted, is necessarily to be accepted as establishing the facts it recites, where they are such as have occurred in the immediate presence of the court.

4. The record shows that defendant was "willfully and voluntarily absent" when the verdict of the jury was returned in open court, though his counsel was present at the time, and defendant had been personally in attendance, until then, during the entire trial. He was afterwards brought in, and the sentence of the court was pronounced in his presence, after his motions for new trial and in arrest had been overruled.

By section 1801, Rev. Stat. 1870, in force when the alleged offense was committed, and when the trial of defendant occurred, it is provided as follows: "No person indicted for a felony can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial; nor can any person be tried or be allowed to enter a plea of guilty in any other case unless he be personally present, or the court and prosecuting attorney shall consent to such trial or plea in the absence of the defendant; and every person shall be admitted to make any lawful proof by competent witnesses or other testimony in his defense, provided, that in all cases the verdict of the jury may be received by the court, and entered upon the records thereof, in the absence of the defendant, when such absence on his part is willful or voluntary, and, when so received and entered, shall have the same force and effect as if received and entered in the presence of such defendant; and provided, further, that, when the record in the appellate court shows that the defendant was present at the commencement or any other stage of the trial, it shall be presumed, in the absence of all evidence in the record to the contrary, that he was present during the whole trial."

The provision in this section first became a part of our law at the Revision of 1870. Prior to that time, and ever since 1825, the Statute declared that "no person indicted for a felony can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial," etc., omitting any such qualifications of that rule as are contained in the provision of the present law. Rev. Stat. 1825; Gen. Stat. 1865, p. 850, § 15.

While the Statute was in that form, prior to the Revision of 1870, this court had held it error to receive a verdict in the absence of defendant, even though he had escaped from custody after the cause had been submitted to the jury. State v. Buckner, 25 Mo. 167; State v. Braunacker, 26 Mo. 307.

It had further been held that the record must affirmatively show the presence of defendant at the rendition of the verdict (State v. Cross, 27 Mo. 532, State v. Dwyer, 64 Mo. 145), though in some instances that fact had been taken as established by inferences from other entries in the record. State v. Schomwald, 31 Mo. 147; State v. Lewis, 69 Mo. 92.

The important change made in the Statute by the Revision of 1870 (§ 1801) was probably induced by a consideration of the decisions mentioned. In view of the history of the law on the subject, there can be no doubt of the legislative purpose in the amendment. It was, among other things, to prevent a defendant from securing a mistrial and continuance by escaping if in custody, or absconding if on bail, after the cause had been submitted to the jury, and before verdict rendered. Whether that purpose was accomplished will appear presently.

The language of the law so plainly sanctions the reception of a verdict by the court in defendant's absence, when willful or voluntary, that no difference of opinion is likely to arise as to its meaning. The difficulty, if any there be, appears upon the suggestion that the enactment in question may be in conflict with the Organic Law, particularly with that section of the Bill of Rights which declares that, "in criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and by counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation; to meet the witnesses against him face to face," etc. Const. 1875, art. 2, § 22.

The Statute, in permitting a verdict when defendant is voluntarily or willfully absent, evidently proceeds on the assumption that by such willful or voluntary absence the defendant waives the right to be present, which otherwise he might constitutionally insist on. In such waiver valid? In considering this question, we start from the postulate that the courts will not declare a statute unconstitutional unless it is manifestly so, and that all fair and reasonable doubts on that point will be resolved in favor of its constitutionality. The presumption is that the Legislature acted within the proper sphere of its powers, and, until the contrary is clearly and satisfactorily made to appear to the court, the law will be upheld. That the accused may waive some rights secured by the Constitution is a proposition supported by the authority of so many adjudicated cases that a citation of them now seems unnecessary. But there is great diversity of opinion respecting the particular constitutional rights that may be waived. Numbers of cases hold that certain rights cannot be waived by the accused for reasons of public policy. It would probably tend to confuse, rather than to elucidate, the present case to attempt any summary of the principles applicable to the waiver of constitutional rights generally. The issue actually before us requires only a decision upon the validity of a waiver, by defendant's own act, of his right to be personally present at the rendition of verdict. Defendant undoubtedly has a right to be heard, and for that purpose to be present when the verdict against him on a charge of felony is given, but if, being on bail, he sees fit to run away at that stage of the trial, on whom shall the consequences of such misconduct fall? It is a "fundamental legal principle," of far-reaching scope in its practical application (Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 581 [20 L. ed. 907]; Reynolds v. United States, 98 U. S. 161 [25 L. ed. 343]; Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 6 L. R. A. 340), that "no one should have an advantage from his own wrong." 1 Co. Litt. 148b; Broom, Legal Max. 8th ed. Yet to hold that, in such a state of facts as we have supposed, defendant during his willful absence retains the right, while he endeavors to increase the impossibility, of his being heard in the cause, would seem to us a clear instance of giving him a great advantage from his own wrong. The maxim is founded on principles of common fairness and good faith, as is also the view expressed in section 1891 of the Revised Statutes, that defendant, by voluntarily withdrawing from the court when the verdict is rendered, should be held to relinquish the right to be present and heard, which, but for his own wrongful act, he might freely enjoy. In such case he is deprived of no right. He merely refuses to avail himself of one, just as he may in various ways waive his constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him under repeated rulings of the court. State v. Wagner, 78 Mo. 644, Merrill v. St. Louis, 68 Mo. 259, State v. Houer, 26 Mo. 431.

In State v. Smith, 90 Mo. 37, 6 West. Rep. 651, the present Statute was considered, and no intimation of its unconstitutionality was made. In other cases it has been further held, even under the old Statute (Gen. Stat. 1865, p. 850, § 15), that defendant's absence at the trial during part of the argument of counsel to the jury was not a prejudicial error requiring a reversal. State v. Bell, 70 Mo. 633; State v. Grate, 68 Mo. 22.

In other States, without such a statute as our present one, and under constitutional provisions in most instances substantially like those in force here, it has been repeatedly held that where defendant was absent by his own voluntary act, e. g., by escape or by absconding while on bail, at the rendition of verdict in cases other than capital, the court might properly receive it, notwithstanding his absence. Shelton v. People, 103 Ill. 241, State v. Kelly, 97 N. C. 404, Price v. State, 34 Miss. 531; Galus v. State, 34 Miss. 105; Barton v. State, 67 Ga. 653, Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 676, Fight v. State, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, 18; Jackson v. State, 49 N. J. L. 253, 8 Cent. Rep. 531; State v. Pincock, 50 N. J. L. 34, 10 Cent. Rep. 175; Lynch v. Com. 30 Pa. 189.

The principle on which those decisions rest has been declared in others in its application to different phases of court proceedings in criminal cases. People v. Bragie, 88 N. Y. 846, as explained in People v. Lyon, 99 N. Y. 234; United States v. Davis, 6 Blatchf. 464; State v. Paylor, 59 N. C. 539.

We do not think the court loses jurisdiction of the cause by reason of defendant's getting beyond the confines of the court-room when the verdict comes in. State v. Kelly, 97 N. C. 404.

If that were the effect of such action on his part, the court would not have power to enter an order for his arrest thereafter, so long as he remained away. That result certainly could not have been intended by the constitutional provision in question as now worded. In interpreting the fundamental law of the State it is proper to consider the effect and consequences of any proposed construction of it in ascertaining what was probably the intention designed to be expressed by the instrument. Constitutions, like other laws, are governed by established rules of interpretation, and among others by that just mentioned. To hold that the flight of defendant while on bail, just before verdict, must necessarily produce a continuance of the cause, would make it possible for anyone able to give bond, by repeating that performance at each successive trial, to finally defeat the ends of justice. Such conduct would not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to bail or of his freedom of action during every recess of the court while the trial lasted; but (if now sanctioned here) it would introduce a new and novel mode for securing continuances, having some advantage over the ordinary methods heretofore in use. It would have, at least, the merit of simplicity. But we do not think those who framed or the people who adopted the Constitution contemplated such a construction of it in this regard as would make it ever possible for any defendant in a criminal case to avoid and escape altogether a verdict, otherwise just and correct, by any such acts of his own. We believe that no language used in that instrument will bear a construction which would make such results possible. We are of opinion that section 4191, Rev. Stat. 1860 (§ 1891, Rev. Stat. 1879), in so far as it relates to the subject under discussion, is entirely constitutional, and that the trial court committed no error in proceeding in accordance with its terms.

We find no error in any of the rulings of the court, to which exceptions were moved, in the giving or refusal of instructions, and, after a careful examination of the record, observe nothing calling for further remark.

The judgment is affirmed, for the reasons stated, with the concurrence of all the members of the court except Sherwood, J., who dissents.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

NEW VIENNA BANK, Plff. in Err.,

vs.
Edward F. JOHNSON et al.

(47 Ohio St.)

1. The Statutes of the State regulating the mode of signing, sealing, acknowledging and recording mortgages are limited in their application to these particulars: the legal or equitable effect of the instrument and its contents are unaffected thereby; and the rights of the parties and of third persons subsequently dealing with the land are to be determined by the general rules of law and equity, applicable to the subject in analogous cases.

2. In order to mortgage land as security for a debt, it is not necessary, in all cases, to clothe the creditor with the legal title: it is sufficient if the intent to pledge the land as a security clearly appears from the instrument, and the instrument is duly executed and recorded, as required by statute.

3. A mortgage upon real estate, made by the owner to a partnership in its firm name, to secure an indebtedness to it, duly executed and recorded, as required by statute, constitutes a valid lien upon the property in favor of the firm as a security for the indebtedness to it.

(April 22, 1901.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Clinton County to review a judgment sustaining demurrers to the answer and cross-petition setting up a mortgage lien on the property in a suit to enjoin the sale of certain property by an assignee for benefit of creditors and to compel a transfer thereof to complainant. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. H. B. Lindley, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Mills & Van Pelt for defendant in error.

Minshall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joshua W. Johnson, being indebted to the New Vienna Bank in the sum of $1,628, executed, December 30, 1885, a mortgage to the Bank to secure the same, which was duly filed for record the following day. The Bank was a partnership doing business in that name. The mortgage covered two tracts of land, one containing seventy-one and a fraction, and the other thirty-eight and a fraction, acres, and purported to convey "all the estate, title and interest" of said Johnson in and to said lands "to the said New Vienna Bank, its successors and assigns forever," without other words of limitation. Afterwards, in the month of January, 1886, Johnson and his son Edward entered into an agreement for an exchange by which the father agreed to convey to the son the thirty-eight-acre tract covered by the mortgage, and the son agreed to convey to the father twenty-six acres owned by himself. In accordance with this agreement the son at once conveyed the twenty-six acres owned by him to his father, who, on the 4th of February following, mortgaged it to one Morris to secure an indebtedness. But the father by reason of sickness, as is alleged, failed to convey the thirty-eight-acre tract to the son, as by the terms of the agreement he was bound in equity to do. On the day following the mortgage to Morris, he executed a mortgage to one Woolard to secure an indebtedness of $1,905, on the other tract of seventy-one acres covered by the mortgage to the Bank. And afterwards, on June 24, 1886, being in failing circumstances, he made an assignment of all his property, for the benefit of his creditors, to Edwin Arthur, which was duly filed on the same day in the probate court. The assignee, under the order of the probate court, being about to sell the thirty-eight-acre tract with the other lands assigned to him, Edward, the son, commenced an action in the common pleas to enjoin the sale, and compel the conveyance of the tract to him under the agreement for an exchange which had been executed on his part by the conveyance of the twenty-six acres to his father, he also averring that he had taken possession of the thirty-eight acres at the time of the exchange, and had continued in the possession and occupation of it as his own ever since, whereby all parties had notice of his rights.

All parties in interest were finally made parties to the suit and answered setting up their rights. To the answer and cross-petition of the Bank, setting up its mortgage and claiming a lien prior to all others upon the thirty-eight and seventy-one acre tracts covered by it, the plaintiff and the administrator of Woolard (he having died) demurred, claiming that the mortgage, having been executed to the Bank by name, instead of to the members composing the firm, was of no avail as a security, and that therefore the cross-petition of the Bank failed to state facts entitling it to any relief.

The case, having been heard and determined by the rendition of judgment in the common pleas, was appealed to the circuit court, where, upon a renewal of the demurrers, they were sustained, and the answer and cross-petition of the Bank dismissed. The action of the circuit court in this regard is assigned for error here. Hence the only question to be decided upon the record is, whether the mortgage executed to the New Vienna Bank can be made available to it as a lien on the land as a security in its favor against the claim of the plaintiff and those of the other mortgagees, all of whom are subsequent in time. It is claimed that it cannot for the reason that the Bank is not a legal entity; that it is simply a partnership of certain natural persons doing business in that name, and incapable of holding the legal title to lands in their firm name. Conceding this to be true, does it follow that the instrument is not available to the Bank as a lien on the land to the extent of the debt intended by the maker to be secured thereby? If so, it must be for the reason that, in order to create a lien on land as security for a debt, the legal title must, in all cases, be transferred to the person intended to be secured, or that such a lien cannot exist independent of the legal title. But this is not the case.

There are what are termed equitable as well as legal mortgages. The distinction is that a legal or common-law mortgage is a conveyance of the land accompanied by a condition contained either in the deed itself, or in a separate instrument executed at the same time. And, to quote the language of Mr. Jones, which has been frequently quoted with approval by the courts, "in addition to these formal instruments which are properly entitled to the designation of mortgages, deeds and contracts which are wanting in one or more of these characteristics of a common-law mortgage are often used by parties for the purpose of pledging real property, or some interest in it, as security for a debt or obligation, and with the intention that they shall have effect as mortgages." These kinds of mortgages are, as he says, "as many as there are varieties of ways in which parties may contract for security by pledging some interest in lands." And he adds, "Whatever the form of the contract may be, if it is intended thereby to create a security, it is an equitable mortgage." Jones, Mortg. § 162.

We are not unmindful of the fact that, under the decisions that have been made in this State, giving a construction to our Statutes regulating the execution and recording of mortgages, many instruments that would be treated elsewhere as equitable mortgages could have no effect given them here as against third persons, whether they had notice of their existence or not. But these Statutes and the construction placed upon them do not go beyond what they require as to the signing, acknowledgment and recording of the instrument. They prescribe no requisites as to the contents of the instrument—as to how lands shall be charged as a security, or the intent manifested. The character of the instrument in this regard, and its effect, are left to be determined by the application of the general principles of law and equity on the subject. So that any instrument that would, by the application of these principles, be regarded as constituting a lien on land as against third persons with notice, will have the same effect under our Recording Statutes, where it has been duly executed and recorded. Strong v. Beach, 11 Ohio St. 283, Hura v. Robinson, Id. 283, and Dodd v. Bartholomew, 44 Ohio St. 171, 3 West. Rep. 122.

By the record of the instrument it becomes notice to others of the equitable as well as legal rights of the parties. It may, as against third persons, be corrected to give effect to the intent apparent upon the face of the instrument, or the courts may, in a proceeding to enforce it, regard that as done which ought to have been done, and treat the instrument as if corrected. Pom. Eq. § 1225.

A few instances may be selected to illustrate the doctrine and show its application to this case. An instrument which does not transfer the legal estate has been held to operate as an equitable transfer of it in the nature of a mortgage. Thus, a mortgage to certain executors from which the word "heirs," creating a fee, was omitted, and the word "successors" used instead, was held to be an equitable mortgage in fee, and was reformed in a proceeding to foreclose it, against a subsequent mortgagee of the same land with notice. Gale v. Morris, 20 N. J. Eq. 222.

And so, in Brown v. First Nat. Bank, 44 Ohio St. 220, 3 West. Rep. 601, effect was given to an instrument as a mortgage in fee, although words of inheritance were not used in it. The instrument had been executed in the State of Indiana upon lands in this State, and had therefore to be construed by the laws of this State. By it the debtor simply mortgaged and warranted his land to his creditor as a security for the debt, with a provision for foreclosure in case of nonpayment. The purpose to secure the debt by a mortgage upon the land was apparent from the instrument, and of this intention all persons dealing with the land were held to have notice by the record of the instrument. See the opinion by Owen, C. J., p. 276. And so in California it is held that the words "we mortgage the property," accompanied by a provision for the sale of it, upon nonpayment of money thus secured, are sufficient to create a mortgage. De Leon v. McGuire, 15 Cal. 490, and Burroldt v. Battelle, 7 Cal. 450.

So, too, when, by the terms of his deed, a grantor reserves a lien on the land as a security for the unpaid purchase money, it operates as a mortgage, and the record of the deed is constructive notice to all others of his rights. Pom. Eq. § 1255.

But the lien so secured is independent of the legal title, as that passes by the deed to the purchaser, who is said to hold in trust for the grantor until the purchase money has been paid. For many other similar instances, see Jones, Mortg. §§ 163-171.

It is true that some of these could not, for reasons before stated, be made available as liens in this State against third persons.

Holding the legal title may, in some cases, be of much advantage to the mortgagee, as thereby, on condition broken, he may recover the land and hold it until his debt is satisfied. And this may be said to be the distinguishing feature of a common-law mortgage. It is, however, seldom resorted to—the remedy by foreclosure and sale (and which may be had in all cases) being more generally adopted. In a proceeding by foreclosure, it is not material where the legal title resides. A sale is required in all cases (Rev. Stat. § 5316) and the purchaser takes thereby all the interest of both the mortgagor and mortgagee in the land. As the passing of the legal title is not necessary to affect land as a security for a debt, no reason can be assigned why the debtor may not create, and the creditor accept, such a security, provided compliance is had with the statutes regulating the execution and recording of similar instruments. Such form of security certainly contravenes no rule of law or public policy, and is in harmony with the purpose and intention of the parties in all cases where the whole object is, on the one hand to give, and on the other to obtain, a security.

The execution of a mortgage in the usual form is now generally regarded as only a security, and not as a conveyance. Like the debt it secures, it is treated throughout as a chose in action. That a partnership may make contracts in its firm name is a matter of elementary law. It may make a note in its firm name, or may accept one payable to itself. It may be formed to deal in land, and may make valid contracts therefor. And if the firm cannot hold the legal title, the vendor holds it in trust for the firm. Sherry v. Gilmore, 58 Wis. 324, 332.

In this case the court says: "There does not seem to be any reason for holding that a partnership, in making a purchase of real estate for the benefit of the firm, may not do so in the same manner that they make other purchases, viz., in the firm name."

A number of cases are cited, where it has been held that a general description of the grantee is sufficient to support the deed—as the "heirs" or "children" of a given person—on the principle that that is certain which can be made certain, and therefore applicable to the members of a firm. See also Bates, Partn. § 296, and cases cited.

And it has been held in some cases that a conveyance to a firm is a conveyance to the members as tenants in common, who hold the title in trust for the firm. Jones v. Neale, 2 Pat. & H. (Va.) 330, Hosman v. Whitney, 20 Me. 413.

That a partnership may acquire an equitable estate in real property is decided in Rammelsberg v. Mitchell, 20 Ohio St. 23, 52.

Therefore, to say that a partnership cannot contract for an interest in land in its firm name as a security only, would be to establish an exception, with neither reason nor necessity for its existence. There are quite enough conflicting principles in the law, or what the Romans would have termed "inelegancias," without adding to their number, in the absence of any controlling necessity for so doing.

The instrument, the validity of which is questioned in this case, was designed by both parties to be a mortgage. This is apparent on the face of it. The only objection made to it is the incapacity of the partnership in its firm name to take and hold the legal title to real estate. But this is not material, for if it were so, then, as already shown, Johnson, the mortgagor would hold the legal title in trust as a security for the firm. In such case there would be no need of a formal reformation, as it would be the duty of the court, in the exercise of its equity powers, to treat that as done which ought to have been done, and give effect to the instrument in a proceeding to enforce it, according to the priority of its record, by awarding to the Bank a lien upon the land for the satisfaction of the amount due it.

The case of Hughes v. Edwards, 23 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489 [6 L. ed. 142], has a close analogy to this case. There by the laws of Kentucky an alien could not hold the title to lands in that State, and, the mortgagees being subjects of Great Britain, objection was taken to the mortgage on this ground. But the court said: "The objection is deprived of all its weight in a case where the mortgagee, instead of seeking to obtain possession of the land, prays to have his debt paid, and the property pledged for its security sold, for the purpose of raising the money. Under this aspect, the demand is, in reality, a personal one, the debt being considered as the principal, and the land merely as an incident; and, consequently, the alienage of the mortgagee, if he is a friend, can, upon no principle of law or equity, be urged against him."

In Chicago Lumber Co. v. Ashworth, 26 Kan. 212, a mortgage, taken in the firm name of partners, was held to be a valid security. The court said: "Ashworth was cognizant of the name and style under which the partners transacted their business, and executed the mortgage to the Chicago Lumber Company for the benefit of the partners composing the partnership transacting business in that name. The mortgage was therefore taken in the name of the partnership; hence there was an actual grantee in the mortgage, although such grantee was merely the name and style of the partnership;" and the legal title was regarded as held in trust for the real grantees, the partners, which, as we have seen, is all that is necessary where a sale, and not the possession of the land, is sought, in proceedings to enforce the mortgage as a security.

The case of Stambridge v. Smith, 23 Ohio St. 596, is not in point. The real question there was, not whether a firm could hold the title to a lease in its firm name, but whether it could be released by the firm in its own name, the legal title being not in it, but in a member in trust for it. It was held that it could not, for the very plain reason that the custui gus trust can in no case transfer the legal title. That can only be done by the trustee. The case does not decide, nor was it intended to decide, that a partnership may not hold a lease in its firm name, so as to be protected in the enjoyment of it according to the intention of the parties. That it may hold the equitable title in fee simple was held in Rammelsberg v. Mitchell, supra.

We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the answer and cross-petition of the Bank.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

v.

Frances H. ENOS, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(.... Wis.)

1. A right of way across a lot given by a conveyance of an adjoining lot to be used in common with the grantors and the owners and occupants of the former lot, is a right appurtenant to the lot conveyed, and the grantee after he has conveyed the lot cannot claim to be still entitled to use the right of way in connection with any other lot subsequently acquired.

2. An easement of a right of way is not presumed to be personal, where it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate.

3. A reservation in a conveyance of a lot which has a right of way appurtenant of such right of way to the grantor is ineffectual. He cannot enlarge the right, or retain any interest in the right of way as separate and distinct from the lot to which it belongs.

APPEAL by defendant, Frances H. Enos, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Waukesha County in favor of plaintiff, Reise, in an action brought to enjoin defendant from obstructing or closing up a certain alleged alley, and to recover damages on account of temporary obstruction of the same. Reversed.

The alley was alleged to exist across the rear ends of lots 8 and 4 of Kimball's plat of subdivision of a part of the Mill Reserve in the Village of Waukesha. Said plat consists of a triangular parcel of ground bounded by Mill Street and Clinton Street, which streets intersect at its northwest corner, and by "block J," of N. W. Addition. It is divided into lots 1, 2, 8 and 4, all fronting on Mill Street. Lot 4 lies next to Clinton Street and the alleged alley or right of way extends across the rear ends of lots 4 and 8 to lot 2.

The following is a diagram of the premises in controversy:

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Parks & Robinson and Griswold, Chaffin & Martin, for appellant:

The way so granted was clearly appurtenant to lot 8, and the respondent, under the grant, obtained no personal right to the use of said way, apart from his ownership of said lot.

NOTE.—Easement defined.

An easement is an interest in land created by grant or agreement, express or implied, which confers a right upon the owner thereof to some profit, benefit, dominion or lawful use out of or over the estate of another. Huyok v. Andrews, 3 L. R. A. 189, 113 N. Y. 81.

In order to pass as appurtenant there must, as a general proposition, be an existing easement in the technical sense of the word, meaning thereby the right to use another's land for special and temporary purposes, in connection with the land for the use and enjoyment of which the right is exercised.

2 Washb. Real Prop. 623.

Counsel cannot claim the right of way across lot 4, as an appurtenance within the legal and ordinary meaning of the word, that would make it necessary to the enjoyment of said lot 3, without which the grant itself would be of no effect.

Cole, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There does not appear to be any sufficient ground for holding, upon the undisputed facts, that the plaintiff, Reise, as owner of lot 3, acquired a right of way over lot 4 by prescription, because he had not owned that lot twenty years when this action was commenced, and it does not appear that his grantors ever had or claimed the right to pass across lots 3 and 4 to Clinton Street. Indeed, one of his grantors, Mr. Hill, distinctly testified that, while his wife owned lot 2, there was no right of way across these, and that they never went through in that direction, but that the ordinary way was out from the back of lot 2, and, be added, there was a high fence built up to Mr. Reise's store, and at the rear of the store came down to this double privy. This evidence effectually disposes of any claim or pretense to a right of way from lot 3 over lot 4 founded upon adverse user of twenty years, if such claim were seriously insisted upon, as it is not. The right of way, if it exists, must rest upon grant; and appurtenance to the land, following it into the hands of each successive grantee. Parish v. Caspare, 7 West. Rep. 370, 108 Ind. 594.

Right to use an alley which is the only approach from the highway to land sold passes as an appurtenance. Zell v. First Universalist Society, 12 Cent. Rep. 146, 119 Pa. 390.

Where the deed conveyed the right of way, of undefined width, with a stipulation to have and hold said rights and privileges to the use of the company as long as required, nothing more passes than an easement in or right of way over the land. Douglas v. Thomas, 1 West. Rep. 171, 103 Ind. 187.

Grant of right of way, when personal, is not assignable or inheritable, and cannot pass to a trustee in insolvency, or to a corporation succeeding the individual grantee. Hall v. Armstrong, 1 New Eng. Rep. 231, 68 Conn. 334.

An easement or servitude created by deed is never presumed to be personal or in gross, when it can be fairly construed to be appurtenant to some other estate; and when the reservation naturally operates to enhance the value of the other adjacent lands of the grantor, it is a strong circumstance to indicate that it was intended to be appurtenant to the estate, and not merely personal to the grantor. McMahon v. Williams, 79 Ala. 288.

As to way of necessity, see note to Logan v. Stogdale (Ind.) 3 L. R. A. 55.

Rights of parties.

To constitute an easement there must be two distinct tenements, the dominant to which the right belongs, and the servient upon which the obligation rests. Pierce v. Keator, 70 N. Y. 421; Wolfe v. Frost, 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1027; Wagner v. Hanna, 28 Cal. 116.

Where the owner of a tract of land makes one part of it servient to another by an alteration which is obvious and permanent, and then conveys one of the parts, three things are essential: (1) a separation of the title; (2) that before the separation takes place the use which gives rise to the easement shall have been so long continued and so obvious as to show that it was meant to be permanent; and (3) that the easement shall be necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted or retained. Kelly v. Dunning, 8 Cent. Rep. 600, 60 N. J. Eq. 82; Wetmore v. Fiske, 4 New Eng. Rep. 796, 15 R. I. 300.

The grantee of such part takes it benefited or burdened by the easement which the alteration created. Ibid.

If the owner of land annexes to part of it a right of way, as appurtenant to the land, and then conveys such land, his grantees acquire an easement. Parish v. Caspare, 7 West. Rep. 369, 108 Ind. 592.

The vendor of a lot carved out of a larger plot owned by him can impose no servitude upon the lot in favor of the portion retained by him, in derogation of his grant, without an express reservation to that effect in the grant. Bloat v. McDougall, 30 N. Y. S. R. 912.

The rights of a party having an easement in the land of another are measured and defined by the purpose and character of that easement. See note to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Houghton (Ill.) 1 L. R. A. 222.

there in fact is where the plaintiff's counsel does rest it. It appears that Reise was at the commencement of the action the owner of lot 2; it having been conveyed to him by Hill and wife in August, 1870. He was formerly the owner of lot 3; it having been conveyed to him in 1864 by Cook and wife, who then owned both lots 3 and 4. In this deed from Cook to Reise of lot 3, there is granted, among other things, "a right of way from Clinton Street across the rear of said lot 4 to the rear end of lot 3, to be used in common with the owners and occupants of said lot 4 and with the said parties of the first part, and their heirs and assigns," reserving a room in the privy, which was on the back end of lot 3, for the use of the grantors and assigns.

In May, 1887, Reise conveyed lot 3 to the grantor of the defendant, Elihu Enos, by a deed which contained this clause: "Saving and reserving to the said parties of the first part, from the operation of this conveyance, the right of way being in use in and across the rear of lot 3 for their use in common, and the use of their heirs and assigns forever, with the owners and occupants of said lot 3, for use as a passageway to the right of way in the rear of lot 4, in said plat of said subdivision of said mill reserve running across said lot 4 to Clinton Street, in said village, also, giving and granting to said parties of the second part the use of the right of way from Clinton Street across the rear of said lot 4 to the rear end of said lot 3, in common with the parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns forever, and the owners and occupants of said lot 4. It is intended to specially reserve hereby from the operation of this conveyance the right of way to the parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns, forever, the free and uninterrupted right of way across the rear of said lots 3 and 4."

In April, 1874, Cook and wife executed a deed to the appellant, Frances H. Enos, conveying lot 4, in effect, with this reservation, subject to the right of way and passage from Clinton Street across the rear of said lot 4 to the rear end of lot 3.

Now, it is on the language of these deeds that the plaintiff predicates his right, as owner of lot 2, to the right of way from that lot across lot 3, and also across the rear of lot 4 to Clinton Street, and the simple question presented is, Can that right be maintained upon the language of the deeds? So far as lot 3 is concerned, there can be no doubt, as he expressly reserved that right in his conveyance to the grantor of Elihu Enos. He owned lot 3, and could reserve such right of way in his grant. There is no controversy upon that point. But, after he had conveyed away lot 3, can he still claim the right to a passageway across lot 4? The contention of appellant's counsel is that the right of the grantee in the deed from Cook to Reise in 1864, when lot 3 was conveyed, of a right of way from Clinton Street across the rear of lot 4 to the rear end of lot 3, was a right of way appurtenant to lot 3, and that this right cannot be enlarged so that it can be used or maintained in connection with any other lot to which he subsequently acquired a title; for, he says, the easement granted was not one in gross, but was to be enjoyed by the owner of lot 3, and could not be applied to another estate. We think this position is correct, and is sustained by the cases to which counsel refers. It is very clear that the easement is not what is called in the books an "easement in gross," that is, a personal right only, which might be assigned by the grantee to another person, but that it is an easement or right of way which is appurtenant to the land conveyed, and which will pass with that lot to another, where proper words of conveyance are used. Such an easement is not presumed to be personal where it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate. Washb. Easem. *20, 181; Dennis v. Wilson, 107 Mass. 591, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Koelle, 104 Ill. 455.

In the language of the authorities, lot 3, to which the easement is appurtenant, is the dominant estate, and lot 4, over which the easement is enjoyed, is a servient estate. It scarcely need be remarked that it is essential that the two estates should belong to different persons; for if the two estates belong to the same individual, he would have the right, as owner, to use each in any manner that might suit his convenience or pleasure. But, as to the point that Reise had, by the original deed of 1864, an easement or right of way over lot 4 as appurtenant to the lot conveyed to him, that is to say, lot 3, it seems to us there can be no doubt upon the authorities; and it appears to be equally well settled in the law that where, by one and the same deed, for one consideration, a man conveys a parcel out of a larger tract of land, and grants a right of way to him and his heirs in his own land obviously useful and necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted, the grantee takes the right of way therein as appurtenant to the land granted only, and has no right to use it as appurtenant to other land afterwards acquired. This is substantially the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Starnes v. Mullen, 4 Gray, 151. To the same effect are the decisions in Davenport v. Lamson, 21 Pick. 72, Cotton v. Pocasset Mfg. Co. 13 Met. 433, Smith v. Porter, 10 Gray, 60; French v. Morstin, 24 N. H. 440; Shroder v. Brenneman, 23 Pa. 348; Gunsen v. Healy, 100 Pa. 42.

It is said that the right of way from Clinton Street across the rear of lot 4 to the rear end of lot 3, contained in the deed from Cook to Reise, is granted in general terms, and does not restrict the right to lot 3, or expressly declare it appurtenant to that lot. But still the legal implication is that the right was to be used and enjoyed by the owner of lot 3, and in connection with that lot. It is therefore appurtenant to lot 3, to which it is annexed, and cannot be enjoyed separate and distinct from the lot to which it belongs. Nor could Reise, to whom the right was originally granted, enlarge the right, and subject the servient estate to a new species of burden. But it is a general principle that, where an easement has become appurtenant to an estate, it follows every part of such estate, into whosoever hands the same may come, by purchase or descent, providing the burden on the servient estate is not thereby increased. This doctrine is fully discussed and illustrated in Washb. Easem. 3d ed. 34-36; Goddard, Easem. 324. And it is well settled that, if a person has a right of way over the land of another to a particular close, he cannot enlarge it or extend it to other closes. That doctrine is decisive of this case.

It follows that the plaintiff, Reise, had no right to the use of the way over the rear of lot 4 except as the owner of 8, and could not, by virtue of the grant, use the way in connection with lot 2, which he subsequently acquired; for he had parted with his estate in lot 8. This point is so clearly and distinctly decided by the cases to which we have referred, and others which might be added to the same effect, that it is unnecessary to discuss the question further here.

We do not see that Reise's right is affected, so far as lot 4 is concerned, by the reservation in his deed to the grantor of Elibu Enos. Of course, he had the right of way through lot 8, which he had conveyed; but that was of no practical value to him unless he could use it in connection with the right of way across lot 4 to Clinton Street. But, as that right of way was only appurtenant to lot 8, he could not use it as a right of way to and from lot 2, because to do so would enlarge and extend the right over the servient estate to another lot. The right of way from lot 2 across lots 8 and 4, as we have said, rests upon grant, or on the language of the deeds referred to. There is no claim that, by the recorded plat which is mentioned in the conveyances, such right of passage existed by dedication. Indeed, the latter claim, if made, would be fully set at rest by the testimony of Hill, who says that, while his wife owned lot 2, there was no passageway across in that direction which was used. This satisfactorily shows that no such way in fact existed, or was supposed to exist, in consequence of an alley being marked on a plat extending from Clinton Street to the southwest corner of lot 2. In many cases where lots are platted and conveyed according to the recorded plat, which shows an alley or street abutting or bounding the lot, an inference arises that it was intended to dedicate the alley or street for the benefit of the adjoining lot owners. But from the undisputed facts in this case no such inference can be made.

In any view which we have been able to take of the case, we think the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause be remanded with directions to dismiss the complaint.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase certain real estate. Reversed.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander Thain, with Mr. James P. Campbell, for appellant.

Mr. James B. Dill, for respondent:

The record supplies the fact of the residence of the subscribing witness. Tucker conveyed the property to Lawrence, and Lawrence's deed describes Tucker as of the City of New York. Whatever doubt exists relates to the record, not to the title. The title is the substance and the record is merely one of the sources of evidence of that title.

A party in actual possession under color of title is presumed to have title even against an adverse claim of title supported by a deed and a record.

Even if the record is insufficient, the evidence proves the execution of the deed from Lawrence and shows that the plaintiff has a good and valid title to the premises in question.

Defects in the record or paper title may be cured or removed by parol evidence.

Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 60.

When the judicial doubt as to the validity of a title depends upon a question of fact, the test is whether, upon all the evidence, in a trial at law, the court would order a verdict in favor of the title.

Hack v. Volk, 14 N. Y. S. R. 409.

In order to throw doubt upon a title, it is necessary to show facts which tend to question the proof of the plaintiff's title.

Meier v. Costanza, 9 Cent. Rep. 427, 107 N. Y. 38.

Judge, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this action was to compel the specific performance by the defendant of a contract made April 18, 1867, to purchase from the plaintiff certain real estate in the City of New York. Upon May 18, 1867, the day appointed for the performance of the contract, the plaintiff duly tendered to the defendant a deed sufficient in form to convey the premises described, executed by her as grantor. The defendant objected to the proposed title, among others, upon the ground that there was no legal evidence of the transfer of title by Thomas Lawrence, through whom the plaintiff claims.

It was conceded on the trial that Thomas Lawrence had title to the premises previous to and in the year 1871, and it was claimed that on November 28 of that year he conveyed the same to Eliza Irving, the plaintiff's grantor, by warranty deed.

This deed was attempted to be proved by a copy of the record in the register's office of the City of New York, duly certified by him to be a correct copy thereof. From such certificate it appeared that a deed from Thomas Lawrence to Eliza Irving of the premises in question, purporting to have been acknowledged and proved by Gideon J. Tucker, the subscribing witness thereto, had been recorded in such register's office.

This acknowledgment did not state the place of residence of the subscribing witness, neither did that fact appear from any part of the deed or the notarial certificate.

Thomas Lawrence, the grantor, died unmarried and childless, in 1875 or 1876, and the original deed was shown to have been lost at about that time; so that the only written evidence of its execution consisted of the record referred to.

At the time fixed for the performance of the contract, the plaintiff and her grantor had occupied the premises for about sixteen years only, and failed by about four years from completing the possession necessary to perfect title by adverse possession.

That the deed from Lawrence to Eliza Irving was actually made and delivered to the grantee by Lawrence was satisfactorily proved upon the trial of this case, but such proof rested altogether in parol, and might or might not be available to the holders of title under the plaintiff in any subsequent litigation between them and adverse claimants under Lawrence.

It is not disputed by the respondent but that the purchaser under this contract was entitled to a marketable title, free from any reasonable doubt, and she undertakes to sustain the contention that this is such title, mainly by the claim that the Lawrence deed was properly recorded. The question as to what constitutes a marketable title has been the frequent subject of discussion in this court in recent cases, and may be regarded as settled by authority. The rule as to the quality of such title is quite fully stated by Judge Earl in Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586. He there says: "There is no record or document which precludes Barnes from enforcing his judgment against the lot. The recitals in the deed of Gulon to these defendants do not bind him and are not evidence against him, a prior incumbrancer. All the evidence to defeat his lien rests in parol and depends upon the memory of living witnesses. Whenever Barnes attempts to enforce his lien against the lot he can be defeated only by a resort to the evidence of such witnesses, who may then be dead or inaccessible. . . . Is a purchaser bound to take a title which he can defend only by a resort to parol evidence, which time, death or some other casualty may place beyond his reach? . . . Aside from the language used in the contract, it is familiar law that an agreement to make a good title is always implied in executory contracts for the sale of land, and that a purchaser is never bound to accept a defective title, unless he expressly stipulates to take such title, knowing its defects. . . . A good title means not merely a title valid in fact, but a marketable title which can again be sold to a reasonable purchaser or mortgaged to a person of reasonable prudence as a security for a loan of money. A purchaser will not generally be compelled to take a title when there is a defect in the record title which can be cured only by a resort to parol evidence."

It was also said by Judge Andrews, in Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 10, 1 Cent. Rep. 267: "A title open to a reasonable doubt is not a marketable title. The court cannot make it such by passing upon an objection depending on a disputed question of fact or a doubtful question of law, in the absence of the party in whom the outstanding right was vested. He would not be bound by the adjudication and could raise the same question in a new proceeding. . . . It would especially be unjust to compel a purchaser to take a title, the validity of which depended upon a question of fact, where the facts presented upon the application might be changed on a new inquiry or are open to opposing inferences." See Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253, ante, 591.

Whatever conclusion might be reached by us in this case as to the validity of the plaintiff's title must therefore be unavailing to her grantee in any future contest with claimants under Lawrence, either by inheritance or purchase. In the absence of a good record title, he must necessarily be driven to rely for a defense upon parol evidence, which might then be accessible or not, according to circumstances beyond his control. It would seem, therefore, from the authorities, that the title tendered to the defendant was not so free from reasonable doubt as to require him to accept it, unless we conclude that the Lawrence deed was properly acknowledged so as to entitle it to be recorded. It therefore becomes material to consider the sufficiency of the acknowledgment of this deed. These Acts (3 Rev. Stat. 7th ed. p. 2215, §§ 1-17) provided, among other things, that an unrecorded deed shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate. § 1, chap. 8, pt. 2.

Such deed may be so acknowledged as to be entitled to be recorded by the person executing it, or by a subscribing witness. § 12.

When the proof is made by a subscribing witness, he shall state his place of residence and that he knew the person described in and who executed such conveyance. Ibid.

"Every officer who shall take the acknowledgment or proof of any conveyance shall indorse a certificate thereof, signed by himself, on the conveyance, and in such certificate shall set forth the matters hereinbefore required to be done, known or proved on such acknowledgment or proof, together with the names of the witnesses examined before such officer, and the places of their residence, and the substance of the evidence given by them." § 15.

"Every conveyance acknowledged or proved and certified in the manner above prescribed, by any of the officers before named, may be read in evidence without further proof thereof, and shall be entitled to be recorded." § 16.

"The record of a conveyance duly recorded, or a transcript thereof duly certified, may also be read in evidence with the like force and effect as the original conveyance." § 17.

It would thus appear by the express language of the Statute that a conveyance of lands can be proved only by the acknowledgment to a public officer of its execution by the person making it, or by the affidavit of a subscribing witness having a place of residence, which must be stated to the officer taking the proof, and be inserted by him in the certificate required to be made and indorsed on the conveyance.

The provisions of the Revised Statutes were mostly new, and effected radical changes in respect to the laws relating to the proof and acknowledgment of conveyances, and especially in regard to such proof when made by a subscribing witness. The revisors, in their notes upon section 15, say that so much thereof as refers to the residence of witnesses is new, and was "deemed desirable in order to detect fraud, or to sustain an honest deed." 5 Stat. at L. 845.

The established canons for the construction of statutes require the courts to examine the condition of the law prior to the adoption of the statute, in order to discover its reason and purpose, and to so interpret it as to give effect to such purpose and object. Waller v. Harris, 20 Wend. 555.

The imperative language of the Statute respecting the residence of subscribing witnesses, as well as its plain object, would seem to preclude the court from considering its requirements as either directory or immaterial. It was plainly intended to remedy defects in the pre-existing law, which experience had shown to be dangerous.

Proof of a conveyance by a subscribing witness being liable to be rebutted by evidence that he was interested or incompetent (§ 17), it became important that parties interested should have some means of identifying such witness, aside from his mere name, which, in many cases, would be misleading and unreliable. The witness is therefore expressly required to state his residence, and that fact must also be incorporated in the certificate. This requirement has, in the safeguard it affords the public against possible frauds, a plain and obvious purpose to serve, which cannot be disregarded without opening the door to the most manifest abuse and imposition. To consider this provision as directory or immaterial violates the language of the Statute, deprives it of its efficacy, and puts in the power of unknown and uncertain persons the opportunity to foist upon the record evidence of important transactions in real estate without any adequate security against imposition and fraud. It is not necessary that this certificate should be expressed in the language of the Statute, or according to any precise form; but in respect to its substantial provisions, it is indispensable that they should in some way be contained in it, and convey to all persons knowledge of the required information.

In the certificate in question no attempt is made to comply with the requirement of the Statute in respect to the residence of the witness, and there is nothing in the circumstances surrounding the transaction which can properly supply the omission to do so. We have not been referred by the respondent to any authority on the point holding such an acknowledgment to be valid or sufficient.

In Dible v. Rogers, 18 Wend. 538, it was held, where a deed was acknowledged by the grantor, that the identity of the person making the acknowledgment was not required to be proved to the officer taking it, by the subscribing witness; but that other persons acquainted with him might make the necessary proof, and the certificate would be sufficient although the residence of such witness was not stated therein. It was assumed, however, in the opinion, that the Statute required the residence of the witness to be imperatively stated only in the case of a subscribing witness making proof himself of the execution of the deed.

It was held in Fryer v. Beckfeller, 63 N. Y. 309, that an acknowledgment which failed to state that the persons making it were known to the officer as the persons described in and who executed the deed, although it did state they were "grantors of the within indenture," was fatally defective, and did not entitle the deed to be recorded.

We find no authorities holding that a material provision of the Statute, expressly required to be stated, can be wholly disregarded, and a deed thus acknowledged lawfully admitted to record. That a deed improperly recorded cannot be read in evidence has been determined in numerous cases. Morris v. Keyes, 1 Hill, 640; Clark v. Nison, 5 Hill, 36.

The cases of Jackson v. Gumaer, 2 Cow. 532; West Point Iron Co. v. Raymond, 45 N. Y. 703, and Canandaigua Academy v. McKechnie, 80 N. Y. 618, referred to by the respondent, are not authorities on the point. These cases all arose under deeds executed previous to the adoption of the Revised Statutes, and under a statute which did not require the residence of the subscribing witness to be stated in the certificate of acknowledgment.

We should have been gratified in this particular case if we could have reached a conclusion in favor of the sufficiency of the plaintiff's title, because we feel convinced that the lapse of time will soon cure any defects in her title; but a careful regard for the salutary provisions of the Statute has seemed to us to forbid such a result. The mere fact that in this case the subscribing witness was a well-known and respected citizen, whose residence was widely known, cannot work a change in a general rule provided by Statute, and we are therefore constrained to hold that the acknowledgment in this case does not entitle the Lawrence deed to be read in evidence.

The judgment of the General and Special Terms should therefore be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George W. VENABLE et al., Appts.,

Charles RICKENBERG and Traders' National Bank.

(...Mass....)

1. If an equitable attachment of a debtor's property is prohibited by statute, the property cannot be reached in equity and the statute avoided merely by a change in the form of proceedings.

2. A suit in equity to reach and apply property to the payment of a debt cannot be maintained either under the general equity jurisdiction or under a statute which permits such suit in case the property "cannot be come at to be attached or taken on execution in a suit at law," where the property is in its nature attachable by trustee process, but cannot be attached in the particular case because of a statute prohibiting the collecting of that particular kind of debt by attachment, "either by trustee process or otherwise."

(June 22, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County dismissing a bill filed to reach and apply certain property to the payment of a debt. Bill dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Meers, Warren & Brandeis and William H. Dunbar, for appellants:

The effect of the discharge in bankruptcy, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, was merely to exempt Rickenberg thereafter from arrest, and to exempt his subsequently acquired property "from attachment by trustee process or otherwise" upon any proceeding to enforce the payment of the debt due by him to the plaintiffs.

Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 88; Maxwell v. Cochran, 186 Mass. 78.

A judgment creditor's bill will lie, to reach and apply in satisfaction of the judgment a debt due the judgment debtor, at least when the remedy by trustee process is not available.

Edgell v. Haywood, 3 Atk. 252; Edmeston v. Lyde, 1 Paige, 687, 641, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed.

781, 783. See Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns. 554; Powell v. Howell, 63 N. C. 255.

Where by statute garnishment proceedings have been introduced, judgment creditor's bills are frequently resorted to to reach debts due the debtor, whenever an obstacle exists to the maintenance of proceedings at law.

Hinsdale D. G. Co. v. Tilley, 10 Bim. 773; Pendleton v. Perkins, 49 Mo. 567; Farlong v. Thomsen, 1 West. Rep. 729, 19 Mo. App. 364.

As our courts now possess full equity powers, the existence of the statutory remedy by trustee process, even if available, would not abridge the powers of this court as a court of general equity jurisdiction.

If Mass. Pub. Stat., chap. 157, § 88, be construed as denying to a nonresident judgment creditor the right to reach, in equity, after return of nulla bona, property of the debtor not otherwise exempt from being taken on execution, and of such a nature that it cannot be taken at law, the Statute is, in that respect, in derogation of the Federal Constitution, and therefore void.

A State cannot by statute discharge a debtor from pre-existing debts due to citizens of the State itself, such a law being deemed to impair the obligation of the contract.

Whatever will be an impairment of the obligation of a pre-existing contract between citizens of the State passing a particular law, as operating to discharge the debt, will equally be an impairment of the obligation of a contract subsequently made between a citizen of that State and a citizen of a different State.

See M'Millan v. M'Neill, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 209 (4 L. ed. 553); Keaton v. Stewart, 44 Pa. 179.

NOTE.—It is within the general jurisdiction of a court of chancery to assist a judgment creditor to reach and apply to the payment of his debt any property of the judgment debtor which, by reason of its nature only, and not by reason of any positive rule exempting it, cannot be taken on execution at law; as in case of trust property, on which the judgment debtor has the entire beneficial interest of shares in a corporation, or of choses in action.

No statute is valid which so changes the remedy as to impair the substantive rights of the creditor.

Therefore an unreasonable exemption of property, or the imposition of conditions and limitations that unreasonably clog the plaintiff's efforts to enforce his rights, or any change rendering his remedy nugatory, will be held invalid as impairing the obligation of the contract.

Mr. George Fred Williams, for appellant:

Pub. Stat., chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11, has never been treated as a provision in aid of an execution, but is simply an extension of the trustee process to reach property so situated as to be unavailable to the creditor by reason of the nature, kind, condition, situation or title of the property.

Agar v. Murray, 105 U. S. 126 (26 L. ed. 942); Schlesinger v. Sherman, 127 Mass. 208; Crompton v. Anthony, 13 Allen, 88, 87.

There is no general equity jurisdiction available to a creditor except in the aid of the law. That which is claimed in this case is in contravention of the law in that it is sought to provide a remedy from which the creditor is by law definitely excluded.

Pitts v. Hagley, 12 Pick. 572; Chetani v. Richardson, 12 Allen, 265; Carpenter v. King, 9 Met. 511; Murphy v. Manning, 134 Mass. 489.

Where the statutes of the Commonwealth provide a remedy by trustee process and in equity against every description of property, applicable to the payment of debts, the general equity powers of the courts should not be called to the aid of a nonresident creditor, who, by refusing to put himself within the scope of the Insolvency Laws, is cut off from a plain statutory remedy.

Emery v. Bidwell, 140 Mass. 271, 275, 1 New Eng. Rep. 231.

3 L. R. A.

Field, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs recovered judgment against Rickenberg on December 23, 1887. The claim on which the judgment was recovered became due and payable before the first publication of the notice of the issuing of the warrant in the proceedings in insolvency which were instituted by Rickenberg on April 7, 1886, and although this claim was provable against the estate of Rickenberg in insolvency it was not proved. The debt due from the Traders' National Bank to Rickenberg, which the plaintiffs seek to reach and apply to the payment of their judgment, is "property and estate" acquired by Rickenberg subsequently to the time of the first publication of the notice of the issuing of the warrant. The plaintiffs, at the time of the first publication of the notice, were, and ever since have been, residents of the State of New York, and Rickenberg was and is a resident and citizen of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is conceded, as we understand, by the counsel for the plaintiffs, that but for the provisions of Pub. Stat., chap. 157, § 80, the debt due from the Bank to Rickenberg could be attached by the plaintiffs by trustee process, and it must be inferred from the allegations of the bill that this debt is of such a nature that it could be attached by trustee process, by any person who has a similar cause of action on which he has a right to attach the property of Rickenberg. If Pub. Stat., chap. 157, § 83, is a constitutional and valid Statute, the plaintiffs cannot attach this debt in a suit on their judgment "by trustee process or otherwise;" if this section is void in its application to nonresident creditors, the plaintiffs can attach this debt by trustee process. Under either view there is no jurisdiction in equity. The Statute prohibits certain remedies to these plaintiffs for the collection of a debt due from an insolvent debtor in Massachusetts who has obtained his discharge. An attachment in equity is within the prohibition, and the Statute cannot be avoided by a change in the form of proceedings. Marwell v. Cochran, 136 Mass. 73.

This suit cannot be regarded as a method of levying an execution on a judgment obtained at law. Jurisdiction in equity to entertain bills like this is expressly limited to bills to reach and apply property "which cannot be come at to be attached or taken on execution in a suit at law." Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11.

This means property which is of such a nature that it cannot be attached or taken on execution in a suit at law. We must hold that the same limitation attaches in this Commonwealth to suits brought under the general equity jurisdiction of the court to collect a judgment obtained at law. If the property in its nature is attachable by trustee process, a suit in equity cannot be maintained to reach and apply it in payment of a debt of a special kind which by the statutes cannot be collected by an attachment of this property either "by trustee process or otherwise." Debts can be attached in action at law only by trustee process, and only certain actions at law can be begun by trustee process. Pub. Stat. chap. 153, § 1.

Legal causes of action, which cannot be prosecuted by trustee process, cannot be prosecuted in equity to reach property in its nature attachable by trustee process, because trustee process will not lie. To hold otherwise would be to contravene the will of the Legislature. For the same reason, if it be true that Pub. Stat., chap. 157, § 85, does not leave the plaintiffs in this case any adequate remedy at law, equity cannot supply the deficiency. Emery v. Bidwell, 140 Mass. 271, 1 New Eng. Rep. 281;

Schlesinger v. Sherman, 127 Mass. 206; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co., 149 Mass. 84.

We must decline to consider whether Pub. Stat., chap. 157, § 85, is inconsistent either with the Constitution of the United States or with the Constitution of the Commonwealth, because a determination of these questions is not necessary to the decision of the case.

Bill dismissed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Elias A. B. McCARTER et al., Repts.,

v.

Lawson K. ARMSTRONG, Appel.

(.....S. C.)

Specific performance will not be granted of a contract to clear out the channel of a creek so as to allow running water to flow freely, and make a ditch of sufficient size to drain the lands of another party, and to keep such ditch open and unobstructed forever. The case is one in which the injury can be redressed by damages in an action at law.

(March 2, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for York County decreeing specific performance of a contract. Reversed.

The contract, the specific performance of which was sought, is as follows:

"This indenture between Lawson K. Armstrong, of the first part, and Elias A. B. McCarter, D. W. McCarter, J. R. McCarter, Joseph Herndon, Curtis M. Parrott and James B. Woods, of the second part, witnesseth: Whereas the party of the first part is the owner of a certain mill and mill-site on Allison Creek, in said county and State, extending up to high-water mark, as indicated by the pond, and formerly known as the 'Patton Mill,' and whereas the parties of the second part are the owners of lands lying above the said creek from said mill, the McCarters together, and the others severally, owning separate tracts, and each tract being injured by said pond in this: that it is wholly impracticable to drain the bottoms thereon without letting and keeping down the dam, and ditching the stream that lies within the boundaries of the said pond; and whereas the boundary of the said high water mark has just been ascertained by a survey, as evidenced by a plat made by Sur-

NOTE.—Specific performance, not a matter of right.

Specific execution of a contract is not a matter of right, but rests in the discretion of the court. Willard v. Taylor, 75 U. S. 3 Wall. 587 (12 L. ed. 501); Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 269 (19 L. ed. 255).

Such discretion is not an arbitrary or capricious one, but controlled by the settled principles of equity. Willard v. Taylor, supra.

vijor W. B. Allison, May 4, 1896, which is attached to and made a part of this indenture, to the end that the dam may be removed without having said boundary in doubt: I. That, in consideration of the covenants, agreements, grants and quit-claims of the parties of the second part, hereinafter specifically recited, the first party, for himself, his heirs and assigns, does by these presents covenant and grant with and to the parties of the second part, their several heirs and assigns, as follows, to wit: 1. That the said first party is to take down so much of the mill-dam as may be necessary for the purpose hereinafter stated, and never again to erect the same, or to do or to suffer any other act that will interfere with the full flow of water along the channel of said creek, over the land that the said mill is situated upon, and, further, to dig out, ditch and open the channel of said creek up to the 'Scruggs' line, so as to allow all running water to flow freely. The ditch to be sufficient in size to drain the lands of the parties of the second part above, by carrying off all the ordinary water from the lands of the second parties, and to be completed by the first day of July, 1896, unless prevented by rocks that require blasting, and then in a reasonable time thereafter, and to be kept open and unobstructed forever, unless obstructions below the line of the first party cause a common fill of the ditch above said line. 2. That for the faithful performance of these covenants, and every of them, the first party hereby binds himself to the second parties in the penal sum of six hundred dollars. 3. That, the better to secure the rights hereby intended to be given to the parties of the second part, the first party does hereby grant to the parties of the second part the right to the full, free and uninterrupted enjoyment of the natural flow of water along the said watercourse, as the same will naturally run over the lands of the first party after the removal of the dam, and the ditching as aforesaid, and to the extent of the boundary of said land below the said dam, together with such free ingress and egress as may be necessary to insure the proper enjoyment of the easement hereby granted: To have and to hold, all and singular, the privileges aforesaid to the parties of the second part, their respective heirs and assigns, forever. II. That, in consideration of the above covenants and grants, the parties of the second part hereby agree to pay, at the execution of this indenture do pay (the first party acknowledging his receipt), the sum of six hundred dollars to the first party; and, in addition thereto, they, for themselves and their respective heirs and assigns, do by these presents covenant and grant with and to the party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, as follows, to wit: 1. That it shall be lawful for the said party of the first part, and the right is hereby granted to him, (1) to use and enjoy, as a way to and from the bottoms of the first party, the 'old track' leading from the main road to the said bottoms; and (2) to remove all growing timber around the edges of the 'pond bottoms' shading and injuring the growing crops: To have and to hold said privileges, to the said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, forever. 2. That the parties of the second part do by these

If the objection to the title of the defendant is sound, this is not a case in which a court of equity can decree a specific performance, providing that compensation be made to the purchaser. Emrich v. White, 68 How. Pr. 169.

If it turns out that defendant cannot make a title to that which he has agreed to convey, the purchaser is left to seek his remedy at law in damages for the breach. Reifeld v. Woodfolk, 68 U. S. 25 How. 215 (16 L. ed. 370).

Jurisdiction will not be exercised where adequate compensation can be recovered by an action at law. Roundtree v. McLain, Hemp. 246.

If there is an adequate legal remedy the court will refuse specific performance, unless, under all the circumstances, it would be inequitable and unjust to do so. Simon v. Wildt, 34 Ky. 167.

Specific performance will not be decreed on a contract, relating to personal property, unless relief at law is inadequate, and unless the thing contracted for has some intrinsic or special value. Cohn v. Mitchell, 2 West. Rep. 62, 115 Ill. 124.

Specific performance of a contract for personal services will not be enforced, especially where there is any remedy at law. Ikerd v. Denver, 4 West. Rep. 447, 100 Ind. 453; *Wollenhak v. So specific performance will not be granted of covenants by the licensee of a patent to render monthly reports, to pay royalties and perform personal duties. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Freeman Wire Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 410.

In cases of specific performance, parties are sometimes remitted to a court of law; but this is never done where the remedy is not as effectual and complete there as a chancellor can make it. May v. Le Claire, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 217 (22 L. ed. 224).

Specific performance will not be decreed where the party who asks for it has an adequate remedy provided by the reservation in his deed and by the contract itself. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 222 (23 L. ed. 224).

Specific performance is never decreed where the party can be otherwise fully compensated. Memphis v. Brown, 57 U. S. 20 Wall. 222 (22 L. ed. 224).

The court ought not to adjudge a specific performance, by the defendant, of the duty imposed upon it by the statute: the plaintiff should be left to his remedy for damages. Clarke v. Rochester, L. & N. F. M. Co. 12 Barb. 222; Morse v. Hinesdorf, 11 Paige, 277, 6 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 222.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellant:

Equity should not entertain this bill as one for specific performance.

Equity will never assume the enforcement of a contract where there is doubt or uncertainty as to time, mode or manner of performance. It will not assume to command the doing of an act by another where it cannot through its own ministerial officers perform it. It will not decree a performance that cannot be commanded in specie, instantly, directly and in definite terms.

Simpson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Some time in 1886 the plaintiffs, respondents, and the defendant, appellant, entered into a certain written agreement, a copy of which is hereto appended, in which it was stipulated that a certain mill-dam across Allison's Creek, in the County of York, at a point where the defendant had a mill, should be taken down by the defendant and the channel of the creek above said dam dug out, ditched and opened up to the Scruggs line, so as to allow all running water to flow freely, the ditch to be of sufficient size to drain the lands of the respondents, which, it was stated, were greatly injured by the pond, this said work to be completed by the 1st day of July then ensuing, in 1886, unless prevented by rocks requiring blasting, and then in a reasonable time, and when completed to be kept open and unobstructed forever, etc., which the defendant bound himself faithfully to perform in the penal sum of $500, the plaintiffs agreeing to pay the defendant $500 at the execution of the agreement, which payment was acknowledged by the defendant; and also stipulating for some other privileges to the defendant, all of which appears in the agreement appended. The work not having been done, as it is alleged, although frequently requested by the plaintiffs, the action below was commenced in September, 1887, in which the plaintiffs prayed judgment: "(1) That the defendant be forthwith required to cut the said ditch in manner and form as he had undertaken to do, that is to say, so that it would allow all ordinary water to flow freely through it from off the plaintiffs' lands above, and to be of sufficient size for that purpose, and, further, that he be required to keep the same open and unobstructed forever, and, failing in this, that the plaintiffs be allowed to do the said work at the defendant's expense. (2) For the sum of $500, special damages suffered by the plaintiffs from the defendant's failure of performance up to the present time, as well as for damages to follow hereafter up to the time of performance, and for the costs of this action."

The defendant answered, denying certain allegations of the complaint, but averring that he had performed the work which the agreement required of him, according to the stipulation therein, and further averring that the failure of the ditch to drain plaintiffs' lands was due to other causes than the imperfect construction of the ditch. Before the case came up for trial the defendant gave notice, under Rule 29 of the circuit court, that an order would be applied for submitting certain issues to a jury, and at the November Term, 1886, his honor, Judge Kershaw, upon hearing the motion, made an order appointing a referee to frame jury issues, and continued the case. These issues were framed and afterwards reported to the court. They will be found in the case. When the case afterwards came up for trial, his honor, Judge T. B. Fraser, presiding, "announced (against the objection of the plaintiffs, who contended that the case was one in equity, for specific performance) that he would remit the whole case to a jury and let them find a general verdict; that he was inclined to the opinion that it was not a case of equity jurisdiction for specific performance, but, if he should conclude later that it was such, he would hear the case on calendar 2, when reached on that calendar. The jury found for the defendant, and when the case was reached on calendar 2 the plaintiffs moved for a new trial in the event that his honor still thought the case was a case at law. His honor then announced that he would hear counsel on the prayer for specific performance, after which he filed a decree giving judgment for specific performance and granting such orders as were necessary to enforce said judgment.

The defendant has appealed upon several exceptions, all of which will be found in the case; but, from the view which we have taken of the appeal, we think that exception 5 is the only one that raises any question proper for our consideration. That exception alleges error to his honor "in reversing his first conclusion at the opening of the trial, that the case presented by the pleadings was not one for specific performance, but an action sounding in damages for breach of contract, especially as the trial had been conducted under that ruling." The remedy of specific performance is an equitable remedy, and when the court of equity had a separate existence in this State it attached to that court, or whenever it has a separate existence now this remedy belongs to that court exclusively. "Their distinctive object is to specifically enforce the complainant's equitable right, and to compel the defendant to specifically perform the actual equitable obligation which rests upon him." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1400.

This equity may exist in reference to certain contracts, and also to enforce the performance of trusts, but, whatever may be the character of the case, some equitable feature is necessary in order to entitle the complainant to invoke the aid of the court of equity. Since the adoption of the Code in our State, blending the two courts of law and equity, the same necessity exists. In fact, there has been no change as to equity jurisdiction. The change has been merely as to the mode of procedure. The court of common pleas has an equity side as well as a law side, but neither one of these branches has been extended, or authorized to encroach upon the other. What was a law cause of action before is still a law case, and what was an equity cause is still an equity case. So that to determine the question here, whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to his demand for specific performance, we have only to consider whether he would have been thus entitled under the old court of equity. The matter in contest here is a contract or an agreement for the performance of certain work by the defendant, in order to drain or carry off water from the lands of the plaintiff. Now, as stated above, the old court of equity had jurisdiction to enforce the performance of certain classes of contracts. Does this belong to one of the classes? is the question here. The marked cases in which there was no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the old court were in reference to contracts for the sale of lands, and also for the sale of certain specific chattels, where the said chattels had some special value to the claimant over and above any pecuniary estimate. Id. § 1409.

But still the jurisdiction did not depend entirely upon the nature of the contract, nor upon its subject matter, but upon some equitable feature or element belonging thereto, and this feature was generally the inadequacy of a legal remedy, and, where this existed clearly, there was an equitable jurisdiction for the interpretation of the court of equity, for specific performance. If the breach of the contract, however, could be reasonably satisfied with damages, then the court of equity could not interfere. So that in all these cases in reference to contracts, the underlying principle is the practicability or impracticability of a sufficient and adequate legal remedy. Now, the ordinary legal remedy for the breach of contract is an action for damages; and, where proper damages can be assessed by a jury, it is a law case, and the court of equity has not and cannot take jurisdiction. Here the injury complained of is alleged to be the result of a failure on the part of the defendant to perform his part of the agreement mentioned in the complaint. Admit the failure. Where is the difficulty in proving and recovering the subsequent damages? And why is it that the remedy at law is insufficient or inadequate? We do not see this. The value of the work stipulated in the agreement to the plaintiff was some $600, the amount paid by them to the defendant, and the allowance of some specific privileges to him; and for the performance of the work the defendant bound himself in the penal sum of $600. Thus it seems the parties themselves, in the agreement, determined to some extent the value of said work, if properly performed, and also what amount would cover damages in the event that defendant failed on his part; and we see no reason growing out of the facts, either alleged in the complaint or proved on the trial, which could prevent a jury from giving an adequate redress for such damages, if any, as may have been sustained by the plaintiff. The injury complained of was upon lands. The value of land can certainly be estimated, and we suppose it could be determined whether it had been injured in whole or in part only; and there seems to be no special reason in this case why the extent of the injury could not have been ascertained, and why a sufficient pecuniary compensation for whatever injuries the plaintiff has sustained, if any, would not be satisfactory. But, besides, contracts for building and construction, and for personal acts, etc., will not usually be enforced in a court of equity; but the parties will generally be left to an action of law for their breach, unless under some peculiar circumstances, and unless, too, the work to be done is well defined and specific, and is such as to be within the power of the court to enforce by its decree. Where, however, the work consists of personal acts, requiring protracted supervision and discretion, e. g., such as building contracts for construction of railroads, mining, quarries and the like, the court will not generally interfere. See 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405, and numerous cases in the notes.

Here the work was to be kept up forever.

We have reached our conclusion with some hesitation and doubt, but we think this case was one sounding in damages, and could be redressed, if there has been a breach and injury sustained, by a verdict of a jury; the facts necessary thereto being peculiarly for a jury. We are therefore of the opinion that his honor, the trial judge, erred in reversing his first conclusion, and after a verdict had been rendered for the defendant, in opening the case, and trying it anew upon the equity side of the court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded, with the right of the defendant to enter judgment upon his verdict, without prejudice, however, to plaintiffs to take such action in reference thereto as they may be advised.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed and on June 8, 1890, the following opinion was delivered:

Per Curiam:

After a careful examination of the allegations set forth in the petition, the supreme court decides that it does not appear therefrom that any question, either of fact or of law, involved, has been overlooked by the supreme court.

Petition dismissed.

(.....Mont.....)

1. The existence and effect of an alleged common error are for the court and not for the jury.

2. A common error having the force of law is not shown by the fact that 25 per cent of the mining prospectors of one county in a vast Territory during about two years used a form of verification for location notices which was fatally defective under a law of Congress by reason of omitting to state of the date of the location, where it does not show that any considerable number of persons have relied upon, or sought to fix their rights upon, the alleged common error, or that large property interests depend upon upholding such notice.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in favor of defendants in an action brought to determine adverse claims to a certain mining lode. Reversed.

Statement by DeWitt, J.:

This action is the ordinary one, between claimants of quartz mining ground, brought to determine the right of possession, and the right to proceed in the United States land office to obtain a patent to the premises. The plaintiff founds his rights upon a location of a claim called the "Flapjack;" defendants, upon their Argonaut claim. The respective locations are in geographical conflict. The validity of the Argonaut location notice was contested upon the trial. The notice and verification thereto are as follows:

"Notice is hereby given that the undersigned, having complied with the requirements of chapter 8, title 22, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the local laws, rules and regulations and customs of miners, have located 1,500 linear feet on the Argonaut lode (—acres plain mining ground) situated in Summit Valley Mining District, Deer Lodge County, Territory of Montana, and being more particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a stake, southeast corner, and running west 1,500 feet; thence north 600 feet; thence east 1,500 feet; thence south 600 feet, to place of beginning. Said lode is bounded on the south by the Silversmith, and southwest by the Goldsmith, and on the east by what is known as the 'Rooney Lode.' Above lode runs 900 feet easterly, and 600 feet westerly, from discovery shaft, and 800 feet on each side. Located Dec'r 23, 1880.

This maxim, however, was met by a protest from Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., in Rex v. Brisswell, 3 T. R. 726; and see Smith v. Edge, 6 T. R. 586; Broom, Leg. Max. 124.

S. L. R. A.

The mere statement and re-statement of a doctrine—the mere repetition of the contents of lawyers—cannot make it law, unless it can be traced to some competent authority, especially if it be irreconcilable to some clear legal principle. O'Connell v. Reg. 11 Clark & F. 373.

It has been held that in the acknowledgment of a deed by a married woman the frequent omission of showing and explaining to her the deed she has executed will not make the practice right, under a statute requiring her to examine the instrument privately and apart from her husband. Paine v. Baker, 1 New Eng. Rep. 164, 15 R. I. 100.

The maxim was held to apply where deeds were for seventeen years made by an official town plat, although incomplete in not being accompanied by the field notes. Ming v. Foote (Mont.) Jan. 23, 1890.

Term, 1888, and the location notice above recited was then held to be fatally defective by reason of the verification omitting to state the date of the location. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248.

On the new trial granted by this court, from which trial this appeal is now prosecuted, the district court admitted this notice in evidence upon testimony and a theory that were not before this court at the hearing, July, 1888. Defendants introduced testimony for the purpose of showing that large numbers of mining-location notices with verifications of the sort annexed to the above were used and recorded in the county about the time this notice was filed, and urged that the fault of the verification was common among the people at that period, and that large property interests were involved in the construction of the verification, and invoked the maxim, communis error facit jus. The evidence introduced for this purpose from the records of Deer Lodge County, in which the location was made, was as follows: At about the time of the filing of the location notice in question, it seems that three forms of verification were in use in Deer Lodge County. For the sake of definition, counsel call them the "Old Form," the "Correct Form" and the "Glenn Form," the latter being the form used in the notice above recited. In the year 1878, 75 per cent of the notices recorded in the county were in the correct form, with 25 per cent divided between the old form and the Glenn, the latter being, therefore, some fraction of 25 per cent not stated. In February, 1879, 48 out of a total of 50 were in the old and Glenn forms. In March there were 25 Glenns against 25 of the two others. In April, one half were Glenn and old forms. In the two years 1879 and 1880 there were 914 locations, of which 283 were Glenn, 97 old and 534 correct form. The Glenn and old together form 48 per cent of the whole. The Glenn alone is 31 per cent of the whole. Leaving out of consideration the old form, and computing the Glenn and correct form, the Glenn is 33 per cent of the total. From and after March, 1880, the use of the Glenn form steadily and rapidly decreased. In March the Glenn form was 27 out of a total of 60, in April, 22 out of 100, May, 11 out of 65; June, 7 out of 40, July, 9 out of 30, August, 1 out of 45; September, 2 out of 35; October, 2 out of 25, November, none. December 22d we meet the notice in controversy, and with that the use of the form disappears from the records.

For six months preceding the date of the record of the Argonaut location the objectionable form was used fourteen times in 190 location notices. This analysis is taken from the brief of appellant, and was admitted by respondent to be correct. The district court admitted the evidence, and upon the subject gave the following instruction: "The burden of proof is on the defendants to show that the Argonaut was a valid location, and that in making the same they complied with all that the law requires to make a valid location, as defined to you above [referring to preceding instructions], and that such location included within its boundaries the ground in controversy. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants, or their predecessors in interest, prior to the location made by plaintiff, located the premises in controversy as the Argonaut claim, and in the affidavit of the location failed to state the date of said location, and to verify the same, but said Argonaut claim was in all other respects located and recorded as required by law, the court instructs you that the failure or omission to give the date of the location in the verification did not render the location invalid, the error or omission having been one of frequent or common occurrence at the time; and if the jury believe that the location of the Argonaut was in all other respects regular, and such as the law requires, their verdict should be for the defendants for the possession of the premises in controversy." The verdict and judgment were for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment. Among his exceptions saved is his objection to the admission of the above testimony as to the alleged common error, and the construction of the court, in the foregoing instruction, that the alleged error was a common one at the time, and, as such common error, made the location notice of the Argonaut good, for the purposes of the action, notwithstanding that the location notice was, intrinsically, fatally defective, as held in O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248. Respondent still insists, upon this hearing, that the location notice and verification were good, notwithstanding the decision of this court that they may preserve their point in case an appeal should lie from the present decision of this court.

Mr. William Seallan for appellant.

Mr. John F. Forbis for respondents.

DeWitt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sufficiency of the location notice of the Argonaut claim is no longer an open question in this case. It was decided to be invalid on the former appeal. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248.

That decision is now the law of this case. The other consideration is whether the common error sought to be proved, and relied upon by defendants, was in fact a common error, and whether, as such, it was of a nature to make good, for the purposes of the action, the defective location notice.

The district court held that both the existence and effect of a common error of this sort is a question for the court, and not the jury. The matter is one of mixed law and fact. In the application of the maxim, communis error facit jus, the inquiry is whether the law is made. If the fact of the existence of a common error is to be submitted to the jury, and the jury finds its existence, then the court has no province but to complete the maxim, and say, "facit jus." But that is the very question for a court; that is, to say what is the law. The court must say what the law has been made, whether by a common error or by a Legislature. We are therefore of opinion that the lower court was correct in holding that both the existence and effect of the alleged common error were for the court, and not for the jury. To hold otherwise would be to make the jury the judges of the law. See McKen v. Lacey, 6 U. S. 8 Cranch, 23 [8 L. ed. 25], and cases cited below.

We will now endeavor to determine whether the court erred in its decision that such a common error existed as should be held to make the law that the controverted location notice was good for the purposes of the case on trial. The application of the maxim under consideration, like that of all abstract generalizations, is attended with difficulty and danger. A review of the authorities leads us to the conclusion that each case of the invocation of the rule must stand largely upon its own facts.

In Coke upon Littleton we find that the learned author often prefaces the announcement of a legal principle with the words: "It is commonly said." By these words, we understand, is meant: "It is commonly the legal opinion." To the expression cited, Littleton adds: "That is, it is the common opinion, and communis opinio is of good authority in law. A communis aduersaria non est recedendum,"—which we may read: "There must not be a departure from a common or general observation or practice." The annotator to Coke upon Littleton adds at this point: "Other rules immediately connected with this are, that communis error facit jus, and res iudicata pro veritate habetur, and also that minime mutanda sunt que certam interpretationem habuerunt."

186a. The two latter may, perhaps, be well rendered, "An adjudicated matter shall be deemed to be correct," and "Those matters shall be least changed which have attained a certain interpretation." The language of these maxims carries the idea of an observance, an interpretation, a construction, and to some extent a judicial one at that, as evidenced by the words "aduersaria," "res iudicata" and "interpretationem." Thus we find our maxim under purview, at an early day, in company with language tending to the view that the common error that makes the law is an error in the observing, the construing, the interpreting law, and not an error in totally disregarding, and in practice repealing, a positive statute; and, furthermore, that the error is general, and not confined to a portion of one class of the inhabitants of one geographical or political division of the jurisdiction, as was the case with the error being considered, which was confined to 22 per cent of the prospectors of the County of Deer Lodge, in the Territory of Montana.

In the year 1764 the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania says: "These deeds, and this mode of examination of senes aucts on conveying their estates, have generally prevailed in this Province from its settlement, and undergone from time to time the notice of the courts of justice. It would be very mischievous now to overturn them. The maxim, communis error facit jus, cannot operate more properly than in this case." Dunay v. Turner, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 14 (1 L. ed. 10).

Here a general practice had received tacit judicial approval for years. The same court in 1768 applies the maxim to a "constant usage," the individual instance of which having occurred forty-one years prior to the controversy before the court. Lloyd v. Taylor, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 17 (1 L. ed. 18).

The Supreme Court of the United States in 1800 applies and discusses the doctrine. Says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall: "The first question which presents itself in this case is, Was this deed properly proved? Were this Act of 1715 now for the first time to be construed, the opinion of this court would certainly be that the deed was not regularly proved. A justice of the supreme court would not be deemed a justice of the county, and the decision would be that the deed was not properly proved, and therefore not legally recorded. But, in construing the statutes of a State on which land titles depend, infinite mischief would ensue should this court observe a different rule from that which has been long established in the State, and, in this case, the court cannot doubt that the courts of Pennsylvania consider a justice of the supreme court as within the description of the Act. It is of some weight that this deed was acknowledged by the chief justice, who certainly must have been acquainted with the construction given to the Act, and that the acknowledgment was taken before another judge of the supreme court. It is also recollected that the gentlemen of the bar . . .

spoke positively as to the universal understanding of the State on this point, and that those who controverted the usage on other points did not controvert it on this. But what is decisive with the court is that the judge who presides in the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania reports to us that this construction was universally received." M'Kara v. Delaney, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 23 (3 L. ed. 23).

In this case there was a "universal understanding in the State," and the learned chief justice refers to "the judicial and professional construction in the State."

In M'Perran v. Powers, 1 Serg. & R. 101, the same question was before the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania, and was decided upon the authority of the case last above cited; and here, again, we find the idea of a universal and judicial or professional construction.

In the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1800, in the case of Stuart v. Laird, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 200 (3 L. ed. 115), the court, Patterson, J., says: "To this objection, which is of recent date, it is sufficient to observe that practice and acquiescence under it for a period of several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system, affords an irresistible answer, and has indeed fixed the construction. It is a contemporary interpretation of the most forcible nature. This practical exposition is too strong and obstinate to be shaken or controlled. Of course the question is at rest, and ought not now to be disturbed." This case is another instance of the universal and judicial character of the error. See also Green v. Neal, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 201 (3 L. ed. 403), which reviews many of the cases.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts says in Rogers v. Goodwin, 2 Mass. 478: "Of these statutes a practical construction early and generally obtained,—that in the power to dispose of lands was included a power to sell and convey the common lands. Large and valuable estates are held in various parts of the Commonwealth, the titles to which depend on this construction. Were the court now to decide that this construction is not to be supported, very great mischief would follow. . . . We cannot shake a principle which in practice has so long and so extensively prevailed. If the practice originated in error, yet the error is now so common that it must have the force of law. The legal ground on which this provision is now supported is that long and continued usage furnishes a contemporaneous construction which must prevail over the mere technical import of the words."

We cite Mr. Justice Blackburn as follows in Reg. v. Justice of Besser, 3 Bunt & S. 864: "I think, also, that there are cases in which a mistaken notion of the law has, no matter why, become so generally accepted, and been so acted upon, as to render it probable that business has been regulated, and the position of parties altered, in consequence; and in such cases we may hold that the general acceptance of the mistake has made that law which was originally error. Communis error facit jus. But, then, I think that, before we act upon this principle, we ought to see it clearly made out that the error has been commonly accepted, and that the nature of the case is such that parties are likely to have acted upon the mistake, and so altered their rights and position."

Lord Brougham, C., says, in Dowdell v. Noble, 3 Russ. & M. 495: "If it be true that even a prevailing error—what has been called a common or universal error—may be said to make the law, this at least may be allowed to be a sound foundation of the doctrine I am referring to, namely, that, unless a great and manifest deviation from principle shall have been committed, it may create much further mischief to reverse an individual case by way of correcting a slight error, if that error has been acted upon for a long series of years, than to leave it as it stands; more especially if the opinions of lawyers and the decisions of judges have been ruled by it, and if, upon the analogy of that case, the same principle has been recognized and adopted in other cases connected with and relating to it." The learned chancellor above calls a common error a universal error, and speaks of the opinions of lawyers and the decisions of judges being ruled by it.

In Re Will of Warfield, 22 Cal. 71, the court says: "Courts feel themselves constrained to uphold, where it is possible, contemporaneous interpretation of statutes, under which interpretation rights of property have for many years been acquired."

In the case of Pensud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 498, the court cites with approval a Spanish authority, Escriche's Derecho Espanol, as follows: "Legitimate custom acquires the force of law, not only when there is no law to the contrary, but also when its effect is to abrogate any former law which may be opposed to it, as well as to explain that which is doubtful. Hence it is said that there may be a custom without law, in opposition to law and according to law."

Counsel for respondent has urged this opinion in his argument. We hesitate to adopt the views therein contained, however, to the extent that a common error can have the effect to abrogate a positive statute, except under most extraordinary circumstances, of which we now have no knowledge. The California decision was made in the earliest history of the jurisprudence of that State, when it had just fallen heir to much that was Spanish, and, along with the rest, perhaps some customs that were not so valuable as other portions of the inheritance. We have reviewed some of the leading cases in which the maxim under consideration has been discussed and applied, with the view of discovering what the current opinion would be as to the facts in the case at bar. See also the cases cited in the foregoing authorities, and also Broon, Leg. Max. 141; Corn Abbot, Bank v. Nassau Bank, 31 N. Y. 74; Harvard v. Martin, 3 Vt. 77.

It is not possible to deduce from the authorities inflexible rules governing the practical scope of the maxim, communis error facit jus. The decisions tend, however, towards a few general principles, each of which principles has at some time been invoked in some case, but not all of them, perhaps, in the same case. In every case we find some of them applied, while in some cases some of them may be disregarded. We cannot lay down rules, any one of which would be decisive of every case. But we state the following principles, with the suggestion that, if an individual case fell within the purview of all of them, there would be no difficulty with the maxim, and that, in proportion as the facts of a case depart from the principles announced, the difficulty of application is increased. Every case depends upon its own facts. The rules, as we conceive them to be,—rules flexible in their nature, and subject to the qualifications above suggested,—are: (1) The common error must be one having some judicial or professional recognition, approved or tolerated by decisions of judges or opinions of lawyers; or, to put the rule less positively, such judicial or professional recognition adds to the law-making force of the common error. We further qualify the rule in this, that common error may possibly have the law-making power, when supported by lay opinion only, provided that other rules may be forcibly applied. (2) Courts will not lightly or inconsiderately allow a common error to subvert a rule of law, or abrogate a positive statute. (3) The error must be a universal or very general one. The nearer universal, the more forcibly will it address itself, as a law-maker, to the approval of courts. (4) The acquiescence in the common error has involved, or there depends upon it, large property interests. (5) The error must be one that people have relied and acted upon, and have fixed their rights and positions thereby. (6) The longer the error has existed, the greater force it has. (7) The error must be clearly proved. (8) The error must be one in the observing, construing or interpreting law, and not an error in directly disobeying and abrogating that which is law.

We have called the above suggestions "rules," but the word "rules" must be received with the limitations above laid down. If the facts in the case at bar met the requirements of all these rules, or if they fell fairly within them, we should affirm the judgment below. But let us examine the facts in the order in which we have stated the rules: (1) The alleged common error in the location notice in question never received approval or toleration by judicial decision or legal opinion. The form of verification was adopted simply by a few prospectors in a part of the Territory, without any assurance from any source that it was correct. (2) The United States and territorial laws as to the requirements of a location notice, as construed in 8 Mont. 248, are peremptory. We hesitate to admit that 88 per cent of the mining locators of one county of a vast territory can by their own unauthorized practice abrogate, repeal and nullify a positive law. (3) So far from the error being general or universal among the people, it was limited to a very small number. (4) It is not shown that large property interests depend upon the upholding of this location notice. Only 288 of these notices are found, and these all in two years. This was ten years ago. In the history of mining prospecting, ten years will see the valuable mines patented, and the others abandoned or re-located. They are, in either instance, beyond the necessity of relying upon the defective location notice. (5) It does not appear that any considerable number of persons have relied upon, or sought to fix their rights upon, the alleged common error. (6) The error existed but a short time. It attained its height months before the location of defendants. From March, 1880, it rapidly waned into desuetude, and disappeared with the defendants' location, December 23. (7) The error was clearly enough proved so far as it went. (8) The error did not consist in any effort to observe, construe or interpret the law of Congress or the Territory. It was rather a direct disobedience of those laws. To construe or interpret a statute is to read it for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning and effect. He cannot be said to construe or interpret who clearly disregards the law. That is not construing. It is refusing to do so. It is defying the law. We arrive at the opinion that the facts in the case at bar are almost wholly in conflict with all the principles governing the application of communis error facit jus. The district court erred in instruction No. 3, recited above, upon the subject of common error. The action of the court in this matter of the alleged common error was objected to, and exception saved in other manner as well as in the instruction referred to.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. A. SMITH

v.

CITY OF OSAGE, Appt.

(....Iowa....)

1. A common source of title will not prevent a subsequent grantee in possession of property from claiming adversely to a prior one, where, although he claims under a deed from the same person, each insists that the deed of the other is invalid and passes no title.

2. A city is estopped to set up any claim to land dedicated to public use, but never used by the public, where it has permitted a person to occupy it, and has levied and collected city taxes thereon as his private property.

(May 15, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Mitchell County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet the alleged title of plaintiff to certain lands. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. L. M. Ryce, for appellant:

A party cannot recall a statutory dedication once made in any way except that provided by statute; this, too, where there had not even been any act of acceptance by the City or public.

Lake View v. Le Bahn, 120 Ill. 92, 6 West. Rep. 788; Weeping Water v. Reed, 21 Neb. 261; Baker v. St. Paul, 8 Minn. 491.

Until the time arrives when any street or part of a street is required for actual use, and when the public authorities may be properly called upon to open it, no mere nonuser for any length of time will operate as an abandonment.

Were this an action between individuals, it is exceeding doubtful at least if appellee could recover here upon his plea of adverse possession and Statute of Limitations. The presumption of law is that such possessions are taken and held in subordination to the true owner's title.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff claims to hold the title to the land in controversy, and alleges that defendant sets up an adverse title thereto. The defendant in its answer alleges that the land in question was platted and laid off in lots, streets, alleys and a public square, and that the streets, alleys and public square were in that way dedicated to the public use. It is not claimed that defendant holds the title of any of the lots, and the only claim or interest it has is as a representative of the public, or as a municipal corporation having charge and control, for the benefit of the public, of land dedicated to public use, as streets, alleys and public grounds. It does not appear that any of the lots laid off on the land in question have been sold, or that defendant is the representative of the owners of such lots, or the guardian of their interests. The plaintiff pleads various defenses to defendant's claim that a part of the land has been dedicated to the public use, and is held subject thereto. We find it necessary to consider but two defenses, as, in our opinion, the decision of the case turns thereon. Other defenses will not be stated nor considered in this opinion.

2. Plaintiff, in his answer to defendant's claim, pleads the Statute of Limitations as a defense to the action, alleging that he has been for thirty years in the actual, open and notorious possession of the land, which has been adverse to defendant, and the claim it sets up to the land. The facts, briefly stated, are these: Sarah E. Moore entered the land in 1854. In 1855 she united with her husband in conveying the land to Eaton and Jenkins for the purpose, expressed in the deed, of causing the land to be laid off into village lots by the grantees in the deed. It seems to be a deed with conditions creating a power and trust. This deed is not acknowledged. It was duly recorded. The owners of other tracts of land united with Eaton and Jenkins in laying off a large tract of land into village lots, and for that purpose caused a plat of the land to be filed, showing lots, streets, alleys and a public square. This was in 1855. Objections are made to the regularity and sufficiency of the plat, and the act of dedication by the owners of the land, incurred on the plat. Mrs. Moore continued in the possession of the land until 1871, when she conveyed it to one under whom plaintiff claims. Plaintiff now claims that he and his grantor, and those under whom they claim, have been in the actual, open and notorious possession of the land, claiming the title thereto against all men. It appears that the land has been used and cultivated as a part of a farm. The streets and alleys have never been opened, and the public square has not been occupied by the public, but has been in cultivation as a part of a farm. Plaintiff insists that he and those under whom he claims have been in adverse possession of the land, and that defendant's claim to the land is barred by the Statute of Limitations. Defendant maintains that, as plaintiff claims under Mrs. Moore by a subsequent conveyance, his title cannot be adverse to the City, whose claim is based upon a prior conveyance executed by her; that, as plaintiff's and defendant's title have a common source, from the same grantor, Mrs. Moore, plaintiff's title cannot be adverse to defendant's claim. We know no rule recognized in this State extending so far. If there were, no case of adverse holding could arise in this State, where all titles are derived from the government. No title not capable of being traced back to the government is valid here, for all titles have their origin in the government, which is often reached through fewer mean conveyances than were executed in this case. The rule which counsel presents, we think, cannot extend further than to exclude the doctrine of adverse holding from cases wherein the parties hold under the same title, these titles meeting in a common source, in such a manner as that one is held to be in subordination to, or dependent upon, the other, and not independent of, or in conflict thereto.

In the case before us, plaintiff's and defendant's title nowhere meet in a common source. It is true they are both traced to Mrs. Moore. Each party claims under a deed executed by her, but each insists that her deed under which the other claims is invalid, and does not pass title, and the party acquires no title under it. With the deeds executed by Mrs. Moore the conflict of title begins. The respective parties holding the titles originally under her deeds hold adversely, and in conflict with each other. It cannot be said that plaintiff does not hold adversely to defendant, because Mrs. Moore herself, while in possession of the land, would not be regarded as holding adversely to defendant. But the same cannot be said of her grantee, under whom plaintiff claims. He entered upon the land under a title in conflict with defendant's claim, and held it adversely thereto. He held color of title, for his claim was based upon a deed valid in form, under which he entered and held the land. His possession thereto was adverse as to defendant. The public, whose right to the use and occupancy of the land is attempted to be established by defendant, as the representative of the public, bases it in this action upon the facts and doctrines of the law above recited. Hills v. Schotts, 34 Iowa, 263; Darius v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574.

Wat-ries v. Union Mill Co., 73 Iowa, 427, is not in conflict with these views.

3. The defendant was not organized as a City until 1871, and has taken no steps to open the streets and alleys, or to secure the occupancy by the people of the public square, but during all the time has assessed the land, and levied taxes thereon, and collected them. Prior to the incorporation of defendant as a City the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, paid the taxes. Prior to 1867 the land was sometimes taxed as lots, sometimes described on the tax-list according to the government subdivisions, and the conveyances of the land described it as lots, according to the plat. The deed executed by Mrs. Moore and her husband describes the land by the congressional subdivisions, and also as lots, according to the plat. Subsequent to 1867 the land was described upon the tax-list by the government subdivisions. The public square and the streets and alleys were in this manner subjected to taxation. It does not clearly appear for what years the corporation taxes were levied and collected, but we think each year after the incorporation of the City in 1871, and certainly after 1876, it levied and collected taxes upon the land, describing it according to the government subdivisions. Defendant is charged by law with the control of the streets, alleys and public grounds within its borders, and may vacate them and remove them to private use. Code, § 464.

It may exercise the authority and power of taxation over private property and land held by individuals. It does not exercise such power over streets, alleys and public grounds within its limits. In the case before us, it has permitted plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, to occupy the land, which has never been subject to public use, and it levies and collects city taxes thereon. The law regards this as a declaration by its acts that it holds no claim to the land, and as an abandonment of all claim to the public use of the lands. The City may vacate streets and other public lands, and restore them to private owners by proper action. The same end may be attained by abandonment and nonuse, and by taxation, and in other ways treating the land as private property. The City will be estopped to set up any claim to land to which the right of public use has been abandoned by subjecting it to taxation as private property. Simplot v. Dubugus, 49 Iowa, 630.

Upon this point see Gatchell v. Benedict, 57 Iowa, 121; Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 507; Audubon County v. American Emigrant Co. 40 Iowa, 480; Austin v. Bremer County, 44 Iowa, 155.

We reach the conclusion that the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that defendant is estopped to set up the claim of the public to the land in controversy. Other questions discussed by counsel need not be considered.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE, NEW ALBANY AND CHICAGO R. CO., App't.,

George CORPS.

(....Ind....)

1. An attack upon one of several paragraphs of a complaint made for the first time in the assignment of errors will be unavailing, even although the paragraph assailed is radically defective.

2. An averment that plaintiff had no knowledge of the danger of continuing in the service of his employer, which existed because of the latter's failure to provide suitable machinery and competent workmen, is necessary to warrant a recovery for injuries alleged to have resulted from such failure; otherwise it will be assumed that the danger was known to and assumed by the employé. An allegation of freedom from fault is not sufficient for this purpose.

3. In pleading, plaintiff must state all the facts essential to a cause of action; if any material fact is lacking the complaint will go down before a demurrer.

(June 30, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clark County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

NOTE.—Master and servant; knowledge by servant of defective and dangerous machinery.

A servant does not assume any risk incident to the use of defective machinery or appliances of which he is ignorant. See notes to Myhan v. Louisiana R. L. & P. Co. (La.) 7 L. R. A. 172; Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) 7 L. R. A. 285; Foley v. Pettie Machine Works (Mass.) 4 L. R. A. 51.

It is the duty of the master to inform his servant of risks to which he is subjected in the course of his employment. See note to Brasil Block Coal Co. v. Gaffney (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 360.

Burden of proof on servant.

Negligence on the part of an employer is not to be presumed. Authorities cited in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Sanford, 117 Ind. 285.

An employé, to recover for injuries caused by defective appliances, must prove that he did not know, and had not equal means with the master of knowing, that the appliances were defective. Ibid.

A servant seeking to recover for an injury has the burden of establishing negligence on the part of the master, and due care on his own part. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Crowder (Tex.) March 18, 1890.

The burden is on a servant alleging that injuries were sustained by him in consequence of defective machinery or appliances, to prove that the same was defective. Humphreys v. Newport News & M. V. Co. 38 W. Va. 135.

A railroad employé suing the company for damages sustained in his employment has the burden to overcome the presumption of law that defendant has discharged its duty toward him, by showing negligence on its part. Murray v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 11 Colo. 124.

To establish contributory negligence of a servant, the burden of proof as to his knowledge of latent

It is incumbent upon a railroad employé who attributes his injury to the fact of brake-shoes being worn thin, to prove the fact permitting the inference that the brake could not be applied, or that when applied it was not as effective as it should or would have been with thicker brake-shoes. Smith v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 645.

The question of negligence is one of fact for the jury, taking into view all the circumstances of the case. Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 87; Morrison v. Erie R. Co. 56 N. Y. 307; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239; West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McKiwee, 17 P. F. Smith, 311; Meesel v. Lynn & R. R. Co. 3 Allen, 224; Wharton, Neg. p. 266.

Injury from defective or dangerous appliances.

There can be no relief, without proof, on a controverted question. Hughes v. Hughes, 37 Ala. 632.

The general rule of pleading is that when an issue is properly joined, he who asserts the affirmative must prove it. Simonton v. Winter, 30 U. S. & Pet. 141 (3 L. ed. 75).

When an affirmative fact is averred, on which the title to relief is founded, and is denied, the burden of proof rests on the complainant; and it is incumbent on him to produce sufficient evidence to satisfy the mind. Long v. Gill, 30 Ala. 403.

The party on whom the burden of proof in any cause rests may be determined by considering which would succeed if no evidence were offered by either side, and by examining what would be the effect of striking out of the record the allegation to be proved. The onus must be on the party who, under such tests, would fail in the suit. Porter v. Still, 63 Min. 357.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.
Messrs. James E. Marsh and Ward H. Watson for appellant.

Messrs. M. E. Stannard and Frank B. Burke for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

It has been often ruled by this court that an attack upon one of several paragraphs of a complaint made for the first time in the assignment of errors will be unavailing, even though the paragraph assailed may be radically defective. This settled doctrine renders it unnecessary for us to consider the objections urged against the first paragraph of the appellant's complaint.

The second paragraph of the complaint was assailed by demurrer in the court below, and we are required to give judgment upon it. The paragraph named alleges that the plaintiff was in the service of the defendant as a laborer in its repair shops at New Albany; that the defendant negligently employed an inexperienced, unskillful and incompetent person to superintend and direct the work in its shop and the work upon which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of his injury, that the work which the plaintiff was then performing was that of moving the large driving wheels of one of the defendant's locomotives, that the defendant negligently failed to provide a sufficient number of competent men to do the work of moving such wheels, that the defendant negligently failed to furnish sufficient machinery for such work, to that it failed to furnish blocks to hold such wheels; that by reason of the careless and negligent acts of the defendant a pair of driving wheels of one of its locomotives ran upon the plaintiff's hand and arm, and so injured them as to deprive the plaintiff of their use; that the driving wheels ran upon the plaintiff without fault on his part, and the injury to him could not have been avoided by the exercise of care or prudence on his part.

It is settled law that an employer must use reasonable care to provide his employees with safe working places and appliances. It is also settled that the employer must use reasonable care to select competent and skillful persons for service. Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 181, Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Lang, 118 Ind. 579, Taylor v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 121 Ind. 124, Lake Shore & M. & S. R. Co. v. Stupak (Ind.) 23 N. E. Rep. 346 Pennsylvania Co. v. O'Shaughnessy, 122 Ind. 598.

But it is quite as well settled that an employee cannot recover from the employer for an injury produced by some cause incident to the nature of his services, and that the master is not responsible for the known risks incident to the service in which the servant engages. For anything that appears in the complaint the peril was a known incident of the service and was one assumed by the plaintiff; and if it was, there can be no recovery. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Watson, 114 Ind. 275, 13 West. Rep. 225; Pennsylvania Co. v. O'Shaughnessy, supra, and cases cited.

In order to make a good complaint in such a case as this it is essential that it should be averred that the plaintiff has no knowledge of the danger, else if he did have knowledge and voluntarily continued in the master's service he is deemed to have assumed the risk as an incident of his service. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Sanford, 117 Ind. 265, Brasil Block & Coal Co. v. Young, 117 Ind. 520; Lake Shore & M. & S. R. Co. v. Stupak, 108 Ind. 1, 6 West. Rep. 244; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Dettley, 110 Ind. 75, 8 West. Rep. 510, Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hughes, 110 Pa. 801, 11 Cent. Rep. 822, Wilson v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 27 Minn. 226, Gaffney v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 15 R. I. 454.

Remaining in the master's service with knowledge of the dangers of the service is not simply contributory negligence; for, as Mr. Beach says: "The servant is deemed to assume the risks of such danger, and to waive any claim upon his master for damages in case of injury." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 140.

There is, in such a case, no right of recovery, for the employer is absolved from liability. It is therefore a necessary conclusion, as shown by the authorities to which we have referred, that the allegation that the plaintiff was free from fault does not supply the place of averments showing that the risk was not one knowingly assumed as an incident of his service. It may be true that an employee exercised the utmost care, and yet be true that the risk assumed was an incident of the service in which he engaged.

We are here dealing with a question of pleading and not of evidence. There is, as is well known, an essential difference between matters of pleading and matters of evidence, in pleading, facts must be directly and positively averred, while, as matter of evidence, conclusions may be inferred, without positive statements, from facts and circumstances. In pleading, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to state all the facts essential to a cause of action, and if any material fact is lacking the complaint will go down before a demurrer. A material fact is here absent, and that is the fact that the danger was not an incident of the service in which the plaintiff voluntarily engaged. This fact must be averred as the rules of pleading require, although if the question were one of evidence it might be inferred.

Judgment reversed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

NAUGATUCK WATER CO.

v.

A. J. NICHOLS.

(35 Conn. 482.)

A promissory and void contract made by a corporation before there had been paid in the amount of capital stock required by statute to be paid in before corporate powers could be exercised, the contract being to promote the purposes of the corporation, and being carried out after the corporation became enabled to make it valid, does not constitute a subscription for corporate stock.

(Purdie and Loomis, JJ., dissent.)

(March 2, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Waterbury District Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an assessment upon a stock subscription. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morris W. Seymour and Howard H. Knapp, for appellant:

Every subscription, no matter how formal or informal, by implication incorporates the terms of the charter of the proposed company; and every subscriber agrees to become associated with the others only upon condition that the formalities of the charter shall be observed.

Where the corporation has the authority to begin business or exercise its privileges on a certain amount of stock subscribed or paid in, the subscription becomes binding when the prescribed amount has been reached.

Nor does it avail this plaintiff that subsequently the payment of twenty-five per cent was made.

Failure to perform the condition precedent, prescribed in the charter, was fatal to a recovery.

Mr. H. O. Baldwin, for appellee:

Defendant is estopped by his own acts from denying the legal existence of the plaintiff. His subscription was part of the basis relied upon to put the corporation in working condition. It was partly on the strength of that subscription that contracts were entered into and the preliminary arrangements made for the immediate construction of the works.

See West Winsted Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Ford, 27 Conn. 282; 3 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 741, 743, and authorities cited.

Litchfield Bank v. Church, 29 Conn. 137, is conclusive of this case.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a corporation created by a Special Act of the General Assembly passed at its January Session, 1887, "for the purpose of supplying the Town of Naugatuck with a supply of pure water for domestic and other uses." The charter is found in the Special Acts of that Session at page 571. It grants to the corporation the privilege to take springs of water, to make dams for reservoirs, to construct aqueducts in any of the streets, to enter upon land and to collect rents, and empowers it to borrow money, to give mortgages, to make contracts and to do very many other things thought to be necessary or convenient to enable it to carry out the purpose of its creation. In addition to these things the charter provides that "twenty-five per cent of the capital stock shall be paid in before said company can exercise the privileges and powers herein granted."

Within the time limited by law the corporations named in the charter, and certain other persons associated with them, one of whom was the defendant, met, voted to accept the charter, chose directors and other officers, enacted by-laws, and organized themselves into a corporation under and pursuant to it. The defendant subscribed for twenty shares of the capital stock, of which the par value was twenty-five dollars a share. On the 25th day of July, 1888, the directors voted to call for, and issued a call for, an installment of twenty-five per cent of the stock, to be payable on or before the 30th day of August then next. Of this call the defendant received due notice, but has at all times neglected and refused to pay it. On the 15th day of July, 1889, the plaintiff entered into a verbal contract with one Snow to construct for it its water-works. This contract was put into writing on the first day of August, and it was on that day executed by the parties. By the terms of that contract the plaintiff agreed to pay, and has since paid, to Snow, over $17,000 for work done by him. The whole of the twenty-five per cent was not paid in until after the said first day of August.

The trial court rendered judgment for the plaintiff to recover the installment. The defendant has appealed. The substance of his reasons of appeal is, that he is absolved from his promise to pay for the stock for which he subscribed because the plaintiff undertook to contract with Snow for the construction of its water-works before the whole of the twenty-five per cent had been paid in.

In the formation of a private civil corporation there are two classes of contracts to be considered. One is the contracts which the corporators or promoters make each with all the others in order to bring the corporation into existence, of which a subscription to the capital stock is an example, and which necessarily antedate its completed existence. These are the organizing contracts. The other class is the contracts which the corporation itself, after it comes into a complete existence, makes with third persons. Both these classes of contracts depend upon the provisions of the charter; and it is usual that the charter of every corporation contains provisions relating to each. The organizing contracts are made primarily by each of the subscribers with each of the others. They are also in a sense made with the corporation. But the making them is not an exercise of any of the powers or privileges granted to the corporation, because they are the steps necessary to be taken before the corporation is qualified to exercise any of the powers or privileges granted to it. It needs hardly to be said that there must be a full compliance with all the charter provisions relating to the organizing contracts before the corporation comes into such a legal existence as to be able to make contracts with third persons at all. Until these preliminary steps have been taken there is no legal person in being capable of exercising any power or privilege whatever.

It is obvious enough that any omission or failure to complete the organization would affect any contract with a third person. How any premature contract with a third person could interrupt or hinder the organization is not so plain. If any organizing contract was by its terms conditioned that no such contract should be entered into, or if it was so made conditional by the provisions of the charter, then it would appear.

The contract of subscription signed by the defendant is not by its terms conditioned upon anything relating to contracts which the plaintiff might make with third persons, unless the reference in it to the charter puts it in such a condition. If, then, the charter of the plaintiff contains no provision making a subscription to its capital stock dependent for its validity upon the time when the Company might enter into contracts with third persons, then there is no such condition in this case. There certainly is no express condition in the charter to that effect. The defendant claims that the provision of the charter above quoted is such a condition by implication, because it forbids the plaintiff to exercise any of the granted privileges and powers until the required part of the capital stock should be paid in. It does not seem to us that this claim can be sustained. Some of the powers and privileges granted to the plaintiff in its charter are hereinbefore enumerated. Prohibiting the exercise of any of these is quite a different thing from discharging a subscriber from the payment for his stock. The contract with Snow is foreign to the defendant's subscription contract. It purports, indeed, to have been made by the corporation; but in law it was not and could not have been, as at that time the corporation had no power to make it. It is not, however, a case of ultra vires. A case of ultra vires is where a fully existing corporation attempts to act upon some subject matter not within its charter powers. In this case the subject matter was within the powers conferred by the charter, but the corporation was not qualified to exercise those powers. Hence the executory contract, so far as the corporation was concerned, was inoperative. It was as though it had not been. In a case of ultra vires a corporation may become bound by the principles of estoppel. In this case it could only be bound by subsequent transactions from which a contract might be implied. Snow, the contractor, might, perhaps, have looked through the corporation and held those who assumed to act for it and in its name without authority liable as individuals. Beyond this we cannot see that any effect can be given to it as an executory contract.

The argument made on behalf of the defendant admits that his subscription was valid and lawful except for the contract with Snow. The provision of the charter clearly forbade such a contract. Being forbidden it was void. Can it be so that a void contract with Snow will release the defendant from his lawful one? If the defendant is not bound on his subscription then none of the subscribers are. All or none are bound. It cannot be that those who paid promptly are bound and the defendant who refused to pay is released. If all are released the consequence is that those who paid one installment can be compelled to pay no more; on the contrary, it would seem that they ought to have the amount refunded to them otherwise they would be in a worse condition than those who refused to pay. The inevitable result of the defendant's claim, if granted, would be disaster complete and overwhelming to the enterprise.

The provision of the charter under consideration forbids the exercise of any granted power until the installment was paid in. A careful regard for the public interest might naturally prompt the Legislature to enact such a prohibition, while nothing but an injury done or threatened to the subscriber would be likely to suggest relieving him from making payment. Between these two things there is no legal connection. The relation of cause and effect does not exist. Neither implies the other. Either may well stand without the other, as either might be omitted without affecting the other.

It must not be inferred that we regard the provision of the charter as in the interest of the public alone; nor for the benefit merely of third persons. We entertain no doubt that it was designed to protect the stockholder as well. If the premature exercise of any granted power operated to the injury of any subscriber he ought not to be held to pay. But, on the other hand, if it was an advantage to him, and if it also tended to promote the purposes for which the corporation was chartered, it would be very unreasonable that he should not pay according to his promise. When any subscriber really suffers from such cause a remedy will not be wanting.

We think a compliance with this provision is not a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action; and that a disobedience to it does not operate to release the defendant from his promise.

In this opinion Carpenter and Fenn, JJ., concurred.

Pardee, J., dissenting:

It is provided in the plaintiff's charter that "twenty five per cent of the capital stock shall be paid in before said Company can exercise the privileges and powers herein conferred." This provision, therefore, of legal necessity is written as a condition precedent to every subscription made to the capital stock. Indeed, each subscription was expressly made "upon the terms and under the conditions and limitations" imposed by the charter. Each subscriber secured whatever measure of protection there may be in it to himself. All other subscribers combining cannot deprive him of it. The law of the plaintiff's being requires the subscription of the capital stock, the organization, the call for, and the actual payment into the treasury of one quarter of the capital, prior to the making of contracts for the construction of its water works. But this law was disregarded. The organized corporation, not having either called for or received a dollar from the subscriptions to its capital, entered into a contract for the construction of its works. It was the privilege of the defendant to annex to his subscription the condition that he would not become a member of the corporation if it should do that thing.

It is not an answer to his defense to say that all other subscribers have waived the violation of the charter, have paid and have ratified the contract. Each of them could waive or ratify for himself; no one, nor all of them, could waive or ratify for him. Nor to say that in this case the contract was an advantageous one and therefore neither the corporation nor the defendant suffered any pecuniary injury. The latter is not to be made to bear the burden of proving that he was not injured. The question is one of construction of a contract. What condition did the defendant annex to his subscription? Has the plaintiff so far met the condition as to be entitled to enforce the contract of subscription? Indeed the question is far reaching; it is, in reality, whether it is possible in making a contract of subscription to the capital of a corporation to impose thereon any condition which will protect the subscribers from an absolute liability.

In this opinion Leomin, J., concurred.

Leon WEENER et al., Appts.,

v.

Lester BRAYTON.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A label cannot be treated as a trade-mark which does not indicate by what person the articles upon which it is used were made, but only that he was a member of a certain association, which membership confers the right to use the mark, and of which there is no exclusive use, its rightful use not being connected with any business, but belonging to many persons not connected in business and unknown to each other.

2. To entitle one to an injunction to restrain an alleged invasion of his right of property in a trade-mark, he must show that he is in some way the owner thereof by reason of some business which he is transacting and to which its use is incident, and that its use is not merely a personal privilege which he possesses as a member of a particular association of wide extent and embracing many members of varied interests.

3. The fraudulent use of marks and labels for the purpose of deceiving the public will not be enjoined at the instance of one who does not show that he is himself a manufacturer or owner of, or dealer in, the articles which are fraudulently represented by the counterfeited labels to be his; hence the fact that persons are

NOTE.—Title and right to exclusive use of a trade-mark.

Three things are requisite to the acquisition of a title to a trade-mark: first, the person desiring to acquire title must adopt some mark not in use to distinguish goods of the same class or kind already on the market belonging to another trader; second, he must apply his mark to some article of traffic; and third, he must put his article, marked with his mark, on the market. Schneider v. Williams, 18 Cent. Rep. 255, 44 N. J. Eq. 391.

Where children on the death of their father continued the use of his trade-mark, their mark cannot be interfered with by one who has never acquired a right to use it. Pratt's App. 10 Cent. Rep. 596, 117 Pa. 401.

The right to a trade-mark is a property right, for the violation of which damages may be recovered in an action at law; and the continued violation of it will be enjoined by a court of equity. United States v. Steffens, ("Trade-Mark Cases") 100 U. S. 82 (25 L. ed. 550).

At common law the exclusive right to the ordinary trade-mark grows out of its use, and not from its mere adoption. Ibid.

The adoption by plaintiff of the words "La Normandi" as a trade-mark, in his business of manufacturing and selling cigars of a certain kind, cannot take the right previously acquired by the public in the use of the words "La Normandi" as indicating a particular kind of cigars. Injunction denied. Stachelberg v. Ponce, 128 U. S. 586 (32 L. ed. 589).

Manufacturers and merchants have severally the right to distinguish their productions and goods by a peculiar mark or device that they may secure the profits which superior reputations may be the means of giving to them. Gillott v. Esterbrook, 48 N. Y. 376, 3 Story, Eq. 961.

Right to protection in use of trade-mark.

The right to protection is not exclusively in the manufacturer. The person for whom the goods are manufactured (Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Spear, 3 Sandf. 599; Walton v. Crowley, 3 Blatchf. 440; Godillot v. Hazard, 12 Jones & S. 430, 49 How. Pr. 7), and the vendor who sells and who may have no direct relation to the manufacturer, have such right. Godillot v. Hazard, 12 Jones & S. 430, 49 How. Pr. 7; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Spear, 3 Sandf. 599; Walton v. Crowley, 3 Blatchf. 440.

A party having a valuable interest in trade or business is entitled to protection against any other person who attempts to pirate upon the good will of his customers, or of the patrons of his trade or business, by selling under his flag without his authority or consent. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 62 (25 L. ed. 997).

The court proceeds upon the ground that complainant has such valuable interest (Ferridge v. Merchant, 4 Abb. Pr. 160), and protects the title of the author and inventor of any names, marks, letters or other symbols which any manufacturer, trader or other person has devised and appropriated, or been accustomed to use in his trade or business, and restrains by injunction any unauthorized use thereof to his prejudice. Bloss v. Bloomer, 23 Dart. 608.

To entitle a complainant, in cases relating to trade-marks, to protection, the right must be clearly established by the evidence (Ball v. Slegal, 3 West. Rep. 41, 116 Ill. 147); and the question is not whether the complainant was the original inventor or proprietor; anyone is entitled to protection against one who attempts to deprive him of his trade or customers by using his labels, signs or trade-mark without his knowledge or consent. McLean v. Fleming, 98 U. S. 262 (24 L. ed. 681); Coats officers or members of an association which has adopted a label to show that the articles bearing it were manufactured by its members does not, without more, entitle them to maintain a bill to enjoin the fraudulent use of such label.

(June 24, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs to the full court from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County sustaining a demurrer to the bill in a suit brought to enjoin an alleged unlawful use by defendant of plaintiffs' trade-mark. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Attors. Benj. F. Butler and Frank L. Washburn, for appellants.

Plaintiffs adopt the whole label for their trade device or trade mark, and are entitled to protection.

Holmes v. Holmes B. & A. Mfg. Co. 87 Conn. 278; Pierce v. Gustard, 68 Cal. 68.

This label and the right to use it as used are the subject of property.

Colman v. Crump, 70 N. Y. 578; Newman v. Alford, 51 N. Y. 189.

Protection extends to one who may not have even the exclusive right to the use of the label.

Newman v. Alford, 51 N. Y. 189; Collins v. Reynolds Card Mfg. Co. 7 Abb. N. C. 17.

The members of the union, including the plaintiffs herein, have a common valuable pecuniary interest in the labels in question, which is entitled to protection in a court of equity.

Strauss v. Moonelis, 11 Cent. Rep. 461, 108 N. Y. 611.

Where trade-marks have not been infringed, courts of equity have granted injunctions against the use upon goods of certain marks, labels and wrappers, when there appeared to be a design to deceive the public by concealing the true origin of the goods and make it appear they were the goods of another.

Croft v. Dry, 7 Beav. 81; McLean v. Fleming, 98 U. S. 245 (24 L. ed. 828); Brown Chemical Co. v. Myer, 81 Fed. Rep. 458.

Mr. Stephen H. Tyng, for appellees:

The plaintiffs fail to state a case, and the bill should be dismissed.

See Cigar-Makers Protective Union v. Conheim, 3 L. R. A. 125, 40 Minn. 243; Schneider v. Williams, 13 Cent. Rep. 255, 44 N. J. Eq. 891; Rogers v. Taintor, 97 Mass. 291, 297.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us upon a demurrer which concedes, for the purposes of this hearing, the truth of the allegations of the bill. From these it appears that the plaintiffs are officers and members of the Cigar-Makers' Union, No. 97; that said Union, No. 97, is a member of the International Cigar-Makers' Union of America, which is a voluntary association composed wholly of local unions; that said International Union has authorized and directed its president to furnish to all local unions a trade mark label to be pasted upon the outside of each box containing cigars made by members of the union, that cigars made by such members have acquired a valuable reputation, and that in consequence the right to the exclusive use of such labels is of great value; that

v. Holbrook, 3 Sandf. Ch. 588, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 718.

In an action for an injunction to restrain defendants from using a certain trade-mark for flour, which consisted of the words "La Favorita," the fact that plaintiffs were not the actual manufacturers of the flour upon which they placed such words does not deprive them of the right to be protected in the use of that brand as a trade-mark. Menendes v. Holt, 128 U. S. 614 (32 L. ed. 888).

Where consent by the owner to the use of his trade-mark by another is to be inferred from his knowledge and silence merely, it lasts no longer than the silence from which it springs; it is, in reality, no more than a revocable license. Id.

Labels protected.

A party may, under certain circumstances, be restrained from using another's label which does not rise to the rank of a trade-mark. No one has a right to represent his goods as the goods manufactured by another. To do this by using another's label is actionable. Adams v. Hotel, 21 Fed. Rep. 279.

Where a party engaged in canning and packing salmon, having a contract with another as sole agent for the sale of the canned fish, had a label to be placed on the cans, in one division of which was the name of the other party as sole agent, a purchaser of all the property of such party, including the labels, has no right, as against the party named as agent, to use that part of the label referring to such agency. Coleman v. Flavel, 40 Fed. Rep. 864.

The word "Elk," printed upon the face of a label for a box of cigars, with the head of an elk, is not invalid as a trade-mark because not designating origin or ownership, when it has words printed on it showing that it is made at the Elk Cigar Factory. Lichtenstein v. Goldsmith, 37 Fed. Rep. 388.

The use of the same or similar colors of wrappers and of boxes in putting up packages of goods cannot be claimed as an infringement of trade-mark, where there are marked differences in the labels and in all other particulars except in the colors. Philadelphia Novelty Mfg. Co. v. Blakesley Novelty Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 688; Philadelphia Novelty Mfg. Co. v. Rouss, Id. 585.

The use of a rose-colored capsule upon bottles of wine cannot be claimed as a trade-mark; nor can another be prevented from using them, where there is no attempt to deceive by labels or otherwise. Mumm v. Kirk, 40 Fed. Rep. 589.

Where the labels of complainants and defendants are so entirely dissimilar that one cannot readily be mistaken for the other, the fact that the word "Tycoon" is found in both of them does not make a case of infringement of a trade-mark. Corbin v. Gould, 138 U. S. 808 (33 L. ed. 811).

An order overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action by the "Officers and Members of the Cigar Makers' Union, a branch and member of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America," was affirmed by a divided court. Allen v. McCarthy, 37 Minn. 368.

Injunction to restrain violation of right.

Where a manufacturer of nails has made use of labels of combinations of numbers,—as, "60," "70," "80" and "111," he should be protected by injunction in the exclusive use of such numbers. American Solid Leather Button Co. v. Anthony, 2 New Eng. Rep. 690, 15 R. I. 338.

Where one Le Page formed a corporation to which he sold his business, with the right to use his trade-mark "Le Page's Liquid Glue," and subsequently left the corporation, the use of the name "Le Page's Improved Liquid Glue" by him will be enjoined. Russell Cement Co. v. Le Page, 6 New Eng. Rep. 377, 1st Mass. 222.

the defendant has caused to be put on boxes containing inferior cigars, and not made by members of the union, a counterfeit label so closely resembling said union label as to deceive purchasers; that for the purpose of deceiving the purchasers and obtaining higher prices, he has sold cigars in boxes on which he has pasted such counterfeit labels, well knowing the cigars contained therein were not made by members of the union and were inferior in workmanship and quality to those made by them and which are rightfully sold under the so-called union label.

A trade-mark is a peculiar name or device by which a person dealing in an article designates it as of a peculiar kind, character or quality, or as manufactured by or for him, or dealt in by him, and of which he is entitled to the exclusive use. Reper v. Tinsler, 97 Mass. 291; Chadwick v. Conell, 6 L. R. A. 350, 151 Mass.

There is no exclusive ownership of the names, devices, symbols or marks which constitute a trade-mark apart from the use or application of them, but the word "trade-mark" is the designation of them when applied to a vendible commodity. The exclusive right to make such use or application is rightly treated as property. While property in these names, devices, etc., for all purposes cannot exist, yet property as applied to particular, vendible articles may exist when such articles have gone into the market identified by them and have thus obtained reputation or currency by them, as indicating a special or superior quality, or as the work of a particular manufacturer, or some other circumstance which commends them to the public. Kerr, Injunc. 305.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to restrain the wrongful use, by persons not entitled thereto, of such trade-marks, is founded, not upon the imposition upon the public thus practiced, but on the wrongful invasion of the right of property therein which has been acquired by others. A remedy is afforded only to the owner of the right of property in such trade-marks, on account of the injury which is thus done to him. The wrong done to him consists in misrepresenting the vendible articles sold as being those of the true owner of the mark, and thus, to a greater or less extent, depriving him of the benefit of the reputation he has given to the articles made or dealt in by him. To the validity of a trademark so as to entitle anyone to a remedy for an invasion thereof, three things have been held necessary: that he must show that he has adopted some marks or signs not in use by others, to distinguish the goods manufactured or sold by him, from those of other manufacturers or traders; that these must be applied to some articles of traffic, and that such articles must have been placed on the market. Schneider v. Williams, 44 N. J. Eq. 301, 18 Cent. Rep. 255; Chadwick v. Conell, supra.

The right to a trade-mark cannot exist as a mere abstract right independent of and disconnected from a business. It is not property as distinct from, but only as incident to, the business. It cannot be transferred except with the business, may be sold with it, and ordinarily passes with it. Cigar-Makers Protective Union v. Conheim, 40 Minn. 243, 3 L. R. A. 125.

In the case above cited the allegations of the bill were, apparently, the same as those in the case at bar, and the bill was brought by certain persons, members of the Cigar-Makers' International Union, through their membership of one of the local unions, which compose the larger body. It appeared from the complaint that a device claimed to be a trade-mark, but in its form rather an advertisement, had been adopted by the International Union, which was furnished to all local unions for use on the boxes of cigars made by their members;—that the right to use it would continue as long as they were members; that such right would cease when they ceased to be such, and that a manufacturer could only use it by employing

Where a publisher of a newspaper, having suspended, sold the plant to a purchaser, who leases it, the lease reciting that it has been used in the publication of a certain paper, and containing a covenant to use it for the continuance of such publication, an injunction will lie to restrain the lessee from continuing the publication of a paper by that name. Lane v. Smythe (N. J.) Feb. 8, 1890.

A label resembling in six distinct points a label used by another person in the same business is such an imitation as should be enjoined, if at least two persons were deceived thereby, and defendant's sales have increased thereby. McCann v. Anthony, 3 West. Rep. 438, 31 Mo. App. 38.

To entitle plaintiff to relief against an alleged infringement of a trade-mark, the evidence must be clear. Bail v. Seigel, 3 West. Rep. 43, 113 Ill. 137.

Positive proof of fraudulent intent is not required to give a right to an injunction, where the proof of infringement is clear. McLean v. Fleming, 10 U. S. 345, 34 L. ed. 335.

Use of the defendant's name on a spurious trade-mark is no defense to a bill for an injunction, but only a circumstance to be considered in determining whether the public are likely to be deceived. Pratt's App. 10 Cent. Rep. 503, 117 Pa. 401.

Where there is a similitude to the substantial parts of a trade-mark, there is an infringement and an evasive attempt to hide the similarity, or a colorable explanation which appears to be made for the purpose of escaping the effects of a wrongful use of the trade-mark, will not defeat the owner's right to an injunction. Keller v. B. F. Goodrich Co. 117 Ind. 355.

A trade-mark used in connection with certain articles of dentistry, consisting of the words "The Akron Dental Rubber," is infringed by the use, upon similar articles, of the words "Non-Secret Dental Vulcanite, made according to our analysis of the Akron Dental Rubber." Ibid.

Injunction; when not granted.

In suits in trade-mark cases an injunction is never granted in the first instance, if the exclusive title of plaintiff is denied, unless the grounds upon which it is denied are manifestly frivolous. When the title is disputed the course is to let the motion for an injunction stand over until plaintiff has established his legal right in an action at law. Samuel v. Berger, 4 Abb. Pr. 33, 13 How. Pr. 344, 30 Barb. 105; Petridge v. Merchant, 4 Abb. Pr. 137; Amosong Mfg. Co. v. Spear 3 Sandf. 613, 7 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 315; Wolfe v. U. S. L. Co. 13 How. Pr. 33; Motley v. Downman, 3 Myne & C. 14; Petridge v. Menck, 3 Barb. Ch. 101, 5 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 672, 3 Sandf. Ch. 622, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 723.

That the words used to designate a particular members of the union, and would have no right so to do if he ceased to employ its members. It did not there appear, nor is it alleged in the case at bar, that either the plaintiff or any one of the unions was a business corporation, association or partnership for the purpose of manufacturing and selling or engaging in the manufacture or sale of cigars. It was held that the device in question (which in all substantial respects was the same with that here considered) was not a trade-mark, and the right to use it was not property but a personal privilege. Its object was simply to indicate membership in the union, and, to obtain whatever advantage the fact of membership might give its members, they had agreed on a certain device which might be placed on their productions. The right to use such a device was obtained merely by joining the association, and did not at all depend upon whether the person had earned a reputation for the manufacture of the particular article. It was therefore held that it could not be protected as a trade-mark. For similar reasons we are of opinion that the label alleged by the bill in the case at bar to have been counterfeited cannot be treated as a trade-mark. However disreputable and dishonest it may be falsely to represent goods made by other persons to have been made by members of the union, upon which subject there can be but one opinion, those who do not carry on any business to which the use of the label is incident, who have not applied it to any vendible commodity which has been placed upon the market, in which they deal or of which they are the owners or manufacturers, cannot maintain a bill to restrain the use by the defendant of the label as a trade-mark. It wants many essential elements of such a mark; it does not indicate by what person articles were made, but only membership in a certain association; there is no exclusive use of it, but many persons not connected in business, and unknown to each other, may use it. Its rightful use is not connected with any business. It cannot be transferred with any business, but such use is dependent only on membership in the association. Upon the question whether labels of this character are valid trade-marks, there has been some contrariety of opinion.

In People v. Fisher, 50 Hun, 853, under the New York Penal Code, which does not define a trade-mark in essential particulars differently from that usually adopted independent of the Statute, it was held that the label was a valid trade-mark; but we are of opinion that it cannot be so treated and considered, unless a quite different definition is given to this word from that which it has heretofore received, and quite different conditions from those heretofore recognized are held sufficient to justify proceedings for an injunction against one who dishonestly seeks to make a market for his wares by advertisements thereof which are false and unjustifiable. Without discussing the rights which a purchaser may have who has been deceived by such an advertisement or label, it is necessary for those who claim that their right of property in a trade-mark has been invaded, to show that they are in some way by themselves, or with others, the owners thereof by reason of some business which they are transacting together, and to which its use is incident, and not merely a personal privilege which they possess as members of a particular association of wide extent and embracing many persons of varied interest, to advertise, or have advertised by those by whom they are employed, the articles made by them as being made by members of such association.

It is urged by the plaintiffs, even if the label in question cannot be considered technically a trade-mark, that even where trade-marks have not been infringed, courts of equity have granted injunctions against the use, on various grounds, of certain marks, wrappers and labels, where there appeared to be a design to deceive the public by concealing the true origin of the kind of goods in both labels are inclosed in a floral wreath of the same description is not of itself enough to constitute a fraudulent imitation. Merrimack Mfg. Co. v. Garver, 2 Abb. Pr. 386.

A man cannot be enjoined from giving his own name to a medicine or other article of which he is in good faith the manufacturer, although the result may be to confound the article to some extent in the public mind with a similar article previously manufactured by some other person of the same name, unless the use of his own name is merely colorable, accompanied with some artifice to mislead the public. Brown Chemical Co. v. Myer, 31 Fed. Rep. 438; William Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Simpson, 4 New Eng. Rep. 74, 84 Conn. 327.

The use of the words "patent roofing," merely designating the kind of business one is engaged in, cannot be protected as a trade-mark. Fay v. Fay (N. J.) 4 Cent. Rep. 261.

Plaintiffs, having stamped upon silver spoons "Higgin & Bros. A.," were not entitled to enjoin defendants from stamping "C. Rogers & Bros. A.," it being a fair and honest use of the owner's name. Loomis, J., and Park, Ch. J., dissenting. Rogers v. Rogers, 1 New Eng. Rep. 411, 84 Conn. 131.

A purchaser, at assignor's sale, of wrappers, sacks, etc., used in a seed business, marked with the name of the assignor's firm, is not entitled to enjoin the assignor from using the firm name. Iowa Seed Co. v. Dorr, 10 Iowa, 481.

Forfeiture of right to injunction.

Where tea is put up in a package enclosed in tin-foil like imported tea, and marked "Standard No. 1" on the front of the package, with statements which lead the public to suppose that it is pure tea, if, instead of this being true, the tea is compounded in Baltimore of several varieties, although purified by a secret process, the misrepresentation will defeat an injunction for infringement of the trade-mark. Kenny v. Gilet, 10 Md. 374.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the infringement of a trade-mark which is accompanied with statements in the label plainly calculated to deceive and mislead purchasers. Ibid.

One seeking to pass off on the public a spurious for a genuine article, under guise of his trade-mark, forfeits his right to have such trade-mark protected. Parrott v. Guggenheimer, 3 Cent. Rep. 708, 87 Md. 342.

An exclusive privilege to deceive the public by means of a trade-mark containing misrepresentations is not one that a court of equity will aid or sanction. Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 105 U. S. 313 (27 L. ed. 703).

Allowing cigar boxes to be labeled with the names of dealers to whom the cigars are sold or for whom they are made is not deception or false representation when stamped with the name and the trade-mark of the factory which makes them. Lichtenstein v. Goldsmith, 37 Fed. Rep. 302.

goods, and to make it appear that they were the goods of another. Crest v. Day, 7 Beav. 84; Melcan v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245 [24 L. ed. 838]; Brown Chemical Co. v. Myer, 31 Fed. Rep. 458; Thomson v. Winchester, 19 Pick. 214.

We have no occasion to question this principle of the authorities by which it has been sustained. It will be found that where, under such circumstances, an injunction has been granted or an action maintained, it has been at the instance of one who was himself a manufacturer, dealer in or owner of the articles which were fraudulently represented by the counterfeit labels, wrappers or advertisements to be his. In such case the fraud complained of would have a natural and inevitable tendency to lessen the sales, affect the reputation of the articles manufactured or dealt in, injure the business of the complainant, and would thus afford him a ground for relief by reason of the special and peculiar damage which he would sustain or to which he might be exposed. The plaintiffs show by their bill that they have a right to use the label in question and that it is a valuable privilege; but although they aver that they have suffered loss by the use of it by the defendant, they do not show that any business which they pursue has been affected, or that they have sustained any definite loss or any injury except that which must be extremely remote and purely speculative.

In Carson v. Ury (U. S. C. C. Mo.), 5 L. R. A. 614, it was held that a union label (answering in all respects to the one annexed to the plaintiff's bill, and there averred to have been counterfeited by the defendants) did not answer to the definition ordinarily given to a technical trade-mark, because it did not indicate with any degree of certainty by what particular person or firm the cigars were manufactured to which it might be affixed, or serve to distinguish the goods of one cigar manufacturer from another, and also because the complainant did not appear to have any vendible interest in the label, but merely a right to use it so long and only so long as he might remain a member of the union. In all these respects it lacked the characteristics of a valid trade-mark. In that case, however, the complainant had averred himself to be a manufacturer of cigars entitled to use the union label, who had used and was actually using it on the cigars manufactured by him, thus guaranteeing the character and quality of his cigars; that he had made profits thereby and that he had been greatly injured and was liable to be greatly injured by the defendants, who had prepared for sale counterfeit labels in the similitude of those he had used and which he was entitled to use. It was there deemed that the cases of Cigar Makers Protective Union v. Conhain and Rehneider v. Williams, cited supra, were distinguishable in this, that in those cases the bills were framed upon the theory that the label was a technical trade-mark and as such the property of all the members of the union, and that any one or more members of the union might maintain a suit to restrain any unauthorized person from using the label whether they were themselves engaged in the manufacture and sale of cigars on their own account or not. It was deemed, therefore, properly to have been held in those cases that the plaintiffs could not be considered to have such a property in the label that they could maintain a bill upon the ground that they were injuriously affected by the fraudulent acts complained of, while in the case then before the court the complainant had averred himself to be a manufacturer of cigars who had built up a profitable trade and business, which business was liable to be and was damaged by the fraudulent acts complained of. In the case at bar there is no allegation that the plaintiffs are themselves, on their own account or with others, manufacturers or dealers in cigars as a business, or even persons actually employed by others in their sale or manufacture, or that the union of which they are members and officers is engaged in any business of that description. They do not by their bill show that they apply or have applied this label to any vendible commodity of which they are the owners or which they manufacture for the market or place thereon for sale, or in which they deal. Where an association such as the Cigar Makers' Union, embracing many members and many divisions as subordinate unions, has adopted a symbol or device to be used on boxes of cigars made by its members, such device or symbol not indicating by whom the cigars are made, but only that they are made by some of the members of the union; and where the right to use the device or symbol belongs equally to all the members, and continues only while they are members,—a bill cannot be maintained by individual members or officers of such association to restrain others wrongfully and fraudulently using such device or symbol from so doing. Any injury to such members or officers is not direct or immediate, nor does it affect them in any business which in some form they conduct. It is upon this ground that such invasions of that which has been held to be property have heretofore been restrained.

Whether if the bill had contained allegations similar to those which were found in the case of Carson v. Ury, supra, it might have been maintained, we have no occasion now to consider.

Bill dismissed.

vs.

Alfred H. BATCHELLER et al.

(.....Mass.....)

NOTE.—Insolvent Laws have no extraterritorial efficacy.

It is the general rule that Insolvent Laws have no extraterritorial efficacy, and are wholly inoffensive against nonresidents of the State, even though the contract, by its terms, was to be performed in the State granting the discharge, unless the nonresident creditor voluntarily becomes a party to the insolvent proceedings, or claims or accepts a dividend thereunder. Ogden v. Saunders,

State Court either will not regard the state decision as subject to review by it or will change its own decision.

2. A discharge under State Insolvency Laws will not release existing debts due to non-resident creditors who do not come in and prove their claims in the insolvency proceedings.

3. There is nothing in the Massachusetts Insolvency Law indicating an intent to refuse foreign creditors access to the local courts to enforce their claims after a discharge as a merely local rule of procedure, or otherwise than as a consequence of the substantive right having been barred by the discharge; hence since the right cannot be barred the action may be maintained.

(June, 1890.)

REPORT from the Superior Court for Suffolk County of a suit brought by a foreign creditor to enforce payment of its claim by a debtor who had been discharged in insolvency. Judgment for plaintiff.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. Lauriston L. Scaife for plaintiff.

Messrs. John Lowell, M. F. Dickinson, Jr., and Hollis R. Bailey, for defendants:

In the courts of Massachusetts, if not elsewhere, said discharge in insolvency constitutes a good defense to any action upon the note in question.

Pub. Stat. chap. 157, § 81; Stat. 1884, chap. 286, § 9.

Previous to Kelley v. Drury, 9 Allen, 27, it was settled in Massachusetts that a discharge in insolvency, obtained in Massachusetts by a resident of Massachusetts, was a good defense to an action on a contract made and to be performed here, even though the plaintiff was a nonresident.

Stricker v. Fisker, 2 Gray, 43; Burrall v. Bior, 5 Gray, 559.

Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 223 (17 L. ed. 531), which Kelley v. Drury follows, was decided on no constitutional ground.

See Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 239 (17 L. ed. 535); Ogden v. Saunders, 24 U. S. 12 Wheat. 279 (6 L. ed. 628); Gilman v. Lockwood, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 409 (18 L. ed. 432).

The question involved in the case was one of comity, and not of right.

The views of the United States courts on this matter of comity or international law have long been different from those of the courts of Massachusetts.

Marsh v. Putnam, 3 Gray, 551.

The laws which subsist at the time and place of making a contract enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms.

Edwards v. Kearney, 96 U. S. 601 (24 L. ed. 797). United States v. Quiney, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 450 (18 L. ed. 409).

By international law a debt is discharged by a certificate in bankruptcy duly granted at the place where the contract was made; a fortiori if it was expressly made payable in the same place.

Story, Conf. L. § 340; Westlake, Private Internat. Law, § 225; Gardner v. Houghton, 2 Best & S. 748; Mansfield v. Andrews, 41 Me. 501; Peck v. Hibbard, 26 Vt. 608; May v. Broad, 7 Cush. 15; Mather v. Bush, 16 Johns. 283.

The courts of a State or country are bound to obey the command of its Legislature, whether it agrees with international law or not, unless the Legislature has exceeded its constitutional power.

Story, Conf. L. § 348; Murray v. De Rottenham, 6 Johns. Ch. 53, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 53; Sidway v. Hay, 3 Barn. & C. 13; Ellis v. M'Henry, L. R. 6 O. P. 228.

Accordingly it has been held that our late Bankrupt Law discharged a debt held by a foreigner who took no part in the proceedings.

Russ v. Erickman, 5 Fed. Rep. 700; Patterson v. Wilbur, 10 R. L. 449.

The plaintiff is not deprived of any rights under this contract, since it still has all that it ever had. That has happened which the parties contemplated might happen: the debtors have failed, and obtained a discharge under Massachusetts laws, and this discharge is a good defense against any action in the state courts of Massachusetts.

See Blanchard v. Russell, 13 Mass. 1, 5, 6; United States v. Quiney and Edwards v. Kearney, supra.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a Rhode Island National Bank upon a promissory note payable in Massachusetts, and made here by the defendants, citizens of this State. The defense is a discharge in insolvency in this State. It is admitted that the plaintiff did not prove its claim upon the note, and the only question is whether, under these circumstances, the discharge is a bar. It was argued for the defendant that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that discharges in such cases are not generally valid against citizens of other States, do not go upon any constitutional ground, but upon mistaken views of what is called private international law, and therefore are not binding upon us, and we were asked to reconsider Kelley v. Drury, 9 Allen, 27, in which this court yielded its earlier expressed opinion and followed the precedent of Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 223 [17 L. ed. 531]. See also Guernsey v. Wood, 180 Mass. 508; Marwell v. Cochran, 183 Mass. 78.

There is no dispute that the letter of the discharge and of our Statute covers the plaintiff's claim. Pub. Stat. chap. 157, §§ 80, 81.

And the argument in favor of giving them effect according to their letter is that, unless the Statute is void, we are bound to follow it; that the law of the place where the contract is made, and is to be performed, which is in force at the time of making and for performing it, enters into the contract so far as to settle everywhere what acts done at that place shall discharge it (May v. Broad, 7 Cush 15); and that a discharge in accordance with that law cannot be said to impair the obligation of a contract which contemplated it, or to deprive the contractee of property without due process of law, when that property was created subject to destruction in that way. We express no opinion upon the weight of this argument. Although it formerly prevailed with this court (Scribner v. Fisher, 9 Gray, 48; Burrell v. Rice, 5 Gray, 550), it may be that there is a distinction as to a discharge by legal proceedings. It may be that statutes providing for a discharge by an insolvency court do not enter into the contract in such a sense as to bind the contractee to adopt and submit himself to the jurisdiction as an implied condition of the promisor's undertaking. It does not follow, because the discharge, if effective, does not impair the obligation of the contract, that absolute liability to it is a part of the substantive obligation. The substantive promise and the obligation of the contract are different things. And apart from this consideration it may be that by sound principle the plaintiff is to be taken to have subjected himself to Massachusetts proceedings only to the extent that if the Massachusetts courts could acquire jurisdiction over it in the ordinary modes by which jurisdiction of the person is acquired, it would be bound everywhere by a discharge granted here.

However this may be, we see no sufficient reason for departing from what has been accepted as the law for a quarter of a century. We agree that, consistently with our duty, we cannot yield our opinion upon new questions not subject to the final jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States solely out of a desire for uniformity. But when we are asked to overrule a decision of our own court which has been acquiesced in for so long, we should have to be very sure before doing so, not only that the decision was wrong, but also that the Supreme Court of the United States, whatever we may think about it, either would not regard our decision as subject to review by them, or would abandon opinions which they have expressed repeatedly and down to the latest volume of their Reports.

We should hesitate to overrule Kelley v. Drury, even if we were ready to say that we disagreed with the principle of Baldwin v. Hale, and that we thought our decision not subject to review. For when in a particular case the precedents are settled in favor of uniformity, the fact that they do conform to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States is a most powerful secondary reason for not disturbing them and would be likely to outweigh our private opinions upon the original matter. There is, too, a particular reason for uniformity in the present case, because it is manifest that, practically at least, the general validity of the discharge,—that is, its effect outside this Commonwealth,—depends upon the decision of other courts than this, and that the decision of the United States court upon that question is of more importance than that of any other. The often repeated view of the Supreme Court of the United States is that discharges like the present are void for want of jurisdiction, and that statutes purporting to authorize them are beyond the power of the States to pass (Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U. S. 1 Wall 223, 230 [17 L. ed. 531, 534]; Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 234 [17 L. ed. 534]; Quinn v. Lockwood, 71 U. S. 3 Wall. 409 [18 L. ed. 433]; Denny v. Bennett, 129 U. S. 489, 497 [32 L. ed. 491, 494]; Cole v. Cunningham, 130 U. S. 107, 115 [33 L. ed. 500, 542]).

Whether that court would regard a decision to the contrary by a state court as subject to review by them upon constitutional grounds does not appear very clearly from any language of theirs which has been called to our attention, unless it be the following, repeated in Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 301 [17 L. ed. 505], from Ogden v. Saunders, 24 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213, 370 [6 L. ed. 606, 658]: "But when in the exercise of that power, the States pass beyond their own limits and the rights of their own citizens, and act upon the rights of citizens of other States, there arises a conflict of sovereign power and a collision with the judicial powers granted to the United States, which renders the exercise of such a power incompatible with the rights of other States, and with the Constitution of the United States." This is somewhat emphasized as the deliberate view of the court, not only by its original mode of statement, but by their adhesion to it after the dissent of Chief Justice Taney in Chok v. Moffat, 46 U. S. 5 How. 205, 310 [13 L. ed. 180, 186]. See Scribner v. Fisher, 9 Gray, 48, 47.

This language certainly gives the impression that our decision would be regarded as subject to review, possibly on the ground of an implied restriction on the power to pass Insolvent Laws reserved to the States (Denny v. Bennett, 129 U. S. 489, 498 [32 L. ed. 491, 495]), possibly on the ground that the discharge would impair the obligation of contracts with persons not within the jurisdiction (Chok v. Moffat, 46 U. S. 5 How. 205, 308 [13 L. ed. 180, 185]), possibly by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment (Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 [24 L. ed. 505]); possibly on some vaguer ground. We feel the force of the reasoning quoted from Stoddard v. Harrington, 100 Mass. 87, 89, but that case did not profess to weaken the authority of Kelley v. Drury, and moreover the question which we are now considering is not what would be our own opinion, but what seems to be the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The decision in Kelley v. Drury did not go upon any nice inquiry whether it was subject to review, but upon the ground that this court deferred to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that discharges like the present were not binding outside the jurisdiction, and that, this being so, a discrimination should not be made in favor of our citizens in proceedings in the state court in distinction from proceedings in the courts of the United States.

This last proposition was conceded by the senior counsel for the defendant. But as some doubt was thrown upon it in the printed brief we repeat what was again intimated in Morphy

v. Manning, 124 Mass. 488, that there is nothing in the law affecting the question before us which indicates an intent to refuse foreign creditors access to the courts of Massachusetts as a merely local rule of procedure, or otherwise than as a consequence of the substantive right having been barred by the discharge. The form of the discharge in Pub. Stat., chap.

187, § 80, and the language of § 81, address themselves directly to the substantive right and declare the debtor discharged from the specified debts. It being settled that the plaintiff's debt is not barred, an action can be maintained to recover it in the state court.

Judgment for plaintiff.

1. Express continuing trusts are excluded from the operation of Statutes of Limitation, while implied trusts are subject thereto.

2. Leaving corporate stock in the possession and name of the seller, the sale being evidenced only by a declaration thereof in a receipt given for the money paid, and there being no agreement as to the future disposition of the stock or the dividends thereon, creates an implied trust in the seller which is enforceable at law and subject to the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

3. There is no legal presumption of the death of a person who has left home and has not since been heard from until after the expiration of seven years.

4. The pendency of an appeal from an order admitting a will to probate will not excuse a delay of over two years on the part of executors who have qualified thereunder to present for payment claims of testator against the estates of other deceased persons.

5. A claim against a deceased person's estate is forever barred if it is not exhibited within the time limited by the court of probate for the presentation of such claims. Disability of claimant is no excuse for failure to present a claim.

6. An award made upon a submission to arbitrators by executors of a question as to the ownership of certain corporate stock which was in the possession of testator and had been distributed under his will before the agreement to arbitrate was made is not admissible in evidence against the distributees in an action to recover possession of the stock.

(June, 1880.)

NOTE.—Statute of Limitations; trust not within bar of.

Trusts which are mere creatures of a court of equity are not within the Statute. Kane v. Blood, good, 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 281; McClane v. Shepherd, 21 N. J. Eq. 80.

The trusts not within the Statute are those which are the creatures of courts of equity, and not within the cognizance of a law court; and as to those other trusts which are the ground of an action at law the Statute is as much a bar in one court as the other. Buckingham v. Ludlum, 37 N. J. Eq. 144; Young v. Wiseman, 7 T. R. Mon. 270, 13 Am. Dec. 177. See Wanmaker v. Van Buskirk, 1 N. J. Eq. 885; Morse v. Oliver, 14 N. J. Eq. 259; McClane v. Shepherd, 21 N. J. Eq. 78; Roosevelt v. Mark, 6 Johns. Ch. 288, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 121.

To exempt a trust from the bar of the Statute, it must be a direct trust and of the kind belonging exclusively to the jurisdiction of equity. People v. Oran, 11 West. Rep. 423, 131 Ill. 650.

Trusts not affected by Statutes of Limitation are those technical and continuing trusts not at all cognizable at law, but which fall within the peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction of courts of equity. Tinnen v. Mebane, 10 Tex. 262; Cooke v. McGinnis, Mart. & Y. 262.

Trusts intended by courts of equity not to be reached by the Statute are those technical and continuing trusts which are not cognizable at law, but fall within the proper, peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction of this court. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 847, 870; Bourne v. Hall, 10 R. L. 144; Finney v. Cochran, 1 Watts & S. 112, 37 Am. Dec. 452. See Prevost v. Grata, 19 U. S. 8 Wheat. 481 (5 L. ed. 311); Raymond v. Simonson, 4 Blackf. 77; Payne v. Hathaway, 3 Vt. 212; Cook v. Williams, 2 N. J. Eq. 209; Baylor v. Dejarotte, 15 Gratt. 152; Hemenway v. Gates, 5 Pick. 221; Greenwood v. Greenwood, 5 S. L. S. 8 How. 411 (11 L. ed. 668); Hostetter v. Hollinger, 10 Cent. Rep. 771, 117 Pa. 608, 21 W. N. C. 72.

It does not apply to actions founded on a direct or strict trust such as are not cognizable at law, but fall within the proper, peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction of a court of equity. Partridge v. Wells, 20 N. J. Eq. 179.

The custodian of a fund which has been created for the benefit of a particular person, the contributors having wholly relinquished their control over it, is within the operation of the Statute of Limitations. Hostetter v. Hollinger, supra.

No lapse of time bars a direct or an express trust.

The rule is well settled that no lapse of time is a bar to a direct trust, as between executor and trustee and cestui que trust. Robison v. Robison, 5 Lana. 162; Bigelow v. Catlin, 50 Vt. 410; Goodrich v. Pendleton, 2 Johns. Ch. 264, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 497; Chicago & E. L. R. Co. v. Hay, 7 West. Rep. 720, 119 Ill. 498; Deconche v. Savetier, 2 Johns. Ch. 190, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 587; Coster v. Murray, 2 Johns. Ch. 622, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1162; Beckford v. Wada, 17 Ves. Jr. 57; Parmele v. McGinty, 53 Minn. 451; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & W. 1.

The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to a trust where the cestui que trust is the trustee's wife. Rusling v. Rusling, 7 Cent. Rep. 129, 43 N. J. Eq. 594.

Money received by the husband from his wife's separate estate was received by him as statutory trustee, against which the Statute of Limitations would not run. Comstock's App. 4 New Eng. Rep. 692, 55 Conn. 214.

Limitation does not run in favor of a trustee as against his cestui que trust while the latter is in pos-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain corporate stock alleged to have been the property of plaintiff's testator. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mosser, A. P. Hyde and O. J. Cole, for appellants:

The limitations against an estate are an absolute bar and there is no provision for suspension during the disability of the plaintiff.

Atwood v. Rhode Island Agricultural Bank, 2 R. I. 196; Pratt v. Northam, 5 Mason, 95; Lewin, Tr. p. 866; Morgan v. Hamlet, 118 U. S. 449 (28 L. ed. 1045); Russell v. Patterson, 76 Me. 196; Hall v. Burnstead, 20 Pick. 8; Schouler, Exra. § 419.

The Statute of Limitations as to claims against estates is highly favored.

Ang. Lim. 5th ed. p. 161; 3 Wms. Exra. 2184; Sugar River Bank v. Fairbanks, 49 N. H. 139.

Equity follows the analogies of the law in the matter of the Statute of Limitations.

2 Lewin, Tr. 864; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 113, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 239; Belknap v. Gleason, 11 Conn. 169; Lewis, Tr. 1159, notes, and cases cited.

The plaintiff cannot, by a mere change of forum, avoid the limitation of the Statute. If he has two remedies, one at law and the other in equity, the bar which operates in one also operates in the other.

Kane v. Bloodgood, supra; Johnson v. Smith, 27 Mo. 591; Governor v. Woodworth, 63 Ill. 254; Barton v. Dickens, 48 Pa. 519; Prescott v. Buckingham, 26 Minn. 96; Zacharias v. Zacharias, 23 Pa. 453; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 30; Hayward v. Gunn, 82 Ill. 385; Johnson v. Ames, 11 Pick. 183; Morgan v. Hamlet, supra.

If the trust is implied or constructive, that is, created by construction, implication or by operation of law, the Statute runs and operates as a bar, because in such cases the holding is adverse.

Perry, Tr. § 865, p. 786; Hart's App. 12 Conn. 537; Wilmerding v. Russ, 23 Conn. 76; Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 434; Belknap v. Gleason, supra; Burditt v. Grew, 8 Pick. 108; Jones v. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. 17; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 16; Ang. Lim. § 178, p. 169; Strimpf v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 300; Prescott v. Buckingham, supra; Manion v. Titworth, 10 B. Mon. 582; Barton v. In cases of express, technical and continuing trusts, if the trust be repudiated, then, the holding being adverse, the Statute runs from the time of repudiation.

A pledgee who retains the pledged property may at any time be compelled to restore it, upon tender of the debt; and the Statute does not run against it. Humphrey v. Clearfield Co. Nat. Bank, 5 Cent. Rep. 125, 114 Pa. 417.

The Statute does not apply in favor of a trustee as to funds held in trust. Lawrence v. Warwick (N. J.) 3 Cent. Rep. 470.

Since the possession of the trustee is the possession of the cestui que trust, and no action at law will lie by the latter against the former for any money payments due, the Statute of Limitations does not apply to express trusts. Dyer v. Waters (N. J.) Feb. 2, 1890.

The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to an action, founded on an express trust, to compel an accounting. Anderson v. Meredith, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 490; Reeves v. Beckman, 7 Cent. Rep. 454, 65 N. J. Eq. 412.

An action against a trustee to compel an accounting and for judgment for the amount of trust funds converted is not subject to the six years' Statute of Limitations. Colglazier v. Colglazier, 117 Ind. 400.

The Statute of Limitations does not apply in cases of direct and express trusts or cases of fraud. App v. Dreimbach, 2 Rawle, 257, 31 Am. Dec. 400.

Deposit; a direct trust.

Every deposit is a direct trust; and every person who receives money to be paid to another, or to be applied to a particular purpose, is a trustee. App v. Dreimbach, 2 Rawle, 257, receding from Oster v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. 522, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 1161.
